The Complete Anti-Federalist

Edited, with Commentary and Notes, by

Herbert J. Storing

With the Assistance of Murray Dry

An Electronic Version of the Seven Volumes of
The Complete Anti-Federalist

The University of Chicago Press
Chicago and London

How to go to your page

This eBook contains seven volumes. Each volume has its own page numbering scheme, consisting of a volume number and a page number, separated by a colon.

For example, to go to page 5 of Volume 1, type V1:5 in the "page #" box at the top of the screen and click "Go." To go to page 5 of Volume 2, type V2:5… and so forth.

The Complete Anti-Federalist

Edited, with Commentary and Notes, by

Herbert J. Storing

With the Assistance of Murray Dry

VOLUME 1

What the Anti-Federalists Were For

With the Articles of Confederation and The Constitution of the United States, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions

The University of Chicago Press

Chicago and London

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637
The University of Chicago Press, Ltd., London

© 1981 by The University of Chicago
All rights reserved. Published 1981
Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Main entry under title:

The Complete Anti-Federalist

Includes bibliographical references.
Contents: v. 1. What the Anti-Federalists were for—v. 2. Objections of non-signers of the Constitution and Major series of essays at the outset—v. 3. Pennsylvania—[etc.]
1. United States—Constitutional law—Collected works.
I. Storing, Herbert J., 1928–77. II. Dry, Murray.

KF4515.C65	342.73'029	81-10287
ISBN 0-226-77573-9 (set)	347.30229	AACR2

The University of Chicago Press gratefully acknowledges contributions toward publication costs of The Complete Anti-Federalist from the following organizations and individuals: The Ford Foundation; the Institute for Educational Affairs; the National Endowment for the Humanities; the Earhart Foundation; the Herbert J. Storing Memorial Fund (administered by The Woodrow Wilson Department of Government and Foreign Affairs, at the University of Virginia); Project '87; Natico, Inc.; Sidney Dry; and Robert W. Galvin.

Contents

VOLUME ONE

Foreword by Joseph Cropsey xv
Preface by Murray Dry xvii
Prefatory Notes by Herbert J. Storing xix

What the Anti-Federalists Were For

1 Introduction 3
2 Conservatives 7
3 The Small Republic 15
4 Union 24
5 The Federalist Reply 38
6 The Aristocratic Tendency of the Constitution 48
7 Complex Government 53
8 Bill of Rights 64
9 Conclusion 71

Works Frequently Cited 77

Notes 79

The Articles of Confederation, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions 101

The Constitution of the United States, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions 110

Contents of Other Volumes

VOLUME TWO

PART I

Objections of Non-Signers of the Constitution

Introduction
2.1 Elbridge Gerry's Objections to Signing the National Constitution (Massachusetts Centinel 3 November 1787)
2.2 George Mason's Objections to the Constitution of Government Formed by the Convention (1787)
2.3 Robert Yates and John Lansing, Reasons of Dissent (New York Journal 14 January 1788)
2.4 Luther Martin, The Genuine Information Delivered to the Legislature of the State of Maryland (1788)
2.5 Letter from Edmund Randolph Giving His Reasons for Refusing His Signature to the Proposed Federal Constitution (10 October 1787)

PART 2

Major Series of Essays at the Outset

2.6 Letters of Cato (New York Journal September 1787–January 1788)
2.7 Letters of Centinel (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer and Philadelphia Freeman's Journal October 1787–April 1788)
2.8 Observations Leading to a Fair Examination of the System of Government Proposed by the Late Convention, Letters from The Federal Farmer (1787 and 1788)
2.9 Essays of Brutus (New York Journal October 1787–April 1788)

VOLUME THREE

Pennsylvania

Introduction
3.1 Speech of William Findley in the Pennsylvania Assembly (28 September 1787)
3.2 Address of the Minority of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives (4 October 1787)
3.3 Essays of An Old Whig (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer October 1787–February 1788)
3.4 Essay by Montezuma (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 17 October 1787)
3.5 Essay of A Democratic Federalist (Pennsylvania Herald 17 October 1787)
3.6 A Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican (1787)
3.7 Address of John Humble (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 29 October 1787)
3.8 Letter by An Officer of the Late Continental Army (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 6 November 1787)
3.9 Essays of Philadelphiensis (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer November 1787–April 1788)
3.10 Essay by Alfred (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 13 December 1787)
3.11 The Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania to their Constituents (Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser 18 December 1787)
3.12 Essays by William Penn (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer January 1788)
3.13 Essay by Deliberator (Philadelphia Freeman's Journal 20 February 1788)
3.14 The Fallacies of the Freeman Detected by A Farmer (Philadelphia Freeman's Journal April 1788)
3.15 Essay by None of the Well-Born Conspirators (Philadelphia Freeman's Journal 23 April 1788)
3.16 The Government of Nature Delineated, or An Exact Picture of the New Federal Constitution, by Aristocrotis (Carlisle 1788)

Contents of Other Volumes

Volume Four

Massachusetts and New England

Introduction
4.1 Anon., "A confederation, for purposes merely national . . ." (Massachusetts Gazette 9 October 1787)
4.2 A Letter from a Gentleman in a Neighbouring State, to a Gentleman in this City (Connecticut Journal October 1787)
4.3 Essays of John DeWitt (Boston American Herald October–December 1787)
4.4 Essays by Vox Populi (Massachusetts Gazette October–November 1787)
4.5 William Symmes, Letter to Capt. Peter Osgood, Jr. (15 November 1787) and Speech in Massachusetts Convention (22 January 1788)
4.6 Letters of Agrippa (Massachusetts Gazette November 1787–February 1788)
4.7 Essay by A Federalist (Boston Gazette 26 November 1787)
4.8 Essay by One of the Common People (Boston Gazette 3 December 1787)
4.9 Essays by Candidus (Boston Independent Chronicle December 1787–January 1788)
4.10 Essay by Cornelius (Hampshire Chronicle December 1787)
4.11 Essay by Poplicola (Boston Gazette 24 December 1787)
4.12 Essays by Helvidius Priscus (Boston Independent Chronicle and Massachusetts Gazette December 1787–February 1788)
4.13 Letters of A Republican Federalist (Massachusetts Centinel December 1787–February 1788)
4.14 Essay by Samuel (Boston Independent Chronicle 10 January 1788)
4.15 Essays by Hampden (Massachusetts Centinel January–February 1788)
4.16 Letter from A Customer (Portland, Maine, Cumberland Gazette March 1788)
4.17 Essays by A Farmer (New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle January–June 1788)
4.18 Charles Turner, Speeches in the Massachusetts Ratifying Convention (17 January and 6 February 1788)
4.19 Letter from The Yeomanry of Massachusetts (Massachusetts Gazette 25 January 1788)
4.20 Essay by An American (Boston American Herald 28 January 1788)
4.21 Letter from A Bostonian (Boston American Herald 4 February 1788)
4.22 Address by A Watchman (Worcester Magazine February 1788)

4.23 A Friend to the Rights of the People, Anti-Foederalist, No. I; and A Friend to the Republic, Anti-Foederalist, No. II (New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle February 1788)
4.24 Letter by David (Massachusetts Gazette 7 March 1788)
4.25 Essay by A Newport Man (Newport Mercury March 1788)
4.26 Consider Arms, Malichi Maynard, and Samuel Field, Reasons for Dissent (Hampshire Gazette April 1788)
4.27 Essay by Phileleutheros (Hampshire Gazette May 1788)
4.28 Observations on the New Constitution, and on the Federal and State Conventions, by A Columbian Patriot (Boston 1788)

VOLUME FIVE

PART 1

Maryland

Introduction
5.1 Essays by A Farmer (Maryland Gazette February–April 1788)
5.2 Essay by A Farmer and Planter (Maryland Journal April 1788)
5.3 Samuel Chase, Notes of Speeches Delivered to the Maryland Ratifying Convention (April 1788)
5.4 Address of a Minority of the Maryland Ratifying Convention (Baltimore Maryland Gazette May 1788)
5.5 Address by John Francis Mercer (April or May 1788)

PART 2

Virginia and the South

Introduction
5.6 Letter of Richard Henry Lee to Governor Edmund Randolph (16 October 1787)
5.7 Address by Cato Uticensis (Virginia Independent Chronicle 17 October 1787)
5.8 A Proposal for Reviving Christian Conviction (Virginia Independent Chronicle October 1787)
5.9 Essay by A Georgian (Gazette of the State of Georgia 15 November 1787)
5.10 Essays by Cato (State Gazette of South Carolina November–December 1787)

5.11 Essay by Tamony (Virginia Independent Chronicle 9 January 1788)
5.12 Speeches of Rawlins Lowndes in the South Carolina Legislature (January 1788)
5.13 Essays by Republicus (Lexington Kentucky Gazette February and March 1788)
5.14 Essays by The Impartial Examiner (Virginia Independent Chronicle February–June 1788)
5.15 Reply to Cassius by Brutus (Virginia Independent Chronicle 14 May 1788)
5.16 Speeches of Patrick Henry in the Virginia State Ratifying Convention (June 1788)
5.17 Speech of George Mason in the Virginia State Ratifying Convention (4 June 1788)
5.18 Address by Denatus (Virginia Independent Chronicle 11 June 1788)
5.19 Letter from A Delegate Who Has Catched Cold (Virginia Independent Chronicle June 1788)
5.20 Sentiments of Many (Virginia Independent Chronicle 18 June 1788)
5.21 James Monroe, Some Observations on the Constitution (1788)

Volume Six

PART I

New York

Introduction
6.1 Essays by Cincinnatus (New York Journal November–December 1787)
6.2 Objections by A Son of Liberty (New York Journal 8 November 1787)
6.3 Essay by Brutus, Jr. (New York Journal 8 November 1787)
6.4 A Reply to Publius by An Observor (New York Journal 19 November 1787)
6.5 Reply to Medium by A Citizen (New York Journal 24 November 1787)
6.6 Letters from A Countryman from Dutchess County (New York Journal November 1787–February 1788)
6.7 Letters from A Countryman (New York Journal December 1787–January 1788)
6.8 Essays by Sidney (Albany Gazette February–March 1788)
6.9 Address by Sydney (New York Journal June 1788)
6.10 Address of the Albany Antifederal Committee (Jer. Van Rensselaer, Chairman) (New York Journal 26 April 1788)

6.11 An Address by A Plebeian (New York 1788)
6.12 Speeches by Melancton Smith, Delivered in the Course of Debate by the Convention of the State of New York on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution (June 1788)
6.13 Notes of Speeches Given by George Clinton before the New York State Ratifying Convention (June–July 1788)

PART 2

Conclusion

6.14 Mercy Warren, History of the Rise, Progress and Termination of the American Revolution (Boston 1805), chapter 31, with excerpts from chapter 30

VOLUME SEVEN

Index

Foreword

The preoccupation of Herbert Storing's professional life was the genesis and meaning of the American regime. From the late fifties to the late seventies, during the whole of his distinguished career as a teacher at the University of Chicago, he led a generation of graduate students and, toward the end, some hundreds of undergraduates, through the courses that constituted a field which he developed and made his own—the American founding. At some time rather early in his career, he conceived the plan of collecting the less well-known or less accessible documents on both sides of the debate over the ratification of the Constitution, for he understood well that beneath the grandest practical conclusions lie the most massive antitheses, grinding one another in gigantic contention. Storing could not find means to gather and edit what he called, and wrote about as, the "other" Federalist writings—those less famous than the Federalist Papers themselves; but he did achieve the edited Anti-Federalist collection that appears here in print. He sent the manuscript of it to the University of Chicago Press in the summer of 1977, and then, on September 9th of that season, he died suddenly in the 49th year of his age.

He had lavished his labor on this work with a tenacity, devotion, and intelligence that could not be described outside the bounds of a general eulogy for which this is not the place. He died with this major effort mercifully complete. The tasks of seeing it through the press devolved on others, especially on Professor Murray Dry, who acceded to the requests of Mrs. Herbert Storing and of Storing's closest friends, who recognized in Professor Dry an experienced surrogate for his teacher. Deprived of the satisfaction of seeing his work in its perfected form, Herbert Storing will be memorialized in it while the study of the American Constitution engages the attention of scholars and leads them to the door of their faithful and learned benefactor.

Joseph Cropsey

Chicago, 1979

Preface

In November 1963, Herbert J. Storing wrote to the University of Chicago Press, proposing an edition of Anti-Federalist writings. In 1977, he delivered The Complete Anti-Federalist to the Press. When Storing died, in September 1977, the copy editing had barely begun. In the spring of 1978, I was asked to assist the Press in bringing my former teacher's substantially completed manuscript to publication. I agreed to fill in all the cross references, check all the quotations and source citations, and read the proofs.

All the Anti-Federalist texts had been verified by Storing and have therefore not been further edited, except for the silent correction of a few printer's errors that Storing himself had not noted. In series of letters or essays, the numbering has been standardized, plain roman numerals replacing the "Cato, No. IV," "Philadelphiensis, No. 2," etc., of the originals. Earlier printers' (or authors') errors in the numbering are discussed in Storing's notes, and the numbering of items in series has been corrected accordingly in the present edition. Dates that appear immediately below roman numerals, centered, are those of first publication and thus, like the numerals themselves, belong to the editorial apparatus; dates that appear immediately above letter openings, to the right, presumably denote the time of writing and may be considered part of the texts proper. Some of the longer names of Anti-Federalist writers have been shortened in the introductory material and notes, for consistency and easy reference. Obvious pseudonyms, such as Brutus or Agrippa, have not been distinguished typographically; other, less obvious ones, such as "William Penn," are enclosed in quotation marks at first mention.

In his Prefatory Notes, Storing said he planned to provide "an excellent general index" and a special index to the provisions of the Constitution. We have attempted to honor his desire. Volume 7 of this edition provides a complete index to volumes 1–6. And in this first volume we have reproduced not only the Constitution and first ten Amendments but also the Articles of Confederation (from the texts in Documents Illustrative of the Formation of the Union of the American States, edited by Charles C. Tansill, Washington, D.C., 1927), both keyed to the principal Anti-Federalist discussions. Here we have adapted the system used by Clinton Rossiter in his edition of The Federalist Papers (New York 1961).

For convenient cross reference, and without any other editorial purpose, a three-part number has been assigned to each paragraph (or group of paragraphs where they are brief) of the writings assembled in The Complete Anti-Federalist. The first number denotes the volume, the second the position of the essay or series within that volume, and the third the paragraph. A reference to, for example, Federal Republican 3.16.13 locates a passage in the Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican, which can be found in volume 3 of this edition. These numbers are distinct from any numbering by the authors themselves or any of their publishers; Centinel III, 2.7.73 refers to the third letter of Centinel, in volume 2 below. The abbreviation "intro." is used for Storing's introductions to volumes or parts of volumes as well as the introductions to individual texts. A reference to, say, 2.8.intro. denotes the introductory sketch and outline of the Federal Farmer, located in volume 2. Cross references to volume 1 are by page number. A cross reference from one note to another uses a three-part number plus a note number, so that the reader may refer to the text as well as the note if necessary. In the index, for reasons of space, references to notes use two numbers plus note number (see volume 7, headnote to index).

Friends, research assistants, and professional colleagues assisted Storing in the preparation of this work, and undoubtedly he would have given every one due recognition. The following individuals served as research assistants for Storing during the period 1963 to 1977: Sylvia Snowiss, Ann Charney, Murray Dry, Roberta Dunn, Ralph Rossum, Joseph Bessette, and Kathleen Yonto. Storing sought and received assistance in identifying certain unnamed Anti-Federalist sources from his "Learned Friends." To others who helped Storing acquire his documents or track down information, but who are unknown to me, thanks must be expressed collectively. John F. Robinson provided the index and the cross references for the Constitution; Elizabeth Freeman provided the cross references for the Articles of Confederation; and David Lauten and Elizabeth Stouder spent a summer assisting me with cross references and footnotes. In Chicago, Ralph Lerner gave generously of his time, in advising and proofreading, and Joseph Cropsey, who contributed the Foreword, was frequently consulted on editorial matters. In conclusion, I am proud to have been able to make a contribution, however small, to this monumental work of my teacher and friend, from whom I learned so much.

Murray Dry

Middlebury, Vermont, 1981

Prefatory Notes

The aim of this collection is to make available for the first time all of the substantial Anti-Federal writings in their complete original form and in an accurate text, together with appropriate annotation. The book is introduced by a lengthy analysis of the political thought of the Anti-Federalists, providing for the first time, in my judgment, a full and adequate account of the main lines, the principles, and the grounds of the Anti-Federal position. The collection of Anti-Federal writings that follows is informed by this concern with political thought, but it is designed to serve other kinds of interests in the Anti-Federalists as well.

This is meant to be an authoritative edition. It includes all Anti-Federalist pamphlets that I have been able to find, all substantial newspaper essays and series of essays, some of the most important speeches by Anti-Federalists in ratifying conventions (though there is no claim of or need for comprehensiveness here), and some manuscript notes. About two-thirds of the items have never been printed since their original publication in 1787 and 1788, including a number of pieces that are of major importance in the Anti-Federal corpus. None of these writings is now available except in abridged form in the two or three short collections now in print. There are very long-term plans for a government publication of all the materials relating to the ratification of the Constitution. This project, under the present editorship of Merrill Jensen, will begin by publishing the "official records and proceedings" and will presumably then go on to publish newspaper essays, etc. This publication will be very important in future, but it can scarcely be expected to be available to this generation of scholars, and it will not, I think, in any case supersede the present collection for the student of the Anti-Federalists. The present collection is particularly timely. It will appear just in the wake of the celebration of the bicentennial of the Revolution; and more importantly it will make available these hitherto largely neglected writings to the scholarly activities that will be stimulated by the bicentennial of the adoption of the Constitution.

The items are organized along lines that reflect, as well as possible, the broad sequence of the debate over the Constitution. First come several statements by non-signers of the proposed Constitution; then several major series of essays, begun early and carried through the ratification controversy (volume 2). Pennsylvania is the first major state to take up and discuss the Constitution (volume 3). The focus then shifts to Massachusetts and New England (volume 4); then to Maryland, and on to Virginia and the South (volume 5); finally back to the North and New York (volume 6). The essays within each volume, or within each part of a volume, are arranged in rough chronological order, though of course they overlap, as do the series in the different parts.

Each item is preceded by an introduction, providing publication data and a summary of the contents, meant to assist the reader in finding the parts of the writings of interest to him. I have included information on the author where known or an account of the available evidence of authorship of pseudonymous pieces. In several cases I have been able, for the first time, to identify the author or I have been able to add significantly to previous knowledge. The original text is followed regarding spelling and punctuation, except for clear typographical errors, which are corrected without notice. Unintelligible passages are corrected or queried in brackets or notes. An effort has been made to identify sources of quotations and other references. Annotations also include cross references to other Anti-Federalist writings and to Federalist writings on major themes. I plan to provide an excellent general index and an index to the provisions of the United States Constitution, so that a reader can easily identify Anti-Federal criticisms of specific portions of the Constitution.

I have, of course, given a good deal of thought to the great length of this collection, though it was always understood that it would be more than one volume. I would have preferred it shorter; but there is, I think, no way to accomplish that that does not strike at the heart of the basic conception of this enterprise from the beginning: that all of the substantial Anti-Federal pieces should be made available in their entirety and in an accurate text. Some of the most important series of essays, such as Centinel, and the Letters from The Federal Farmer, and Brutus, and A [Maryland] Farmer, are very long. There is no possibility of omitting these or of abridging them without destroying a prime value of the collection. Some cuts could be made among shorter pieces, but the gain in space would not compensate for the loss in variety and comprehensiveness. I have rejected two further possibilities for some cutting, neither of them very significant quantitatively, but I would be glad for readers' reactions. First, my introductory outlines of the essays might be cut down or eliminated; but I think they are needed in a collection like this to provide assistance to the readers in finding their way through the material. Second, the last item, the long chapter from Mercy Warren's History . . . of the American Revolution, might be abridged. I did an abridgment, but I abandoned it because the full account seems to me a superb conclusion of the volume, providing the last statement, historically and intellectually, of Anti-Federalism.

Herbert J. Storing

ca. 1975

What the Anti-Federalists Were For

I
Introduction

The Constitution of the United States was viewed by the founding generation as distinctive, even unique, in the extent to which it was the product of deliberation. Most previous foundings seemed to have been the result of chance or the edict of one all-powerful man. But the United States Constitution was framed by a numerous and diverse body of statesmen, sitting for over three months; it was widely, fully, and vigorously debated in the country at large; and it was adopted by (all things considered) a remarkably open and representative procedure. Viewed in this light, those who opposed the Constitution must be seen as playing an indispensable if subordinate part in the founding process. They contributed to the dialogue of the American founding. To take only the most obvious case, the Constitution that came out of the deliberations of 1787 and 1788 was not the same Constitution that went in; for it was accepted subject to the understanding that it would be amended immediately to provide for a bill of rights. Moreover, the founding of a nation does not end with the making of a constitution. The Constitution did settle many questions, and it established a lasting structure of rules and principles—we do not adopt the current cant that fundamental law is shapeless stuff to be formed at will by future generations. But it did not settle everything; it did not finish the task of making the American polity. The political life of the community continues to be a dialogue, in which the Anti-Federalist concerns and principles still play an important part.

The Anti-Federalists are entitled, then, to be counted among the Founding Fathers, in what is admittedly a somewhat paradoxical sense, and to share in the honor and the study devoted to the founding. In general, however, they have not enjoyed such a position. Champions of a negative and losing cause, they have found only a cramped place in the shadow of the great constitutional accomplishment of 1787. They have often been presented as narrow-minded local politicians, unwilling to face the utter inadequacy of the Articles of Confederation or incapable of seeing beyond the boundaries of their own states or localities. They have been described as men without principle, willing to use any argument to drag down the Constitution, yet willing, many of them, when the Constitution was adopted, to change their colors and become enthusiastic Federalists.[1] It is true that with the rise of the Beardian critique of the Constitution and its framers, the Anti-Federalists have been viewed with a more friendly eye. Merrill Jensen has taught us to take seriously the possibility that the Anti-Federalists were right about the need for only modest changes in the Articles of Confederation and about the departure of the Constitution from the principles of the Revolution. He has inspired a full historical account of the Anti-Federal movement, and he has pointed to the need to take up the serious study of Anti-Federal thought. At the same time, the harsh edges of Beardian analysis have been worn away, and we are now in a position to consider afresh the class differences involved in the constitutional controversy, freed of many of the Beardian excesses.[2] Yet valuable as all of this has been, the corrected Beardian eye betrays still its original squint. It tends to see simple democratic agrarians among the Anti-Federalists as it tends to see self-seeking commercial oligarchs among the Federalists.[3] There is some basis for these views, but the picture is thin and distorted. Indeed, one of the few substantial accounts of Anti-Federal thought is a persuasive refutation of the Beardian thesis as applied to the Anti-Federalists and an attempt to show that the Anti-Federalists were in fact "men of little faith" in American national self-government.[4] Gordon Wood has added greatly to our understanding of the Anti-Federalists in his rich and encyclopedic account of the American founding and the way the Americans gradually blundered into a new political theory. Deep and lucid as his insights often are, however, Wood is finally less interested in understanding the Anti-Federalists (or the Federalists) as they understood themselves than in exposing the deeper social forces from which the whole sphere of "ideology," to use Bailyn's term, is derivative. Thus a debate that was for the Anti-Federalists fundamentally political becomes for Wood fundamentally sociological.[5]

There has been no sustained, comprehensive attempt to examine the thought, the principles, the argument of the Anti-Federalists, as they were understood by the Anti-Federalists themselves and by the other men of that time. Such an examination will be undertaken here. The aim will not be a history of the Anti-Federal movement or an analysis of its economic, sociological, or psychological underpinnings. We shall try to avoid presupposing some external set of questions or framework of analysis. Rather, we shall try to proceed from inside Anti-Federal thought, seeing the questions as they saw them, following the arguments as they made them. We shall explore the different levels of Anti-Federal theorizing, working our way critically through and if necessary beyond them, but always with the idea that the Anti-Federalists may have something to teach. Because the American founding took the form of a debate or dialogue, Anti-Federal thought is best examined within the movement and different levels of that dialogue. For this reason it will be necessary to take some note of the Federalist as well as the Anti-Federalist side of the debate, but the purpose is to present only so much of what the Anti-Federalists were against as is necessary to understand what they were for.

In beginning with the question of what the Anti-Federalists were for, we are not, it must be admitted, adhering to the aim of presenting the Anti-Federalist argument as it presented itself. The Anti-Federalists were primarily against the Constitution. We do remain true to our aim in a deeper and more significant sense, however, because the Anti-Federalists themselves understood their negative conclusions about the Constitution to be derived from a positive political theory or set of political principles.*[6] The aim, then, will be to give a sympathetic, critical, and full account of the fundamental Anti-Federal position.

Was there, however, a single Anti-Federal position? In the most obvious sense there surely was not. The Federalists claimed that the opposers of the Constitution could not agree among themselves, that they shared no common principles, that their arguments canceled each other out. This is an exaggeration, for there was more agreement about many points of opposition to the Constitution than might appear at first glance.[7] Yet it is not possible to read far among the Anti-Federal writings without being struck by an extraordinary heterogeneity. It would be difficult to find a single point about which all of the Anti-Federalists agreed. They did not, finally, even agree unanimously in opposing the adoption of the Constitution. Many favored adoption if amendments could be secured; and others finally accepted the Constitution, even without a guarantee of amendment, as the best of the available choices. There is in fact no hard and fast way of even identifying "Anti-Federalists." Some men, notably Edmund Randolph, were Federalist and Anti-Federalist at different times. Moderate or lukewarm adherents to either side were often almost indistinguishable from one another. Moreover, the specific points of disagreement and the reasons given by the Anti-Federalists were various and even contradictory. This is not to say that the Federalists were in much better condition. There is an impression of greater unity here because the Federalists were (in general) unified in supporting the Constitution, although some Federal reservations are scarcely distinguishable from Anti-Federal objections. That impression has been strengthened by the Federalists' victory and by the massive impact on later generations of The Federalist papers, which have tended to occupy the Federalist stage and lend their unity to the whole group supporting the Constitution.*[8] There were in fact diverse and contradictory opinions among the Federalists just as there were among their opponents.

If the Federalists and Anti-Federalists were divided among themselves, they were, at a deeper level, united with one another. Their disagreements were not based on different premises about the nature of man or the ends of political life. They were not the deep cleavages of contending regimes. They were the much less sharp and clear-cut differences within the family, as it were, of men agreed that the purpose of government is the regulation and thereby the protection of individual rights and that the best instrument for this purpose is some form of limited, republican government. It is their common ground that explains, to a large extent, the relatively unclear line between the two camps and the diversity within each of them. This is not to say that the differences are negligible, as those would argue who claim that there is no basic political controversy or political theorizing in the United States.[9] The differences are limited, but they are nevertheless substantial and well formed. The nation was born in consensus but it lives in controversy, and the main lines of that controversy are well-worn paths leading back to the founding debate.

*References to substantive notes are accompanied by an asterisk.

In searching for the underlying unity in the Anti-Federal position we are not tabulating the frequency of different arguments. We are looking not for what is common so much as for what is fundamental. We might well find the foundations laid in a very few writings, even a single one. Thus, on the Federalist side, a James Madison is more important in this kind of quest than a Tench Coxe, not because he is more typical or more influential in a direct sense but because he sees farther or better. He can explain more. The same is true on the Anti-Federal side of The Federal Farmer, Brutus, and such little known writers as A [Maryland] Farmer and The Impartial Examiner. Not all of these men were widely read, and some of them made arguments that were uncommon; but they explored or at least exposed the theoretical ground that most other Anti-Federalists took for granted.

Proceeding in this way, clearing our path through the superficial tangle, dealing as well as we can with the patches of obscurity and looseness we find in even the best Anti-Federal thinkers, we shall discover a set of principles that is a good deal clearer and more coherent, and also more relevant to an understanding of the American founding and the American polity, than has usually been supposed. But we shall also find, at the very heart of the Anti-Federal position, a dilemma or a tension. This is the critical weakness of Anti-Federalist thought and at the same time its strength and even its glory. For the Anti-Federalists could neither fully reject nor fully accept the leading principles of the Constitution. They were indeed open to Hamilton's scornful charge of trying to reconcile contradictions.[10] This is the element of truth in Cecelia Kenyon's characterization of them as men of little faith. They did not fail to see the opportunity for American nationhood that the Federalists seized so gloriously, but they could not join in grasping it. They doubted; they held back; they urged second thoughts. This was, however, not a mere failure of will or lack of courage. They had reasons, and the reasons have weight. They thought—and it cannot easily be denied—that this great national opportunity was profoundly problematical, that it could be neither grasped nor let alone without risking everything. The Anti-Federalists were committed to both union and the states; to both the great American republic and the small, self-governing community; to both commerce and civic virtue; to both private gain and public good. At its best, Anti-Federal thought explores these tensions and points to the need for any significant American political thought to confront them; for they were not resolved by the Constitution but are inherent in the principles and traditions of American political life.

2
Conservatives

One of the striking and, to many readers, surprising aspects of the debate over the Constitution is the conservative posture of the opposition. The Anti-Federalists did not deny the need for some change, but they were on the whole defenders of the status quo. They deplored departures of the Constitution from "the good old way" or "the antient and established usage of the commonwealth." They shook their heads at "the phrenzy of innovation" sweeping the country: "The framing entirely new systems, is a work that requires vast attention; and it is much easier to guard an old one." They warned that constant change would leave Americans "always young in government."[1] Some expressed the primitive conservative view that whatever is old is good. Others revealed profound (but seldom explored) misgivings about the modern political principles on which the Constitution was so wholeheartedly based.*[2] Ordinarily, however, their conservatism was neither so shallow nor so deep. In the main, they saw in the Framers' easy thrusting aside of old forms and principles threats to four cherished values: to law, to political stability, to the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and to federalism.

The Anti-Federalists often objected even to entering into debate on the Constitution because of legal irregularities in the proceedings of the Philadelphia Convention. They argued that that Convention had been authorized "for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation," and had no right to propose any radical change in the government of the Union.[3] While not invincible, this argument is very powerful; but it became less pertinent every day simply because the Constitution was in fact before the people and its merits under discussion. The threshold had been crossed, and the Anti-Federalists had little choice but to follow the Federalists over it. But there were other legal objections. The Convention proposed that Congress and the state legislatures should be bypassed in favor of special ratifying conventions and that the Constitution should come into effect when nine states ratified. For neither of these proposals was there any legal basis. They ran counter to Congress's commission to the Convention, and they violated the mode of amendment established in the Articles of Confederation.

The proposals of the Framers were self-defeating in their casual disregard of the forms of legality: "the same reasons which you now urge for destroying our present federal government, may be urged for abolishing the system which you now propose to adopt; and as the method prescribed by the articles of confederation is now totally disregarded by you, as little regard may be shewn by you to the rules prescribed for the amendment of the new system. . . ." "Charters," Rawlins Lowndes warned, "ought to be considered as sacred things. . . ." The Anti-Federalists saw in the proceedings and proposals of the Philadelphia Convention a threat to that "publick faith and confidence," which "bind[s] and cement[s] the community" and "establish[es] them as a body politick."[4] Of course the Anti-Federalists agreed that the people have a right to alter their governments; but they insisted that any revolution (including the one most of them had proudly aided) must be secured by an initially fragile political stability. They criticized the Federalists, in typical conservative fashion, for threatening this precious stability. "The late revolution having effaced in a great measure all former habits, and the present institutions are so recent, that there exists not that great reluctance to innovation, so remarkable in old communities, and which accords with reason, for the most comprehensive mind cannot foresee the full operation of material changes on civil polity. . . ." Hasty and blind adoption of government will lead to hasty and blind alterations, "and changes must ensue, one after another, till the peaceable and better part of the community will grow weary with changes, tumults and disorders, and be disposed to accept any government, however despotic, that shall promise stability and firmness."[5]

Far from straying from the principles of the American Revolution, as some of the Federalists accused them of doing,[6] the Anti-Federalists saw themselves as the true defenders of those principles. "I am fearful," said Patrick Henry, "I have lived long enough to become an old fashioned fellow: Perhaps an invincible attachment to the dearest rights of man, may, in these refined enlightened days, be deemed old fashioned: If so, I am contented to be so: I say, the time has been, when every pore of my heart beat for American liberty, and which, I believe, had a counterpart in the breast of every true American."[7] The Anti-Federalists argued, as some historians have argued since, that the Articles of Confederation were the constitutional embodiment of the principles on which the Revolution was based:

> Sir, I venerate the spirit with which every thing was done at the trying time in which the Confederation was formed. America had then a sufficiency of this virtue to resolve to resist perhaps the first nation in the universe, even unto bloodshed. What was her aim? Equal liberty and safety. What ideas had she of this equal liberty? Read them in her Articles of Confederation.[8]

The innovators were impatient to change this "most excellent constitution," which was "sent like a blessing from heaven," for a constitution "essentially differing from the principles of the revolution, and from freedom," and thus destructive of the whole basis of the American community. "Instead of repairing the old and venerable fabrick, which sheltered the United States, from the dreadful and cruel storms of a tyrannical British ministry, they built a stately palace after their own fancies. . . ."[9]

The principal characteristic of that "venerable fabrick" was its federalism: the Articles of Confederation established a league of sovereign and independent states whose representatives met in congress to deal with a limited range of common concerns in a system that relied heavily on voluntary cooperation. Federalism means that the states are primary, that they are equal, and that they possess the main weight of political power. The defense of the federal character of the American union was the most prominent article of Anti-Federalist conservative doctrine. While some of the other concerns were intrinsically more fundamental, the question of federalism was central and thus merits fuller discussion here, as it did in that debate.

To begin with an apparently small terminological problem, if the Constitution was opposed because it was anti-federal how did the opponents come to be called Anti-Federalists? They usually denied, in fact, that the name was either apt or just, and seldom used it themselves. They were, they often claimed, the true federalists. Some of them seemed to think that their proper name had been filched, while their backs were turned, as it were, by the pro-Constitution party, which refused to give it back; and versions of this explanation have been repeated by historians.[10] Unquestionably the Federalists saw the advantage of a label that would suggest that those who opposed the Constitution also opposed such a manifestly good thing as federalism. But what has not been sufficiently understood is that the term "federal" had acquired a specific ambiguity that enabled the Federalists not merely to take but to keep the name.

One of the perennial issues under the Articles of Confederation involved the degree to which the general government—or the instrumentality of the federation per se—was to be supported or its capacity to act strengthened. In this context one was "federal" or "anti-federal" according to his willingness or unwillingness to strengthen or support the institutions of the federation. This was James Wilson's meaning when he spoke of the "fœderal disposition and character" of Pennsylvania. It was Patrick Henry's meaning when he said that, in rejecting the Constitution, New Hampshire and Rhode Island "have refused to become federal." It was the meaning of the New York Assembly when in responding coolly to the recommendations of the Annapolis Convention it nevertheless insisted on its "truly federal" disposition.[11] This usage had thoroughly penetrated political discussion in the United States. In the straightforward explanation of Anti-Federalist George Bryan, "The name of Federalists, or Federal men, grew up at New York and in the eastern states, some time before the calling of the Convention, to denominate such as were attached to the general support of the United States, in opposition to those who preferred local and particular advantages.

. . ." Later, according to Bryan, "this name was taken possession of by those who were in favor of the new federal government, as they called it, and opposers were called Anti-Federalists."[12] Recognizing the pre-1787 usage, Jackson Turner Main tries, like Bryan, to preserve the spirit of Federalist larceny by suggesting that during the several years before 1787 "the men who wanted a strong national government, who might more properly be called 'nationalists,' began to appropriate the term 'federal' for themselves" and to apply the term "antifederal" to those hostile to the measures of Congress and thus presumably unpatriotic.*[13] But there was nothing exceptional or improper in the use of the term "federal" in this way; the shift in meaning was less an "appropriation" than a natural extension of the language, which the Federalists fully exploited.

The point of substance is that the Federalists had a legitimate claim to their name and therefore to their name for their opponents. Whether they had a better claim than their opponents cannot be answered on the basis of mere linguistic usage but only by considering the arguments. When, during the years of the Confederation, one was called a "federal man," his attachment to the principles of federalism was not at issue; that was taken for granted, and the point was that he was a man who (given this federal system) favored strengthening the "federal" or general authority. The ambiguity arose because strengthening the federal authority could be carried so far as to undermine the federal principle; and that was precisely what the Anti-Federalists claimed their opponents were doing.[14] Thus The Impartial Examiner argued that, despite the "sound of names" on which the advocates of the Constitution "build their fame," it is the opponents who act "on the broader scale of true fœderal principles." They desire "a continuance of each distinct sovereignty—and are anxious for such a degree of energy in the general government, as will cement the union in the strongest manner."[15] It was possible (or so the Anti-Federalists believed) to be a federalist in the sense of favoring a strong agency of the federation and, at the same time, to be a federalist in the sense of adhering to the principle of a league of independent states.[16] In the name of federalism in the former sense, it was claimed, the proponents of the Constitution had abandoned federalism in the latter (and fundamental) sense.

The Anti-Federalists stood, then, for federalism in opposition to what they called the consolidating tendency and intention of the Constitution—the tendency to establish one complete national government, which would destroy or undermine the states.[17] They feared the implications of language like Washington's reference, in transmitting the Constitution to Congress, to the need for "the consolidation of our Union."[18] They saw ominous intentions in Publius' opinion that "a NATION, without a NATIONAL GOVERNMENT, is, in my view, an awful spectacle."[19] They resented and denied suggestions that "we must forget our local habits and attachments" and "be reduced to one faith and one government."[20] They saw in the new Constitution a government with authority extending "to every case that is of the least importance"[21] and capable of acting (preeminently in the crucial case of taxation) at discretion and independently of any agency but its own. Instead of thus destroying the federal character of the Union, "the leading feature of every amendment" of the Articles of Confederation ought to be, as Yates and Lansing expressed it, "the preservation of the individual states, in their uncontrouled constitutional rights, and . . . in reserving these, a mode might have been devised of granting to the confederacy, the monies arising from a general system of revenue; the power of regulating commerce, and enforcing the observance of foreign treaties, and other necessary matters of less moment."[22]

A few of the Anti-Federalists were not sure, it is true, that consolidation would be so bad, if it were really feasible. James Monroe went so far as to say that "to collect the citizens of America, who have fought and bled together, by whose joint and common efforts they have been raised to the comparatively happy and exalted theatre on which they now stand; to lay aside all those jarring interests and discordant principles, which state legislatures if they do not create, certainly foment and increase, arrange them under one government and make them one people, is an idea not only elevated and sublime, but equally benevolent and humane."[23] And, on the other hand, most of the Federalists agreed or professed to agree that consolidation was undesirable. Fisher Ames, defending the Constitution in Massachusetts, spoke the language of many Federalists when he insisted that "too much provision cannot be made against a consolidation. The state governments represent the wishes, and feelings, and local interests of the people. They are the safeguard and ornament of the Constitution; they will protract the period of our liberties; they will afford a shelter against the abuse of power, and will be the natural avengers of our violated rights."*[24] Indeed, expressions of rather strict federal principles were not uncommon on the Federalist side, although they were often perfunctory or shallow.

Perhaps the most conciliatory Federalist defense of federalism, and not accidentally one of the least satisfactory in principle, was contained in a line of argument put forward by James Wilson and some others to the effect that, just as individuals have to give up some of their natural rights to civil government to secure peaceful enjoyment of civil rights, so states must give up some of theirs to federal government in order to secure peaceful enjoyment of federal liberties.[25] But the analogy of civil liberty and federal liberty concedes the basic Anti-Federal contentions, and Wilson did not consistently adhere to it.[26] As each individual has one vote in civil society, for example, so each state ought, on this analogy, to have one vote in federal society. As the preservation of the rights of individuals is the object of civil society, so the preservation of the rights of states (not individuals) ought to be the object of federal society.[27] But these are Anti-Federal conclusions. Thus, when Agrippa assessed the proposed Constitution from the point of view of the interests of Massachusetts, he did so on principled ground, the same ground that properly leads any man to consider the civil society of which he is or may become a member, not exclusively but first and last, from the point of view of his interest in his life, liberty, and property.[28] Wilson, on the other hand, argued for the priority of the general interest of the Union over the particular interests of the states. And this position is not defensible—as Wilson's own argument sufficiently demonstrates—on the basis of the federal liberty–civil liberty analogy.*[29]

The more characteristic Federalist position was to deny that the choice lay between confederation and consolidation and to contend that in fact the Constitution provided a new form, partly national and partly federal. This was Publius' argument in The Federalist, no. 39. It was Madison's argument in the Virginia ratifying convention. And it was the usual argument of James Wilson himself, who emphasized the strictly limited powers of the general government and the essential part to be played in it by the states.[30] The Anti-Federalists objected that all such arguments foundered on the impossibility of dual sovereignty. "It is a solecism in politics for two co-ordinate sovereignties to exist together. . . ." A mixture may exist for a time, but it will inevitably tend in one direction or the other, subjecting the country in the meantime to "all the horrors of a divided sovereignty."[31] Luther Martin agreed with Madison that the new Constitution presented a novel mixture of federal and national elements; but he found it "just so much federal in appearance as to give its advocates in some measure, an opportunity of passing it as such upon the unsuspecting multitude, before they had time and opportunity to examine it, and yet so predominantly national as to put it in the power of its movers, whenever the machine shall be set agoing, to strike out every part that has the appearance of being federal, and to render it wholly and entirely a national government."[32]

The first words of the preamble sufficiently declare the anti-federal (in the strict sense) character of the Constitution, Patrick Henry thought; and his objection thundered over the Virginia convention sitting in Richmond:

> [W]hat right had they to say, We, the People? My political curiosity, exclusive of my anxious solicitude for the public welfare, leads me to ask, who authorised them to speak the language of, We, the People, instead of We, the States? States are the characteristics, and the soul of a confederation. If the States be not the agents of this compact, it must be one great consolidated National Government of the people of all the States.[33]

The clearest minds among the Federalists agreed that states are the soul of a confederacy. That is what is wrong with confederacies: "The fundamental principle of the old Confederation is defective; we must totally eradicate and discard this principle before we can expect an efficient government."*[34]

Here lies the main significance of the mode of ratification in the proposed Constitution. The new procedure—ratification by special state conventions rather than by Congress and the state legislatures and provision that the Constitution shall be established on ratification of nine states (as between them), rather than all thirteen states as required under the Articles of Confederation—was not merely illegal; it struck at the heart of the old Confederation. It denied, as Federalists like Hamilton openly admitted, the very basis of legality under the Articles of Confederation. The requirement in the Articles of Confederation for unanimous consent of the states to constitutional changes rested on the assumption that the states are the basic political entities, permanently associated indeed, but associated entirely at the will and in the interest of each of the several states.*[35] Even if it were granted that government under the Articles had collapsed (which most Anti-Federalists did not grant), there was no justification for abandoning the principles of state equality and unanimous consent to fundamental constitutional change. As William Paterson had put it in the Philadelphia Convention,

> If we argue the matter on the supposition that no Confederacy at present exists, it cannot be denied that all the States stand on the footing of equal sovereignty. All therefore must concur before any can be bound. . . . If we argue on the fact that a federal compact actually exists, and consult the articles of it we still find an equal Sovereignty to be the basis of it.[36]

Whether in the Articles of Confederation or outside, the essential principle of American union was the equality of the states. As Luther Martin had argued in Philadelphia, "the separation from G. B. placed the 13 States in a state of nature towards each other; [and] they would have remained in that state till this time, but for the confederation. . . ."[37]

The provision for ratifying the Constitution rested, in the main, on the contrary assumption that the American states are not several political wholes, associated together according to their several wills and for the sake of their several interests, but are, and always were from the moment of their separation from the King of England, parts of one whole. Thus constitutional change is the business of the people, not of the state legislatures, though the people act in (or through) their states.[38] As one nation divided into several states, moreover, constitutional change is to be decided, not by unanimous consent of separate and equal entities, but by the major part of a single whole—an extraordinary majority because of the importance of the question.[39] The Federalists contended that the colonies declared their independence not individually but unitedly, and that they had never been independent of one another.[40] And the implication of this view is that the foundation of government in the United States is the interest of the nation and not the interests of the states. "The Union is essential to our being as a nation. The pillars that prop it are crumbling to powder," said Fisher Ames, staggering through a metaphorical forest. "The Union is the vital sap that nourishes the tree."[41] The Articles of Confederation, in this view, were a defective instrument of a preexisting union.[42] The congressional resolution calling for the Philadelphia Convention had described a means—"for the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation"—and an end—to "render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of Government & the preservation of the Union."[43] If there was any conflict, the means ought to be sacrificed to the end. The duty of the Philadelphia Convention and the members of the ratifying conventions was to take their bearings, not from the defective means, but from the great end, the preservation and well-being of the Union.*[44]

This view of the matter takes the debate beyond a consideration of legality or status quo, because the Federalists argued that what appeared to be legally or traditionally right was wrong when viewed in the light of the end of that law or tradition. The result was to force the Anti-Federalists, as it forced the opponents of strong national government in the Philadelphia Convention, to higher ground. It became necessary to consider the questions, what are the ends of the government of the Union, what are the ends of the governments of the states, and what is the proper relation between these ends and therefore between these governments?

3
The Small Republic

The Anti-Federalists' defense of federalism and of the primacy of the states rested on their belief that there was an inherent connection between the states and the preservation of individual liberty, which is the end of any legitimate government. Robert Whitehill of Pennsylvania, for example, feared that the proposed Constitution would be "the means of annihilating the constitutions of the several States, and consequently the liberties of the people. . . ."[1] "We are come hither," Patrick Henry urged his fellow Virginians, "to preserve the poor Commonwealth of Virginia, if it can be possibly done; Something must be done to preserve your liberty and mine."[2] The states have to be preserved because they are the natural homes of individual liberty. As Luther Martin had argued in Philadelphia:

> At the separation from the British Empire, the people of America preferred the Establishment of themselves into thirteen separate sovereignties instead of incorporating themselves into one: to these they look up for the security of their lives, liberties, & properties: to these they must look up—The federal Govt. they formed, to defend the whole agst. foreign nations, in case of war, and to defend the lesser States agst. the ambition of the larger. . . .[3]

The governments instituted to secure the rights spoken of by the Declaration of Independence are the state governments. They do the primary business that governments are supposed to do. The government of the Union supplements the state governments, especially by giving them an external strength that none of them could manage on its own. But in principle the general government is subordinate to the state governments.

Why must the essential business of government be done by governmental units like the states? Primarily this was, in the Anti-Federalist view, a question of size. It was thought to have been demonstrated, historically and theoretically, that free, republican governments could extend only over a relatively small territory with a homogeneous population.*[4] Even among the states this rule was evident, for "the largest States are the Worst Governed."[5] One problem is that in large, diverse states many significant differences in condition, interest, and habit have to be ignored for the sake of uniform administration. Yet no genuine equality of government is possible in such a large state. The capital city, to take the prime example, will be close to some parts of the large state, but it will be remote, in every relevant sense, from the extremities.[6] A national government would be compelled to impose a crude uniform rule on American diversity, which would in fact result in hardship and inequity for many parts of the country.

Behind the administrative defects of a large republic lie three fundamental considerations, bearing on the kind of government needed in a free society. Only a small republic can enjoy a voluntary attachment of the people to the government and a voluntary obedience to the laws. Only a small republic can secure a genuine responsibility of the government to the people. Only a small republic can form the kind of citizens who will maintain republican government. These claims are central to the Anti-Federalist position.*[7]

It should be noted at the outset that there is a complication in the practical conclusions drawn from these considerations. Assuming the soundness of the case for the small republic and assuming that nothing but republican government is to be seriously considered for the United States, the obvious conclusion is that no attempt should be made to extend a single republican government over the whole United States. But if one republican government over the whole United States should nevertheless be unavoidable, despite serious disadvantages, then the Anti-Federalist arguments for the small republic serve the practical purpose of revealing and helping to minimize these disadvantages. Cognizance of the advantages of the small republic may be helpful in avoiding the worst disadvantages of a large one. In the discussion that follows we shall be meeting both kinds of arguments. Some defend the idea of the small republic simply; others (drawn from the same theoretical source) aim to improve or mitigate the dangers of the large republic that American circumstances seemed to require. The different kinds of arguments will be clear enough as we go along, but both the distinction and the common source should be kept in mind.

The dependence of any republican government on the confidence of the people was one of the reasons given by the nationalists in the Constitutional Convention, notably James Wilson, for resting the general government directly on the people. Wilson "was for raising the federal pyramid to a considerable altitude, and for that reason wished to give it as broad a basis as possible. No government could long subsist without the confidence of the people. In a republican Government this confidence was peculiarly essential."[8] The Anti-Federalists emphatically endorsed this principle. "The great object of a free people," The Federal Farmer argued, "must be so to form their government and laws, and so to administer them, as to create a confidence in, and respect for the laws; and thereby induce the sensible and virtuous part of the community to declare in favor of the laws, and to support them without an expensive military force."*[9] But the Anti-Federalists denied that the simple expedient of having the people elect federal representatives was enough to secure their attachment. In a large republic the people "will have no confidence in their legislature, suspect them of ambitious views, be jealous of every measure they adopt, and will not support the laws they pass."[10] Both reason and experience prove,

Richard Henry Lee wrote, that so extensive and various a territory as the United States "cannot be governed in freedom" except in a confederation of states. Within each state, "opinion founded on the knowledge of those who govern, procures obedience without force. But remove the opinion, which must fall with a knowledge of characters in so widely extended a country, and force then becomes necessary to secure the purposes of civil government. . . ." The general rule is that government must exist, if not by persuasion, then by force.[11] In a large empire standing armies are necessary "to cure the defect of the laws" and to take the place of popular confidence in and respect for the government.[12]

The second characteristic of the small republic is its capacity to ensure a strict responsibility of the government to the people. In a direct democracy, responsibility is ensured by the absence of much differentiation between the people and their government. However, most of the Anti-Federalists admitted the need, under American conditions at least, for a system of representation as a substitute for the meeting together of all the citizens.[13] The problem, then, was to keep the representatives responsible, in the rather narrow meaning of that term, that is, directly answerable to and dependent on their constituents.[14] This is the reason for the concern with short terms of office, frequent rotation, and a numerous representation.[15] The Anti-Federalists understood, however, that such devices are insufficient. Effective and thoroughgoing responsibility is to be found only in a likeness between the representative body and the citizens at large. Thus "a full and equal representation is that which possesses the same interests, feelings, opinions, and views the people themselves would were they all assembled. . . ." According to Melancton Smith, representatives "should be a true picture of the people; possess the knowledge of their circumstances and their wants; sympathize in all their distresses, and be disposed to seek their true interests."[16] This describes the state legislatures reasonably well, it was claimed, but the federal legislature could not even come close to being representative in this genuine sense, at least not without a sharp increase in its number. Federal elections will present the voters with a choice among representatives of the well-known few, or the "natural aristocracy" as the Anti-Federalists often called them.*[17] "It is deceiving a people to tell them they are electors, and can chuse their legislators, if they cannot, in the nature of things, chuse men from among themselves, and genuinely like themselves."[18]

What is wanted in a representative system is not "brilliant talents" but "a sameness, as to residence and interests, between the representative and his constituents." No great talents are necessary for government, and the men of great abilities are, on the whole, a danger rather than a benefit to a republic.[19] If, however, the Anti-Federalists distrusted "great abilities," they were willing to admit that "sameness" in a representative body is not literally possible. Every representative body is more aristocratic than the body of the people by whom it is chosen,[20] and any representative body covering the whole United States would inevitably be highly selective. Here the argument shifts from the desirability of the small republic to the mitigation of the evils of the large one.[21] Given the need, especially in the general government, for some considerable compromise of the principle of sameness, the Anti-Federalists' secondary, more practical goal was a representation large enough to secure a substantial (if not proportionate) representation of the middling classes, in particular the sturdy yeomanry. This view was based not on a presumption of intrinsic superiority in the yeoman but on the political consequences of his peculiar situation. Melancton Smith gave the Anti-Federalist argument in his classic confrontation with Alexander Hamilton on the subject of representation.

> The same passions and prejudices govern all men. The circumstances in which men are placed in a great measure give a cast to the human character. Those in middling circumstances, have less temptation—they are inclined by habit and the company with whom they associate, to set bounds to their passions and appetites—if this is not sufficient, the want of means to gratify them will be a restraint—they are obliged to employ their time in their respective callings—hence the substantial yeomanry of the country are more temperate, of better morals, and less ambitious than the great. . . .When . . . this class in society pursue their own interest, they promote that of the public, for it is involved in it.[22]

All are agreed, Sydney argued, "that the rights and liberties of a country were ever in danger from the rich and poor, and their safety in the middle sort or yeomanry of the country. . . ."[23] An adequate representation of the middling classes serves, then, as a practical and effective substitute for a full representation of the people; for it does not require an excessively large body, and yet in pursuing their own interests the middling classes tend to pursue the interests of the public at large. However, the proposed House of Representatives failed not only the strict test of sameness but the looser test of adequate representation of the middling classes. Given the number of representatives and the proportion of representatives and people, few if any of the members of this class could expect to be elected.*[24] The Anti-Federalists generally saw this as an inherent deficiency of any nationwide government, yet, as we shall see, they accepted the need for such a government. If this was a contradiction it was not, they thought, due to any deficiency in their reasoning, for it lay at the heart of the American situation. The prudent course was to confine the contradiction to the narrowest possible scope by, on the one hand, making the representation in the first branch of the national legislature as full as circumstances permitted and, on the other hand, leaving as much of the power as possible in the states, where genuine responsibility could exist.

A related aspect of the question of responsibility concerned the much-discussed issue of jury trial, which it was alleged the Constitution would weaken or destroy. There is no need here to go into detail, but the crux of the objection lay in the political significance of the jury trial. While an adequate representation in at least one branch of the legislature was indispensable at the top, law-making, level, the jury trial provided the people's safeguard at the bottom, administrative, level. "Juries are constantly and frequently drawn from the body of the people, and freemen of the country; and by holding the jury's right to return a general verdict in all cases sacred, we secure to the people at large, their just and rightful controul in the judicial department."*[25] A [Maryland] Farmer argued, indeed, that the jury trial is more important than representation in the legislature, because "those usurpations, which silently undermine the spirit of liberty, under the sanction of law, are more dangerous than direct and open legislative attacks. . . ."[26] The main point, however, is that the democratic branch of the legislature and the jury trial are the means of effective and lawful popular control. They "are the means by which the people are let into the knowledge of public affairs—are enabled to stand as the guardians of each others rights, and to restrain, by regular and legal measures, those who otherwise might infringe upon them." The often extreme and apparently unfounded claims by the Anti-Federalists that the proposed Constitution would destroy the trial by jury should be seen against this background. The question was not fundamentally whether the lack of adequate provision for jury trial would weaken a traditional bulwark of individual rights (although that was also involved) but whether it would fatally weaken the role of the people in the administration of government.*[27]

The third part of the Anti-Federalist defense of the small republic concerned the kind of citizens a free republic needs. The Anti-Federalists emphasized repeatedly that the character of a people is affected by government and laws, but that that relation had been dangerously ignored in the framing of the proposed Constitution. In the words of Melancton Smith, "Government operates upon the spirit of the people, as well as the spirit of the people operates upon it—and if they are not conformable to each other, the one or the other will prevail. . . . Our duty is to frame a government friendly to liberty and the rights of mankind, which will tend to cherish and cultivate a love of liberty among our citizens." "If there are advantages," The Federal Farmer argued, "in the equal division of our lands, and the strong and manly habits of our people, we ought to establish governments calculated to give duration to them, and not governments which never can work naturally, till that equality of property, and those free and manly habits shall be destroyed; these evidently are not the natural basis of the proposed constitution."*[28]

A republican citizenry must be free and independent-minded, but it must also be homogeneous. "In a republic, the manners, sentiments, and interests of the people should be similar. If this be not the case, there will be a constant clashing of opinions; and the representatives of one part will be continually striving against those of the other. This will retard the operations of government, and prevent such conclusions as will promote the public good." Only within the relatively small communities formed by the individual states could such homogeneity be found. Given the variety of climates, productions, laws, and customs among the United States, a legislature formed of representatives from all parts of the country "would be composed of such heterogeneous and discordant principles, as would constantly be contending with each other."[29] The preservation of homogeneity required, for many of the Anti-Federalists, protection against foreign contamination. "To what purpose have you expended so freely the blood and treasures of this country? To have a government with unlimited powers administered by foreigners?"[30] Arguing that the general government should not be given the power to naturalize aliens, Agrippa pointed to the contrasting results of Pennsylvania's policy of open immigration and the eastern states' freedom from foreign mixture. Whereas Pennsylvania purchased her size and population at the expense of religion and good morals, "the eastern states have, by keeping separate from the foreign mixtures, acquired their present greatness in the course of a century and a half, and have preserved their religion and morals." At the same time they have preserved "that manly virtue which is equally fitted for rendering them respectable in war, and industrious in peace."[31]

Homogeneity implied, for the Anti-Federalists, not only likeness but likeness of a certain kind: a society in which there are no extremes of wealth, influence, education, or anything else—the homogeneity of a moderate, simple, sturdy, and virtuous people.[32] Republican government depends on civic virtue, on a devotion to fellow citizens and to country so deeply instilled as to be almost as automatic and powerful as the natural devotion to self-interest. Many Anti-Federalists joined Patrick Henry in praise of the Swiss, who "have retained their independence, republican simplicity and valour."[33] These qualities are encouraged in the restricted sphere of the small republic, which offers little inducement or opportunity for the exercise of divisive and corrupting talents and which daily reminds each man of the benefits derived from and the duties owed to his little community.

Wherever they looked in the new Constitution the Anti-Federalists saw threats to civic virtue. The federal city provided for would breed monarchical institutions and courtly habits, with their oppressive tendencies and with the effect "above all [of] the perpetual ridicule of virtue."[34] The standing army would be not only a potential instrument of oppression but a source of moral corruption. With interests and habits different from the rest of the community, a standing army "will inevitably sow the seeds of corruption and depravity of manners. Indolence will increase, and with it crimes cannot but increase. The springs of honesty will gradually grow lax, and chaste and severe manners be succeeded by those that are dissolute and vicious. When a standing army is kept up, virtue never thrives."[35] Commerce itself, the benefits of which were one of the major reasons for the American Union, seemed to threaten republican simplicity and virtue.[36] Commerce is the vehicle of distinctions in wealth, of foreign influence, and of the decline of morals. "As people become more luxurious, they become more incapacitated of governing themselves."[37] Anti-Federalists constantly complained of America's hankering after European luxury. They agreed generally with John Adams that "frugality is a great revenue, besides curing us of vanities, levities, and fopperies, which are real antidotes to all great, manly, and warlike virtues."[38]

Implicit in all of these opinions relating to republican citizenship is a concern with civic education, broadly conceived. Mercy Warren, who saw as deeply into this question as any of her contemporaries, flirted with the isolationism that tempted many of the Anti-Federalists. Could the pure republican spirit of the Americans be preserved, she reflected, by walling the country off from European luxury, on the one hand, and western empire on the other? It could not. However high the walls of separation, the fingers of avarice and ambition would find their ways through or around them. The danger to the republican spirit of America was illustrated by American attraction to European luxury and skepticism; but the source of the danger was not external. It lay, as it always lies, in the restless ambition and avarice in the heart of every man and every people; and that is where it must be met, principally by education. "[I]f the education of youth, both public and private, is attended to, their industrious and economical habits maintained, their moral character and that assemblage of virtues supported, which is necessary for the happiness of individuals and of nations, there is not much danger that they will for a long time be subjugated by the arms of foreigners, or that their republican system will be subverted by the arts of domestic enemies."[39] A few Anti-Federalists made specific proposals. Thus A [Maryland] Farmer proposed the establishment of local "seminaries of useful learning, with professorships of political and domestic œconomy." The citizens should be instructed not in "the philosophy of the moon and skies," but in "what is useful in this world—the principles of free government, illustrated by the history of mankind—the sciences of morality, agriculture, commerce, the management of farms and household affairs." If this were done in a short time "the people instead of abusing, would wade up to their knees in blood, to defend their governments."[40] More often the Anti-Federalist thought of the whole organization of the polity as having an educative function. The small republic was seen as a school of citizenship as much as a scheme for government. An important part—much more important than we are today likely to remember—of their argument for a federal bill of rights was the educative function of such a document in reminding the citizen of the ends of civil government and in strengthening his attachment to it. The provisions of a bill of rights "can inspire and conserve the affection for the native country, they will be the first lesson of the young citizens becoming men, to sustain the dignity of their being. . . ."[41]

Finally, many Anti-Federalists were concerned with the maintenance of religious conviction as a support of republican government. "Refiners may weave as fine a web of reason as they please, but the experience of all times," Richard Henry Lee wrote to James Madison in 1784, "shews Religion to be the guardian of morals."[42] The opinions of men need to be formed "in favour of virtue and religion. . . ."[43] Religious support of political institutions is an old idea, and here again the Anti-Federalists tended to be the conservatives. The view was well expressed by an anonymous Massachusetts writer in 1787.[44] He explained that there are but three ways of controlling the "turbulent passions of mankind": by punishment; by reward; and "by prepossessing the people in favour of virtue by affording publick protection to religion." All are necessary, but especially the last. "[I]t is not more difficult to build an elegant house without tools to work with, than it is to establish a durable government without the public protection of religion." By 1787, however, the opinion seemed to be growing that organized religion could be dispensed with or taken for granted. This was, at any rate, the Anti-Federal reading of the situation. The indifference of the Constitution and its main defenders to organized religion was striking. In the words of Federalist writer Elihu, "the light of philosophy has arisen," and "mankind are no longer to be deluded with fable." "Making the glory of God subservient to the temporal interest of men, is a worn-out trick. . . ."[45] Anti-Federalists saw quite clearly the implications of such arguments and challenged them. They would have agreed with an anonymous Virginian who urged that steps be taken to revitalize religion: "Whatever influence speculative vanity may ascribe to the indefinite principle termed honor, or political refinement, to an artful collusion of interest, sound reason as well as experience proves that a due sense of responsibility to the Deity, as the author of those moral laws, an observance of which constitutes the happiness and welfare of societies as well as individuals, is the mean most likely to give a right direction to the conduct of mankind."[46] The Anti-Federalists feared that the Americans would follow the example of the Europeans as described by Mercy Warren: "Bent on gratification, at the expense of every moral tie, they have broken down the barriers of religion, and the spirit of infidelity is nourished at the fount; thence the poisonous streams run through every grade that constitutes the mass of nations." Warren insisted that skepticism is not, as some hold, necessarily fostered by republican liberty. Indeed, the history of republics is the history of strict regard to religion.[47]

It is less easy to say what concrete form the Anti-Federalists thought this concern with religion ought to take. They favored religious toleration and sometimes criticized the Constitution for the absence of protection of liberty of conscience; but this was assumed to mean, in practice, toleration of Christian (or only Protestant) sects and was rarely extended even in principle to the protection of professed atheists. They saw no inconsistency between liberty of conscience and the public support of the religious, and generally Protestant, community as the basis of public and private morality. Many Anti-Federalists supported and would even have strengthened the mild religious establishments that existed in some states. Richard Henry Lee wrote in 1784 that "he must be a very inattentive observer in our Country, who does not see that avarice is accomplishing the destruction of religion, for want of a legal obligation to contribute something to its support. The [Virginia] declaration of Rights, it seems to me, rather contends against forcing modes of faith and forms of worship, than against compelling contribution for the support of religion in general."[48] More generally, the Anti-Federalist position was not so much that government ought to foster religion as that the consolidating Constitution threatened the healthy religious situation as it then existed. The religious diversity of the whole United States seemed so great as to strain to breaking point any publicly useful religious foundation for the nation as a whole. Consolidation would require, then, substituting for religion some other foundation of political morality—which the Anti-Federalists foresaw would be an aggregate of selfish interests held together by force. This tendency would be strengthened by the absence from the Constitution of any religious test for officeholding, which seemed intended to further undermine the public significance of religious conviction.[49] The Constitution and its defenders deliberately turned away from religion as the foundation of civil institutions. Among the Anti-Federalists, on the other hand, there was a great deal of sympathy with views like those of Charles Turner: "without the prevalance of Christian piety and morals, the best republican Constitution can never save us from slavery and ruin." Turner hoped that the first Congress under the Constitution would recommend to the states the institution of such means of education "as shall be adequate to the divine, patriotick purpose of training up the children and youth at large, in that solid learning, and in those pious and moral principles, which are the support, the life and SOUL of republican government and liberty, of which a free Constitution is the body. . . ." He expressed a central Anti-Federal thought when he urged that the new rulers should turn their attention to the task, which surpasses the framing of constitutions, of fostering religion and morals, thereby making government less necessary by rendering "the people more capable of being a Law to themselves."[50] Such self-government was possible, however, only if the center of gravity of American government remained in the states.

4
Union

While the Anti-Federalists were concerned with individual liberty, which they thought depended on republican virtue, which in turn depended on maintaining the primacy of the states, they also wanted Union, to provide defense against foreign enemies, to promote and protect American commerce, and to maintain order among the states. "The first thing I have at heart is American liberty," Patrick Henry said; "the second thing is American Union. . . ." Melancton Smith "was as strongly impressed with the necessity of a Union, as any one could be: He would seek it with as much ardor." He was ready "to sacrifice every thing for a Union, except the liberties of his country, than which he could contemplate no greater misfortune." He hoped we were not reduced to the dreadful alternative of choosing one or the other.[1] The Anti-Federalists, like their opponents, spoke of the American "nation" or "country." They emphatically resisted the suggestion, which the Federalists tried to plant (with some but not much basis), that they were favorably disposed toward a breakup of the Union into separate confederacies.[2] Everyone agreed, Merrill Jensen has written, that the United States was a nation; "they disagreed as to whether the new nation should have a federal or a national government."[3] This is accurate enough so long as it is recognized that a debate over whether a nation should have a national government amounts to a debate over whether it shall be a nation. That at least is what the Federalists claimed, and the Anti-Federalists could scarcely deny it.*[4]

Generally the Anti-Federalists admitted that a more efficient federal government was needed, although they qualified this admission in a variety of ways. Some insisted that the true bond of union was a sense of mutual interest and mutual obligation, not governmental strength. The most elaborate version of this argument was presented by Agrippa, who rejected a consolidated American empire on the characteristic Anti-Federal grounds that we have already examined. A Union based on political power would result in debasement of the people and insecurity of rights. Must the states, then, separate?

This would be true if there was no principle to substitute in the room of power. Fortunately there is one. This is commerce. All the states have local advantages, and in a considerable degree separate interests. They are, therefore, in a situation to supply each other's wants. Carolina, for instance, is inhabited by planters, while the Massachusetts is more engaged in commerce and manufactures. Congress has the power of deciding their differences. The most friendly intercourse may therefore be established between them. A diversity of produce, wants and interests, produces commerce, and commerce, where there is a common, equal and moderate authority to preside, produces friendship.[5]

The same principle applies to the new settlers in the west. "Here then we have a bond of union which applies to all parts of the empire, and would continue to operate if the empire comprehended all America." The bond of Union is to be found not in political power but in a system of diverse but harmonious economic interests. Difficulty creeps in, however, when Agrippa admits the need for "a common, equal and moderate authority to preside" over the commercial intercourse. Congress must have the power to decide differences among the states. Thus it would appear that political power is, after all, a necessary condition of the bond of Union. Even granting this, however—and it can hardly be denied—Agrippa's formulation emphasizes the facilitating character of federal political power, in contrast to the governing power that seemed to be provided in the Constitution. The function of the presiding political authority ought to be merely to serve commercial intercourse among the states. On this basis Agrippa could suggest very limited augmentations of the power of the general government, augmentations kept from undue expansion by a clear view of the true bond of American Union, which is commercial intercourse based on mutual needs.*[6]

The basic difficulty with this argument is that it relies decisively on the voluntary recognition of mutual dependence. The Anti-Federalists were inclined to hope, with James Monroe, that, once a substantial (but still very limited) national government was established, "their constitutional demands, or requisitions, would be complied with."[7] But the futility of this hope was the greatest lesson of the history of the Articles of Confederation. It was precisely what had led the country into what Publius described as "the last stage of national humiliation." Engagements broken, debts unpaid, credit dried up, commerce stagnated, territory violated, remonstrances scorned—in short, Publius asked, "what indication is there of national disorder, poverty and insignificance that could befal a community so peculiarly blessed with natural advantages as we are, which does not form a part of the dark catalogue of our public misfortunes?"[8]

The Anti-Federalists tried to soften the stark outlines of the many pictures of this kind painted by the advocates of the Constitution. They tried to show that the circumstances of the United States were not so bad as they were described and that such evils as did exist were less the result of defects in the Articles of Confederation than of peculiar economic and political circumstances. Moreover, they alleged that the existing government had been deliberately weakened by Federalist criticism exaggerating both the urgency and the extent of the difficulties. In any case there was no reason to abandon ordinary prudence. "Is it probable, that we shall ever be in a situation, in which we can with more temper and greater safety, deliberate upon this momentous concern than at present?"*[9]

Yet while the Anti-Federalists objected to exaggerations of American troubles, at least equally striking is the extent to which they accepted the broad outlines of the picture painted by the friends of the Constitution. It is difficult to see how Forrest McDonald can describe Philadelphians in 1787 as "serenely unaware that historians were one day to know this as the Critical Period of American history. . . ."[10] Even if the Anti-Federalists had uniformly asserted that the country was prosperous and untroubled, they could hardly have been unaware of the persistent Federalist arguments to the contrary, in which the very phrase, "critical period," figured prominently.[11] But in fact the Anti-Federalists were less sanguine about the conditions of the country and the capacity of government under the Articles than some of their later apologists have been. The description of An Old Whig is not typical, but it is by no means unique: "we are not suffered to be the carriers of our own produce. . . . Our shipwrights are starved, our seamen driven abroad for want of employ, our timber left useless on our hands, our ironworks . . . now almost reduced to nothing, and our money banished from the country." These circumstances, following a loss of trade, "have justly alarmed us all. . . ."[12] "I know our situation is critical," wrote the most prominent and one of the most moderate of the Anti-Federalist pamphleteers, "and it behooves us to make the best of it."[13] If the alternative really had been to admit the proposed Constitution or "be left to our present weakness, confusion and distress," many Anti-Federalists would have agreed with An Old Whig and voted for the Constitution.[14] Few Anti-Federalists would in fact have objected to the designation of 1787 as the "critical period," and many used that or synonymous phrases.[15]

The Anti-Federalists did tend to argue that the difficulties experienced by the country were not mainly caused by an ineffective general government. Not stronger government but time and industry were needed to rectify the distresses following the war.[16] A distinction should be made, insisted Candidus, between the difficulties arising from the government and those arising from our own imprudence or unfavorable circumstances; and when this is done it will be seen that only modest governmental reform is necessary.[17] The true cause of American difficulties lay deeper than forms of government. "Unhappily for us, immediately after our extrication from a cruel and unnatural war, luxury and dissipation overran the country, banishing all that economy, frugality, and industry, which had been exhibited during the war."[18] As Richard Henry Lee wrote in the spring of 1787, "I fear it is more in vicious manners, than mistakes in form, that we must seek for the causes of the present discontent."[19] The analysis of Candidus is important and characteristic enough to quote at some length.

Upon the whole, we are too apt to charge those misfortunates to the want of energy in our government, which we have brought upon ourselves by dissipation and extravagance; and we are led to flatter ourselves, that the proposed Constitution will restore to us peace and happiness, notwithstanding we should neglect to acquire these blessings by industry and frugality.—I will venture to affirm, that the extravagance of our British importations,—the discouragement of our own manufactures, and the luxurious living of all ranks and degrees, have been the principal cause of all the evils we now experience; and a general reform in these particulars, would have a greater tendency to promote the welfare of these States, than any measures that could be adopted.—No government under heaven could have preserved a people from ruin, or kept their commerce from declining, when they were exhausting their valuable resources in paying for superfluities, and running themselves in debt to foreigners, and to each other for articles of folly and dissipation:—While this is the case, we may contend about forms of government, but no establishment will enrich a people, who wantonly spend beyond their income.[20]

Some governmental improvements may be desirable, but those who look to a new government for the solution of American difficulties look in the wrong place and at the same time tend to increase the real difficulties.

May not our manners be the source of our national evils? May not our attachment to foreign trade increase them? Have we not acted imprudently in exporting almost all our gold and silver for foreign luxuries? It is now acknowledged that we have not a sufficient quantity of the precious metals to answer the various purposes of government and commerce; and without a breach of charity, it may be said that this deficiency arises from the want of public virtue, in prefering private interest to every other consideration.[21]

If, however, the country's domestic and economic problems were both less serious and less amenable to constitutional remedy than the Federalists contended, what of the obvious weakness of the United States under the Articles of Confederation in dealing with other nations? The Anti-Federalists agreed with Publius that "if we are to be one nation in any respect, it clearly ought to be in respect to other nations."[22] They were likely to emphasize, however, America's isolated situation and the unlikelihood of European powers involving themselves with the United States even to collect unpaid debts. Few Anti-Federalists went quite so far as Patrick Henry, but there was a good deal of hopeful sympathy with his view that as far as danger from European nations was concerned, "you may sleep in safety forever for them."[23] Wilson Nicholas characterized the Anti-Federalist argument, with much justice, as "turn[ing] upon [the] supposition: —We shall always have peace, and need make no provision against wars. Is not this deceiving ourselves? Is it not fallacious? Did there ever exist a nation which, at some period or other, was not exposed to war?"[24] The Anti-Federalists replied that if war does come, what will count will be not great armies and navies but the American spirit, that very manly independence and love of country that also supports American liberty. The kind of governmental strength promised by the Constitution is deceptive, for it tends to undermine the popular independence and virtue that are the true backbone of a republic. George Mason had made this argument in the Philadelphia convention, when he compared the strength of a unitary executive with the deeper strength of a virtuous republican citizenry, and it was often repeated in the debate over ratification.[25] "For a new country to become strong and energetic, so as to be able to repel a foreign foe, the government must be free and patriotic, and the people must be wealthy and well-affected to it." "[T]he people will never fight (if they can help it) for representation, taxes and rags."[26] The Federalists exaggerated the problem of national defense and proposed the wrong solution. If there was any danger, Henry affirmed, "I would recur to the American spirit to defend us."*[27]

In both the domestic and the foreign spheres, then, the Anti-Federalists thought that the Federalists overstated the American difficulties and the extent to which they could be corrected by constitutional reform. They thought that, as Federalist propaganda against the Articles of Confederation had helped to increase the difficulties, so Federalist propaganda in defense of the Constitution might divert attention from the true cause of trouble, the deterioration of the American spirit. Far from arresting this deterioration, the Constitution seemed likely to intensify it.

When all of these qualifications are made and all these doubts stated, however, the Anti-Federalists nevertheless agreed that a Union was wanted, that it required an efficient government, and that the Articles of Confederation did not provide such a government. "The importance of preserving an union, and of establishing a government equal to the purpose of maintaining that union, is a sentiment deeply impressed on the mind of every citizen of America. It is now no longer doubted, that the confederation, in its present form, is inadequate to that end: Some reform in our government must take place. In this all parties agree. . . ." "It is on all hands acknowledged that the federal government is not adequate to the purpose of the Union."[28]

An efficient federal government need not, however, imply one so powerful as that proposed in the Constitution. The broad grants of power, taken together with the "supremacy" and the "necessary and proper" clauses, amounted, the Anti-Federalists contended, to an unlimited grant of power to the general government to do whatever it might choose to do. In the provision (Art. I, sec. 4) granting Congress the power to alter state regulations, or make its own, regarding the times, places, and manner of electing senators and representatives, for example, the Anti-Federalists saw endless possibility of usurpation and tyranny.[29] Could any possible good compensate for the dangers of such a provision? Moreover, the Anti-Federalists insisted, in contradiction to their opponents, that the powers of the proposed government, not its organization, was the central question.[30] All of the arguments of the Federalists that this new government was better constructed than the old one fell before the massive fact that the old government was weak and this one would be strong. "The old Confederation is so defective in point of power," William Grayson plaintively explained to the Virginia convention, "that no danger can result from creating offices under it; because those who hold them cannot be paid. . . . Why not make this system as secure as that, in this respect?"[31] Not many Anti-Federalists were quite so transparent, but their opponents were quick to insist that Grayson's position was precisely the ridiculous conclusion to which the Anti-Federalist argument led: without the power to do good, a government can do no harm. But a government must have the capacity to accomplish its ends, otherwise liberty itself is in danger: "there is no way more likely to lose ones liberty in the end than being too niggardly of it in the beginning. . . ."[32] The means, the Federalists argued again and again, must be proportioned to the end, and the end in the case of the general government is not capable of being limited in advance. As bounds cannot be set to a nation's wants, so bounds ought not to be set to its resources. "The contingencies of society are not reducible to calculations. They cannot be fixed or bounded, even in imagination."

The framers of constitutions must see that "no power should be wanting which the safety of the community requires." Otherwise, when critical occasions arise, the country will suffer the alternative of usurpation or catastrophe. Of course every power can be abused, and abuse must be guarded against; but "our risk of this evil [is] one of the conditions of the imperfect state of human nature, where there is no good without the mixture of some evil."[33] Publius drove the point home:

> For the absurdity must continually stare us in the face of confiding to a government the direction of the most essential national interests, without daring to trust it to the authorities which are indispensable to their proper and efficient management. Let us not attempt to reconcile contradictions, but firmly embrace a rational alternative.[34]

This is a powerful argument, given the Anti-Federalists' own desire for a Union government powerful enough to secure common interests, especially defense. It is an argument that is almost sufficient to justify the Constitution; and it was in fact the main argument of many of the Federalist leaders and writers. Many of the Anti-Federalists simply could not meet it; but others made a series of attempts to resist the apparently invincible logic of unlimited means to accomplish unlimitable ends. They contended that it is always prudent to grant power cautiously and that it is possible to make reasonable estimates of the limited means needed under ordinary circumstances. It is safer, especially in a republic, to be guided by such estimates than by remote and extreme possibilities. Moreover, they charged that the Federalists were more or less deliberately using an argument about means to enlarge the ends of government, shifting their gaze from individual liberty to visions of national empire and glory. Finally they tried to show that the state governments also have their ends, that these are in fact the primary ends of government, and that these also require appropriate means.

The prudence of granting power cautiously was a common Anti-Federal refrain. Governmental power should always be granted with a niggardly hand, a maxim that applies a hundredfold to this proposed general government, distant and dangerous as it must necessarily be even if improved. "As the poverty of individuals prevents luxury, so the poverty of publick bodies, whether sole or aggregate, prevents tyranny. A nation cannot, perhaps, do a more politick thing, than to supply the purse of its sovereign with that parsimony, which results from a sense of the labour it costs, and so to compel him to comply with the genius of his people, and conform to their situation, whether he will or not."[35] Again and again, Anti-Federalists argued in terms like those of a Massachusetts delegate who said that "we had a right to be jealous of our rulers, who ought never to have a power which they could abuse." Again and again Federalists answered in terms like those of Mr. Rutledge in South Carolina, that "the very idea of power included a possibility of doing harm; and if the gentleman would show the power that could do no harm, he would at once discover it to be a power that could do no good."[36] But to concede the Federalist point does not overcome the difficulty the Anti-Federalists raised. "There is no public abuse," A [Maryland] Farmer argued, "that does not spring from the necessary use of power,—it is that insensible progress from the use to the abuse, that has led mankind through scenes of calamity and woe, that makes us now shrink back with horror, from the history of our species."[37] Prudence dictates granting too few powers rather than too many; rulers will always exercise their full legal powers, and it is easier to increase power than to lessen it. Nor is it sufficient to say that the exigencies facing the general government are in principle illimitable. Reasonable estimates can in practice be made and acted upon: ". . . every nation may form a rational judgment, what force will be competent to protect and defend it, against any enemy with which it is probable it may have to contend."[38] It is far more prudent to act upon such judgments than to rush to provide the government at once with all the power it may conceivably need. The maxim that unlimited means are necessary to meet unlimited ends is balanced by the maxim, which applies to all forms of power, "that all governments find a use for as much money as they can raise."[39] Extraordinary needs can be met as they arise. If a national credit and a national treasury are needed in time of war, let them be provided in time of war, Patrick Henry said; republics always put forth their utmost resources when required.[40]

Indeed, the stress placed by Federalists on national defense and a vigorous commercial policy often seemed to mask a radical shift in direction from the protection of individual liberty to the pursuit of national riches and glory. When the Anti-Federalists saw the new Constitution defended as having the "noble purposes" to make us "respectable as a nation abroad, and rich as individuals at home" and as calculated to promote "the grandeur and importance of America, until time shall be no more,"[41] they feared for the principles of the American governments. "You are not to inquire how your trade may be increased," Patrick Henry warned, "nor how you are to become a great and powerful people, but how your liberties can be secured; for liberty ought to be the direct end of your Government."

> Shall we imitate the example of those nations who have gone from a simple to a splendid Government? Are those nations more worthy of our imitation? What can make an adequate satisfaction to them for the loss they have suffered in attaining such a Government—for the loss of their liberty? If we admit this Consolidated Government, it will be because we like a great splendid one. Some way or other we must be a great and mighty empire; we must have an army, and a navy, and a number of things: When the American spirit was in its youth, the language of America was different: Liberty, Sir, was then the primary object.*[42]

Ambitious Federalists, captivated by visions of "stately palaces" and "dazzling ideas of glory, wealth, and power," wanted us "to be like other nations."[43] That is just what we should not be. Americans "ought to furnish the world with an example of a great people, who in their civil institutions hold chiefly in view, the attainment of virtue, and happiness among ourselves. Let the monarchs in Europe, share among them the glory of depopulating countries, and butchering thousands of their innocent citizens, to revenge private quarrels, or to punish an insult offered to a wife, a mistress, or a favorite: I envy them not the honor, and I pray heaven this country may never be ambitious of it."[44] The splendor of the monarch, and the power of the government are one thing," The Federal Farmer wrote. "The happiness of the subject depends on very different causes. . . ."[45] Wars might be necessary, but they should be strictly defensive. The Anti-Federalists generally held to what Hamilton scornfully called "the novel and absurd experiment in politics of tying up the hands of government from offensive war founded upon reasons of state";[46] and they saw in Hamilton's scorn dangerous dreams of national glory. "War is justifiable on no other principle than self-defence, it is at best a curse to any people; it is comprehensive of most, if not all the mischiefs that do or can afflict mankind; it depopulates nations; lays waste the finest countries; destroys arts and sciences, it many times ruins the best men, and advances the worst, it effaces every trace of virtue, piety and compassion, and introduces all kinds of corruption in public affairs; and in short, is pregnant with so many evils, that it ought ever to be avoided if possible; nothing but self-defense can justify it."[47]

The tendency of the Federalists to inflate national concerns was connected with their failure to recognize that defense and commercial advantage are not the only ends of government. The state governments also have their ends, and require adequate means to pursue them. Granting fully the indispensability of an effective general government, it is still the states to which is entrusted the "most important end of government," the direction of the internal police and economy; and the happiness of the people depends "infinitely more on this than it does upon all that glory and respect which nations achieve by the most brilliant martial achievements. . . ." The just way of reasoning on this subject, then, is that the general government ought to have the authority to discharge its responsibilities for defense, foreign relations, and general commerce, "so far as is consistent with the providing for our internal protection and defence" by the state governments.[48] The American federal system is seen here as containing parallel governments in a kind of balance or tension with one another.

Neither the general government, nor the state governments, ought to be vested with all the powers proper to be exercised for promoting the ends of government. The powers are divided between them—certain ends to be attained by the one, and other certain ends by the other; and these, taken together, include all the ends of good government. This being the case, the conclusion follows, that each should be furnished with the means, to attain the ends, to which they are designed.[49]

The claims of one side must not be pressed so far as to incapacitate the other. In particular, the more urgent and more obvious claims of the general government must not be allowed to override the more fundamental claims of the states.

We come at this point in the discussion to a shift, which occurred gradually and erratically during the ratification debate, in the meaning of the term "federal" and the understanding of the American "federal" system. The early or relatively "pure" Anti-Federal position, as we have shown, was a defense of federalism in a rather strict sense, understood as the principle of a league or confederation, as we now call it.[50] The Federalist counter was to show that a merely federal government could not perform the tasks that even the Anti-Federalists would give to a general government, that the Articles of Confederation themselves were not purely federal, and that the proposed government under the Constitution was neither simply national nor simply federal but a combination of them. The mixture permeates all aspects of the constitutional system—or so, at least it was claimed—but for the present what is crucial is the constitutional division of the tasks and powers of government between the general government and the state governments. Within its sphere the general government is a complete national government, but that sphere is limited; and within their own spheres the states act as constitutionally independent entities.[51]

Initially it was the Anti-Federalists who doubted the viability of such a mixed system and the Federalists who affirmed it. The Anti-Federalists could not, however, maintain their strict federal ground, as we have seen, because they did see the Union as more than a league. Consequently they followed the Federalists into what we may call the "new federalism" (i.e., a mixed national and federal system) and, despite early misgivings, became its strongest advocates; for it seemed, under all the circumstances, the best way to preserve the principles they thought fundamental. At this point there is another shift. Once the legitimacy of the new federalism is accepted, the Federalists emphasized the primacy of the national component in the mixture, while the Anti-Federalists urged the importance of a strict division of power and even something like a divided sovereignty, the possibility of which their early strictly federal argument had denied.

Not surprisingly, these shifts were reflected in terminological confusion or ambiguity. Some of the Federalists deliberately contributed to this confusion by calling this new combination of federal and national government a "federal" government. The implication, which has some surface plausibility, is that nothing very substantial hinges on a shift from one "federal" mixture in the Articles of Confederation to another "federal" mixture in the Constitution.[52] Terminological confusion is also found on the Anti-Federal side. In the reasoning of The Federal Farmer, for example, there is an overall movement from the old federalism to the new, which is reflected in a very significant terminological shift. In his first essay, The Federal Farmer makes the traditional three-part distinction between a federal plan, a consolidation, and what he here calls "partial consolidation," which is a combination of federal and national elements. But in his sixth essay (in the Additional Letters) what he had formerly called "federal" becomes a form of "pretended federalism" and what was formerly called partial consolidation becomes the true or honest federalism.[53]

The notion that the general and the particular governments had different objects was of course not new. As we have seen, for example, Luther Martin had argued in the Philadelphia Convention that the state governments were to protect and regulate individual liberty, while the general government was formed to take care of essential common interests.[54] The Articles of Confederation were not a strictly federal system but a kind of mixture. But what was missing in the earlier view was a well-developed notion of coordinate jurisdictions and coordinate state and federal sovereigns. For Martin, the tasks of government were divided, but the states were supreme; for the nationalists, the tasks might be divided, but the national government would be supreme. In either of these views the tendency was to see any division of powers as a convenient arrangement sanctioned and subject to reassessment by the supreme power, whether that was the states or the general government. The Anti-Federalists could not consistently hold to the doctrine of state supremacy because they admitted it would lead to anarchy among the states. They could not accept national supremacy because they thought it would lead to centralized tyranny. To avoid both extremes is the somewhat dubious promise of the new federalism: to provide, somehow, for a government in which neither the whole nor the parts are supreme.*[55]

The problem that persistently threatens this arrangement is of course how to deal with the possibility of conflicts between these governments and their tasks. This was, again, not a new problem, but it became acute as the notion of coordinate governments came into focus. It is true that the theoretical force of the argument against divided sovereignty was at least blunted by the perfection of the notion of the constitution as fundamental law: sovereignty could thus remain with the people, who partition power among their agents as they see fit.[56] The Federalists typically argued that the Constitution provided a sufficient delineation of power and that no vital conflict need arise. "The road is broad enough," Oliver Ellsworth said; "but if two men will jostle each other, the fault is not in the road."[57] But the very breadth of the road, the lack of restriction on the powers of the general government, and its independence of the states, seemed to the Anti-Federalists to make jostling inevitable with the states likely to find themselves in the ditch. There are only two ways to deal with this problem. Either the possibility of jostling must be altogether eliminated, or the states must be given the constitutional muscle to protect themselves in a more or less permanent contest.

To avoid conflict would require a comprehensive and exact partition of powers between the state and the general governments. Nowhere was the problem stated so clearly and its implication so sharply drawn as in James Monroe's suppressed pamphlet:

> To mark the precise point at which the powers of the general government shall cease, and that from whence those of the states shall commence, to poise them in such manner as to prevent either destroying the other, will require the utmost force of human wisdom and ingenuity. No possible ground of variance or even interference should be left, for there would the conflict commence, that might perhaps prove fatal to both.[58]

Any room for adjustment or disagreement is room for the whole equilibrium again to be drawn into question; and the tendency will be to assert the supremacy of either the states or the federal government, with the resulting tyranny of consolidation or anarchy of mere confederation. Under the ambiguous constitutional partition of powers there is great danger of this kind. But Monroe's demand was of course utterly unrealistic, as the Anti-Federalists, for all their calls for a fuller more precise apportionment, admitted. Does that not destroy, then, the whole enterprise of the new federalism? Will not a mixed system inevitably move from whatever equilibrium is originally set to one of its extremes? Perhaps so, ultimately, but there is yet another Anti-Federalist defense. If the jurisdictions or respective sovereignties of the general and the state governments cannot be so unambiguously drawn as to avoid any future uncertainties, perhaps those governments can be constructed and empowered and related in ways that ensure that the inevitable adjustments and conflicts will leave the main parties essentially intact and the system, the nation, in equilibrium.

In practice this would require, in the opinion of the Anti-Federalists, measures to ensure the continued independence and vigor of the states, which were missing from the Constitution. They objected to the absence of explicit reservations in behalf of states' rights. Without an express declaration "in favour of the legislative rights of the several states, by which their sovereignty over their own citizens within the state should be secured," the states would "be preserved only during the pleasure of Congress."[59] The states had, moreover, been deprived of the power of self-defense. The centralization of the taxing and military authorities would leave the states and the people defenseless against their national rulers. "My great objection to this Government is, that it does not leave us the means of defending our rights; or, of waging war against tyrants. . . . Have we the means of resisting disciplined armies, when our only defence, the militia is put into the hands of Congress?"[60] Neither was the states' influence in the general government adequately secured. No real security was to be found in the Senate, which was not truly federal and over whose deliberations the states would have little influence.[61] The states were to have no constitutional check on the actions of the general government. It was no use pointing, as James Wilson did, to the role of the states in forming the general government.[62] Formally the states might be indispensable to the existence of the general government, but what would really count was state participation in the operation of government, and there was to be none of this in the new scheme.[63] The decisive issue here was the power of taxation. When Governor Randolph referred to that power as the "soul" of the new government, Patrick Henry shrewdly replied that "they shall not have the soul of Virginia."[64] Under the Constitution the states would have no constitutional way of influencing the raising of the federal revenue and thus would be closed out from substantial influence on federal policy. The states would at the same time have to sustain themselves with whatever crumbs might be left after the general government had taken its fill. The old system of requisitions provided the states with a constitutional check on the general government and ensured their continued independence. As Henry explained, requisitions are attended with the advantage of "deliberation," and the states can correct "oppressive errors" of the general government.[65] Or as Hamilton put it, "If States are to deliberate on the mode, they will also deliberate on the object of the supplies, and will grant or not grant as they approve or disapprove of it."[66] The obvious problem is that while the system of requisitions secures the position of the states, it undermines that of the general government. Why not, then, many Anti-Federalists asked, make room in the system of revenue raising for both the national and the federal principles? Allow the general government an independent source of revenue by giving it an unlimited power to impose duties; but for any additional revenue require it to make requisitions on the states, imposing direct taxes of its own only where the states fail to comply with the requisition. This was one of the recommendatory amendments that facilitated the crucial Massachusetts ratification, and it was prominent in subsequent lists of recommendatory amendments. Without here following out the debate on this question, it should be considered whether this arrangement, which would have been widely accepted among the Anti-Federalists, would not have been the mode of revenue raising most consistent with the "new federalism," and what its rejection implies for the American "federal" system.

The whole issue of the new federalism, as the Anti-Federalists saw it, was very clearly laid out in the quite theoretical discussion of A [Pennsylvania] Farmer. He began with the conventional distinction between general and local concerns. "The perfection of a federal republic consists in drawing the proper line between those objects of sovereignty which are of a general nature, and which ought to be vested in the federal government, and those which are of a more local nature and ought to remain with the particular governments. . . ." But this distinction is not sufficient; it depends on a deeper one:

> [A]ll that portion of a sovereignty which involves the common interest of all the confederating states, and which cannot be exercised by the states in their individual capacity without endangering the liberty and welfare of the whole, ought to be vested in the general government, reserving such a proportion of sovereignty in the state governments as would enable them to exist alone, if the general government should fail either by violence or with the common consent of the confederates; the states should respectively have laws, courts, force, and revenues of their own sufficient for their own security; they ought to be fit to keep house alone if necessary; if this be not the case, or so far as it ceases to be so, it is a departure from a federal to a consolidated government. . . .[67]

In this striking rule A [Pennsylvania] Farmer makes clear what is implicit in the Anti-Federalist acceptance of the "new federalism." The distinction between general and local concerns is not an adequate rule, for that does not ensure the maintenance of the federal equilibrium. That equilibrium consists rather in, on the one hand, a general government capable of dealing with general interests and, on the other hand, local governments capable of existing alone if necessary. To ensure the latter was the true reason (sometimes only vaguely understood) for the Anti-Federalist commitment to the system of requisitions, to state military power, and to constitutional checks by the states on the general government. This position has a good deal of weight if federalism is to be anything but a common sense modification of consolidated national government, maintained fundamentally at the discretion of that government. Yet there is an obvious difficulty; the demands of the common interest are likely to come into conflict with the requirement that the states be "fit to keep house alone if necessary." Indeed while it can be plausibly held that conflicts between local interests and general interests are in principle reconcilable, the localities being parts of one whole, the conflict between the general interest and the capacity of the states to exist alone may be utterly irreconcilable. In fact, under A [Pennsylvania] Farmer's clearheaded analysis the new federalism dissolves into the stark alternative of the old federalism versus consolidation. And it is fairly clear which way A [Pennsylvania] Farmer would go when the conflict appears. There is, it seems, finally no middle way between a federal or a consolidated government; and while he is willing to define a federal government as substantially more than a league, it is fundamentally a league. So, on the other side, while Publius is willing to define the American federal system as something less than a national government, it is for him fundamentally a national government.

To the extent that men become persuaded that supremacy can be divided between central and local governments, the new federalism becomes theoretically defensible. Such men in 1787 and 1788 were rare. To the extent, however, that men are willing to concern themselves with dividing powers among the governments and adjusting their relations, the ultimate theoretical dilemma can be fended off by a series of practical arrangements. There were many such men in 1788. They were typically not very sanguine about the long-range viability of such arrangements, so much praised by later generations of scholars, historians, and statesmen; but they saw no other course. The Federalists accepted it mainly because of the strength of federal feeling in the country. Some of them saw it as a reasonable, permanent basis of government, many of them as a more or less temporary arrangement in the course of building a genuine national government. The Anti-Federalists were more likely to accept it as a long-term basis of American government, as a way of bringing together, if not reconciling, their own conflicting principles. As their commitment to simple federalism was more equivocal than the Federalists' commitment to simple nationalism, so their commitment to the new federalism, whose very principle is equivocation, was greater.

5
The Federalist Reply

Most of the major Federalists spoke the language of the new federalism, and some were content to rest their defense of the Constitution on this ground. The general and the particular governments have their different spheres and objects; the Constitution has defined these spheres reasonably well; and there is reason to hope that future adjustments will preserve a healthy balance. The most able Federalists, however, had reservations not merely about the feasibility of the new federalism but about its underlying premises. Men like James Madison thought that the solution of the internal as well as the external problems of American government was to be found not fundamentally in an equilibrium between states and Union, even if that could be achieved, but in a properly organized and empowered American republic. This view was prominent in the Philadelphia debates. Explaining the Virginia plan, Edmund Randolph "observed that the general object was to provide a cure for the evils under which the U.S. labored; that in tracing these evils to their origin every man had found it in the turbulence and follies of democracy. . . ."[1] Later James Madison explicitly challenged the narrow view expressed by Roger Sherman that the objects of Union were confined to dealing with foreign powers and preventing disputes among the states. To these should be added, Madison said, "the necessity of providing more effectually for the security of private rights, and the steady dispensation of Justice. Interferences with these were evils which had more perhaps than anything else, produced this convention. Was it to be supposed that republican liberty could long exist under the abuses of it practiced in [some of] the states."[2] This argument denies the basic premise of the Anti-Federal position and of the new federalism, the presumed superiority of the small republic in securing individual liberty and domestic tranquillity. On the contrary, the trouble with small republics is not mainly that they are weak and need to confederate for external purposes; it is that they cannot perform adequately the very tasks they are supposed to be best at.*[3] The extended American republic organized under the Constitution, while surely necessary for defense and commercial prosperity, will also be able to do the internal work of free republican government better than the states or any ideal small republic could do it. There are two parts of this crucial Federalist argument, the first having to do with the characteristic problem of republican government and the second with its solution.

The characteristic problem of republican government is, in the words of Publius, majority faction, which is the majority "united and actuated by some common impulse of passion, or of interest, adverse to the rights of other citizens, or to the permanent and aggregate interests of the community."[4] This is not the traditional problem of popular licentiousness leading to resistance of authority and anarchy. Majority faction is the particular danger of popular government precisely because under popular government majorities can tyrannize under the cover of law.[5] This does not mean that Publius and the Federalists opposed majorities—Publius makes clear that not all majorities are factious—or that they were, as is sometimes inferred, enemies of popular government.[6] They did often declare against democracy (or against "pure democracy"), but democracy was understood in such contexts as a corrupt or extreme form of popular government.[7] The Federalists were preoccupied with majority faction (or democracy, in some formulations) precisely because of their commitment to the kind of government of which majority faction is the characteristic evil. The point is, as Madison explained in a letter to Jefferson, that "wherever the real power in a Government lies, there is the danger of oppression. In our Governments the real power lies in the majority of the community, and the invasion of private rights is chiefly to be apprehended, not from acts of Government contrary to the sense of its constituents, but from acts in which the Government is the mere instrument of the major number of the Constituents."[8]

Among the opponents of the Constitution there was some equivocation over majority faction. A few argued for pure democracy: "America under [a government] purely democratical, would be rendered the happiest and most powerful nation in the universe. . . ."[9] A very few seemed to deny that there can be such a thing as majority tyranny. When Brutus defined tyrannical government as that which, instead of serving the public good, promotes "the happiness and aggrandisement of one, or a few," he seemed to suggest, by omission, that there can be no tyrannical government of the many, though on the whole it is more accurate to say that, while not denying the possibility of majority tyranny, he did not see any need to discuss it.[10] Governor Clinton perhaps came closest to a denial in principle of the very possibility of majority tyranny when he insisted that the only true definition of free government is that "the will of the people . . . is law."[11]

In general, however, the Anti-Federalists acknowledged the possibility of majority faction and the need to guard against it, even though this danger typically occupied a less conspicuous place in their catalogue of dangers than in that of the Federalists.[12] Impressed as they were by the English "Real Whigs," or Commonwealthmen, as Caroline Robbins has called them, the Anti-Federalists had been taught by their own experience that there were other dangers than kings, lords, and magistrates. Few of them would have agreed with Burgh that to argue that "the representatives of the people be checked and clogged in promoting the interest of their constituents" is like arguing that "there ought to be a check to prevent individuals from being too healthy, or too virtuous. . . ."[13] Government by the people or, in practice, majority rule was accepted by the Anti-Federalists as the foundation of free government in America;[14] but (Cato to the contrary notwithstanding) majority rule was not generally thought to be the very definition of free government, because it can lead to unjust deprivations of individual liberty. This was, indeed, one of the reasons some of the Anti-Federalists wanted a bill of rights. Thus Agrippa met the Federalist denial that a bill of rights is necessary in a representative government by insisting that it would serve "to secure the minority against the usurpation and tyranny of the majority."[15] A [Maryland] Farmer made the point even more emphatically:

> The truth is, that the rights of individuals are frequently opposed to the apparent interests of the majority—For this reason the greater the portion of political freedom in a form of government the greater the necessity of a bill of rights—Often the natural rights of an individual are opposed to the presumed interests or heated passions of a large majority of democratic government; if these rights are not clearly and expressly ascertained, the individual must be lost; and for the truth of this I appeal to every man who has borne a part in the legislative councils of America. In such government the tyranny of the legislative is most to be dreaded.[16]

Jackson Turner Main's disappointed estimate is "that less than half of the Anti-Federalist leaders had democratic inclinations, and that these were muted."[17] But the terms of this estimate are vague in the extreme. It would be difficult to find a single articulate American of this period who did not have very significant democratic "inclinations"; yet there were very few whose democratic inclinations were not, in some significant sense, "muted." Gordon Wood, on the other hand, characterizes the Anti-Federalists as genuine populists, as "majoritarians with respect to the state legislatures," as "true champions of the most extreme kind of democratic and egalitarian politics expressed in the Revolutionary era."[18] But what precisely does this mean? There were very few "democrats" among the Anti-Federalist writers (or probably among Americans of any kind) if by that is meant those who believe simply that the will of the majority of the people is law and that that will ought to be exercised as directly and with as little restraint as possible.[19] However, the Anti-Federalists were typically more democratic than the Federalists in the specific sense that they were less likely to see majority faction as the most dangerous and likely evil of popular government. They were inclined to think, with Patrick Henry, that harm is more often done by the tyranny of the rulers than by the licentiousness of the people.*[20] Moreover, so far as there may be a threat of licentiousness, it is to be met in the same way, fundamentally, as the threat to tyranny: by the alert public-spiritedness of the small, homogeneous, self-governing community.

To the Federalists, Henry's and the other Anti-Federalists' view of both the problem and the solution missed the main points. Having established the centrality to republican government of the problem of majority tyranny, the Federalists went on to challenge the Anti-Federalist preference for the small republic in all of the three essential aspects that we have considered.[21] Rather than attempting to secure the patriotic attachment and law-abidingness of the citizens through a small republic, the Federalists would bind the citizens to their polity by effective government and good administration. Rather than trying to secure responsibility through a numerous representation, the Federalists would stress the filtering effect of representation; they would accept the natural leadership of the influential few, attaching it to the government and directing it toward the public good. And finally, rather than trying to foster republican simplicity, virtue, and self-restraint, the Federalists would rely on the many diverse private gratifications available in the extended republic, with its spaciousness and opportunity, to make it unlikely that any faction (and particularly a majority faction) would have the inclination or opportunity to tyrannize over others. Let us consider each of these challenges to the Anti-Federalist position in turn.

The Anti-Federalists thought, as we have seen, that a large republic cannot attract the voluntary obedience of the people and is therefore driven to execute its resolutions by military force. In the words of The Federal Farmer, "the general government, far removed from the people, and none of its members elected oftener than once in two years, will be forgot or neglected, and its laws in many cases disregarded, unless a multitude of officers and military force be continually kept in view, and employed to enforce the execution of the laws, and to make the government feared and respected."[22] If a government of force is to be avoided, the bonds of political union must be woven from the strands of the natural human association.

> The strongest principle of union resides within our domestic walls. The ties of the parent exceed that of any other; as we depart from home, the next general principle of union is amongst citizens of the same state, where acquaintance, habits, and fortunes, nourish affection, and attachment; enlarge the circle still further, and, as citizens of different states, though we acknowledge the same national denomination, we lose the ties of acquaintance, habits, and fortunes, and thus, by degrees, we lessen in our attachments, till, at length, we no more than acknowledge a sameness of species.[23]

Significantly, Alexander Hamilton used exactly this thought in the New York ratifying convention and in The Federalist to show that the states need not fear being undermined by the new general government because they will always enjoy the attachment of the people. Followed with some care, however, Hamilton's discussion points to the Federalist alternative to the small natural community.

> It is a known fact in human nature that its affections are commonly weak in proportion to the distance or diffusiveness of the object. Upon the same principle that a man is more attached to his family than to his neighborhood, to his neighborhood than to the community at large, the people of each State would be apt to feel a stronger bias towards their local governments than towards the government of the Union; unless the force of that principle should be destroyed by a much better administration of the latter.[*24]

What is presented here as the incidental and apparently unlikely possibility of a better federal administration turns out to be crucial. Hamilton later makes it clear that there is "a probability that the general government will be better administered than the particular governments," being composed of a more select group of men, with more information and free of the taint of faction.[*25] Thus the advantages of the close-knit natural community in inspiring the trust and confidence of the people can be replaced by the attractive benefits of the more effective government of the large republic.

Indeed, the Federalists claimed that their opponents mistook the political ground of trust, confidence, and even public morality, which is not intimate government but effective government. It is "not generally true," Hamilton told the New York convention, "that a numerous representation [is] necessary to obtain the confidence of the people. The confidence of the people will easily be gained by a good administration. This is the true touchstone." Public attachment to government "is more strongly secured by a train of prosperous events, which are the result of wise deliberation and vigorous execution," to which large bodies are less competent than small ones.[*26] Governments attract the confidence of the people in the long run by deserving it. This includes, among other things, giving effective support to the virtues that all admit are desirable. The qualities of industry, economy, honesty, and civic virtue, about which the Anti-Federalists preach so much, are in fact undermined by the kind of governments the Anti-Federalists defend. Tender laws and paper money, the products of weak government, had led in America to well-known (and, by most Anti-Federalists, admitted) evils. "If virtue is the foundation of republican government, has it not been fatally sapped by these means? The morals of the people have been almost sunk into depravity; and the government of laws has been almost superseded by a licentious anarchy."[27] The crucial need, even for those who are the immediate losers, is wise and effective government and the confidence that only such a government can inspire. This is the source of civic prosperity. "The circulation of confidence is better than the circulation of money," and the pump of confidence is sound government, not government close to the people.

An aspect of any good government is a capacity to coerce obedience when necessary. To that extent the Anti-Federalists were right in saying that the new government would rest ultimately on force; they were wrong, in the Federalists' opinion, in thinking that there is any other kind. "[A]ll government is a kind of restraint" and "founded in force," Charles Pinckney told the South Carolina House of Representatives; "he could not conceive that either the dignity of a government could be maintained, its safety ensured, or its laws administered, without a body of regular forces to aid the magistrate in the execution of his duty."[28] Coercion also has a broader moral and political effect. "While it compels the obedience of the refractory, it redoubles the alertness of the virtuous by inspiring a confidence in the impartiality of its burthens."[29]

The Federalist view, then, was that an effective government, in addition to being intrinsically desirable, is also the key to the attachment of the people and to civic virtue itself. A government that can actually accomplish its resolves, that can keep the peace, protect property, and promote the prosperity of the country, will be a government respected and obeyed by its citizens. It will, moreover, promote private and public morality by providing them with effective protection.

The second element of the Federalist solution of the problem of popular government is a proper system of representation. In the main, the Anti-Federalists accepted representation reluctantly, as a necessary device in a community where the people cannot assemble to do their common business. The representative body is seen in consequence as a substitute for an assembly of all the citizens, which ought to be as like the whole body as possible. The Federalists, on the other hand, saw representation not as an unfortunate necessity but as an opportunity. It permits, in the first place, an extension of popular government. Through representation, especially in a federal system, "the people of a large country may be represented as truly as those of a small one."[30] Representation is the device that makes the large republic possible. But it is more. Arguing that representation was not new, but was put to a new use in the American governments, Publius made the striking observation that the difference between ancient governments and the American governments lay "in the total exclusion of the people in their collective capacity from any share in the latter, and not in the total exclusion of representatives of the people, from the administration of the former." To secure the full effect of this benefit, however, it must be connected to an extensive territory. "For it cannot be believed that any form of representative government, could have succeeded within the narrow limits occupied by the democracies of Greece."*[31] Thus representation is necessary to secure the benefits of the large republic; but the large republic is also necessary to secure the benefits of representation. These benefits are to be found, negatively expressed, in the capacity of a representative system to provide for a popular government in which the people collectively play no part and in which the danger of popular excesses is thereby reduced. As a Virginia Federalist argued, "the more independent a government is . . . of the people, under proper restraints," the more likely it is to produce the security of persons and property which is the end of government.[32]

As we have seen, the Anti-Federalists complained that in a large republic the people will not in practice be able to choose men like themselves, and the representative body will inevitably be composed of the natural aristocracy. In large districts, "a common man must ask a man of influence how he is to proceed, and for whom he must vote," and the only men with a chance of being elected are those of "conspicuous military, popular, civil or legal talents."[33] The Federalists replied that it is inevitable and natural that the people should choose such men to represent them; they cannot and should not be prevented from doing so. The small manufacturer sees that the merchant can represent him in public councils better than he could represent himself. The small landholder sees that his basic interests are shared with and protected by the great landholder. And what is wrong with electing men of conspicuous talents? Who composes this "natural aristocracy" before which the opponents of the Constitution tremble? They are the most distinguished, the most trusted, the most able men (and that is, on the whole, how the Anti-Federalists themselves identified them). But are not these precisely the kinds of men who ought to be the people's representatives? Even the radical constitution of Pennsylvania, James Wilson pointed out, declared that "representatives should consist of those most noted for wisdom and virtue." "If this is [what is] meant by a natural aristocracy, and I know no other, can it be objectionable that men should be employed that are most noted for their virtue and talents?"*[34] In New York, Chancellor Livingston argued against rotation on the same grounds. It is "an absurd species of ostracism—a mode of proscribing eminent merit, and banishing from stations of trust those who have filled them with the greatest faithfulness." Moreover, should not virtue and talents be encouraged by honors and rewards? "The acquisition of abilities is hardly worth the trouble, unless one is to enjoy the satisfaction of employing them for the good of one's country."[35]

Thus the positive side of the Federalist case for representation is the likelihood that it will produce a government with a capacity to govern well. The probability is increased in an extensive republic, which is more likely to put forward "proper guardians of the public weal" and less susceptible to electoral corruption than a small one. Corruption is difficult where there are many to bribe, and the large district is protection against other forms of "bribery" such as demagoguery and appeals to narrow interests.[36] Petty republics and small districts are the natural homes of petty men. "It is only in remote corners of a government," James Wilson thought, "that little demagogues arise. Nothing but real weight of character, can give a man real influence over a large district."[37] In a large district an aspiring politician has to seek a wide base of support, and this increases the likelihood of his taking a broad view or at least decreases the chances of narrow partiality. "The little demagogue of a petty parish or county will find his importance annihilated, and his intrigues useless, when several counties join in an election; he probably would not be known, certainly not regarded, out of his own circle; while the man whose abilities and virtue had extended a fair reputation beyond the limits of his county, would, nine times out of ten, be the person who would be the choice of the people."*[38] For the Federalists, then, representation is a mode of selecting for rulers the best men, or at least men better than average; and the large districts of the large republic increases the chance of securing such men.

Consistently with this view that, as Publius said, the first aim of every constitution should be "to obtain for rulers men who possess most wisdom to discern, and most virtue to pursue, the common good of the society," the Federalists saw the duty of representatives as extending beyond the particular interests of their constituents to the common good.*[39] Noah Webster said, for example, that while a delegate is bound to represent "the true local interest" of those who elect him, "when each provincial interest is thus stated, every member should act for the aggregate interest of the whole confederacy. The design of representation is to bring the collective interest into view. . . ."[40] The Federalists were not naïve about the tendencies of representatives to act for narrow and selfish views; but the aim was a system in which the collective interest will emerge. Representation is not sufficient, but it is the basic device through which the people not merely re-presents but transcends itself. As Fisher Ames put it, "the representation of the people is something more than the people."*[41]

Against the third part of the Anti-Federalist defense of the small republic, the need for republican simplicity and public-spiritedness, the Federalists put forward the diversity of the extended commercial republic. Most of the Anti-Federalists thought, with Brutus, that "in a republic, the manners, sentiments, and interests of the people should be similar. If this is not the case, there will be a constant clashing of opinions; and the representatives of one part will be continually striving against those of the other."[42] The Federalists contended that such a homogeneous republic was possible only under the primitive, harsh conditions of a precommercial society, which no man—certainly no American—would choose to endure. John Adams had made the point well in his discussion of the little republic of San Marino.

> A handful of poor people, living in the simplest manner, by hard labor, upon the produce of a few cows, sheep, goats, swine, poultry and pigeons, on a piece of rocky, snowy ground, protected from every enemy by their situation, their superstition, and even by their poverty, having no commerce nor luxury, can be no example for the commonwealth of Pennsylvania, Georgia, or Vermont, in one of which there are possibly half a million of people, and in each of the others at least thirty thousand, scattered over a large territory.[43]

A safe mediocrity can be maintained in conditions like those of San Marino; but "in every community where industry is encouraged, there will be a division of it into the few and the many."[44] And when this occurs, the innocence of the primitive community is lost. The Anti-Federalists could not deny this; yet they did not really desire the simple, precommercial society, even if they could have had it. It is true that they criticized the man of commerce, "immersed in schemes of wealth" and thus "the last to take the alarm when public liberty is threatened."[45] He has no permanent attachments and can pack up and move, leaving the farmer to suffer the consequences of a bad constitution. But this was the half-hearted criticism of children of the modern commercial world who worried about its implications. There was no attempt to articulate an alternative, no account of the virtue of the agrarian way of life. There was some hankering after a simple, subsistence agricultural life, but the Anti-Federalists were irrevocably committed to a commercial order, as indeed American agriculture had always been.[46] The Federalists drew out the implications of the commitment. While they were about as likely as their opponents to write as "Farmer" or "Countryman," they denied that there was any real conflict between the landed and the commercial interests, because (as they suggested more or less explicitly) the American landed interest is fundamentally part of and dependent upon the commercial order. The Federalist Landholder argued, for example, "It may be assumed as a fixed truth that the prosperity and riches of the farmer must depend on the prosperity, and good national regulation of trade. Artful men may insinuate the contrary—tell you let trade take care of itself, and excite your jealousy against the merchant because his business leads him to wear a gayer coat, than your economy directs. But let your own experience refute such insinuations."[47] The American world is the world of commerce.

The basic problem of the Anti-Federalists was that they accepted the need and desirability of the modern commercial world, while attempting to resist certain of its tendencies with rather half-hearted appeals to civic virtue. But such restraints, the Federalists replied, have never worked and will never work; the solution is to be found in another direction entirely.

> Virtue, patriotism, or love of country, never was and never will be, till mens' natures are changed, a fixed, permanent principle and support of government. But in an agricultural country, a general possession of land in fee simple, may be rendered perpetual, and the inequalities introduced by commerce, are too fluctuating to endanger government. An equality of property, with a necessity of alienation, constantly operating to destroy combinations of powerful families, is the very soul of a republic.[48]

To this James Madison added the extended republic.*[49] For even in the absence of primogeniture and under the constant churning of commerce distinct interests will eventually form and find their way into the political realm. Despite unparalleled opportunity for individual enterprise, the time will come even under American conditions where the many will resent the greater goods enjoyed by the few. And in a popular government where the majority are united by a common interest or passion the rights of the minority are in danger. "The only remedy is to enlarge the sphere, & thereby divide the community into so great a number of interests & parties, that in the 1st place a majority will not be likely at the same moment to have a common interest separate from that of the whole or of the minority; and in the 2d place, that in case they shd. have such an interest, they may not be apt to unite in the pursuit of it. It was incumbent on us then to try this remedy, and with that view to frame a republican system on such a scale and in such a form as will controul all the evils wch. have been experienced."[50] What Brutus saw as a great defect of the Constitution—that the legislature "would be composed of such heterogeneous and discordant principles, as would constantly be contending with each other"[51]—James Madison and others saw as its greatest virtue. In a large, diverse, wealthy country men can find ample opportunity to gratify their private wants; they will be less likely to resent the success and to encroach on the rights of others, and such resentment as they do feel will be less likely to take dangerous political form. "Divide et impera," the reprobated axiom of tyranny, is, under certain qualifications, the only policy by which a republic can be administered on just principles.[52]

The trouble with the Anti-Federalists, in this view, was that they saw civil society as a teacher, as a molder of character, rather than as a regulator of conduct. Their mentality was like that expressed in a 1776 proclamation of the Massachusetts General Court:

> That piety and virtue, which alone can secure the freedom of any people, be encouraged, and vice and immorality suppressed, the Great and General Court have thought fit to issue this Proclamation, commanding and enjoining it upon the good people of this colony that they lead sober, religious, and peacable lives, avoiding all blasphemies, contempt of the Holy Scriptures and of the Lord's Day, and all other crimes and misdemeanors, all debauchery, profaneness, corruption, venality, all riotous and tumultuous proceedings and all immoralities whatsoever, and that they decently and reverently attend the publick worship of God.[53]

Preaching like this, whether in the form of a direct injunction or the supposed functioning of the small republic, seemed to the Federalists ineffective, or at least grossly insufficient. No matter how strong the preaching or the community surveillance, men's interests will not be subdued or governed by considerations of public good, moral duty, or religious salvation.*[54] To warnings like that of Anti-Federalist Thomas Wait that to try to subject the vast continent of America to a democracy would be as futile as trying "to rule Hell by Prayer,"[55] the Federalist reply was, in effect, that little democracies can no more be ruled by prayer than large ones. Men act mainly from passion and interest. The Constitution was deliberately and properly designed not to try to stifle or transform those motives—to try to rule them by prayer—but to channel them in the direction of the public good.

6
The Aristocratic Tendency of the Constitution

The Federalist argument that we have been considering rejects as unrealistic the traditional republican reliance on patriotism, on respect for reputation, on the restraints of conscience, even on the not very elevated principle that honesty is the best policy. It relies instead on a constitutional system within which the strongest natural forces—particularly the passion of acquisitiveness or avarice—are not stifled (a hopeless endeavor) but are guided into channels conducive to the public good, or channels that at least make it extremely difficult for anyone to tyrannize over anyone else. The chief source of danger is always whatever element of society enjoys the right to rule, because it can tyrannize without usurpation. In republican government the problem is thus to prevent a tyranny of the majority or the many. The small republic cannot solve this problem; the well-constituted large republic can. Part of that solution lies, however, in a large, powerful government, even though that aspect of the solution is not prominent in Madison's classic formulation. For the Anti-Federalists that government is seen as itself the major problem.

More precisely the Anti-Federalists see the chief danger as the inherently aristocratic character of any government. All government is, more or less, government of the many by the few. This aristocratic character of organized civil society tends to become more severe and more selective over time, and the main efforts of constitution makers should be directed to at least putting obstacles in its way. The powerful, irresponsible government under the proposed Constitution, on the contrary, will hasten this tendency. "It changes, totally changes, the form of your present government. From a well-digested, well-formed democratic, you are at once rushing into an aristocratic government."[1] This is the underlying theme of a vast quantity of the specific criticism by the Anti-Federalists of the proposed Constitution.*[2]

Thus, so far as the proposed legislature was concerned, the Anti-Federalists criticized the House of Representatives, as we have seen, for providing only a shadow of representation; but their strongest indignation was reserved for the Senate, which represented for many of them all that was wrong with the Constitution. While seldom denying the need for a select body to check the excesses of the more popular assembly, they did object to giving this less popular branch of the legislature most of the critical powers of government. The mixture of legislative, executive, and judicial powers in the Senate violated the maxim of separation and seemed designed to lay the foundation for a permanent aristocracy.*[3] "[W]e have seen powers, in every branch of government, in violation of all principle, and all safety condensed in this aristocratic senate: we have seen the representative, or democratic branch, weakened exactly in proportion to the strengthening the aristocratic. . . ." The Senate was the "great efficient body" of this new government and the fetus of an aristocratic domination.[4]

The same theme runs through the Anti-Federalists' criticisms of the executive, though there was more ambiguity here than might be expected. Many Anti-Federalists thought that a unitary executive was necessary, for the sake of both efficiency and responsibility, and agreed with The Federal Farmer that the office of the President and the mode of his election were well conceived. There was a fair amount of sympathy for a strong (even, under some circumstances, a hereditary) executive to resist the aristocratic tendencies of the legislature; and some of the Anti-Federalists objected that the President would be too weak to stand up to the Senate and would become a mere tool of aristocratic domination.[5] The Federal Farmer went so far as to justify a strong executive as providing that unifying "first man" that even republics need.[6] The more common Anti-Federal view, however, was a rather pedestrian hostility to a strong executive. Some continued to argue in favor of a plural executive or an executive council, as Randolph and Mason had done in Philadelphia, to avoid the danger of monarchy and dominance by one section.[7] Many objected that with his veto, his powers as commander-in-chief, his powers of appointment, and his general authority to see that the laws are faithfully executed, the "President-General"—as many of them called him, after the executive officer in the Galloway Plan of Union in 1774—could find justification for almost anything he might wish to do.[8] Young William Symmes shrewdly anticipated the grounds of later Presidential expansion.

> But was ever a commission so brief, so general, as this of our President? Can we exactly say how far a faithful execution of the laws may extend? or what may be called or comprehended in a faithful execution? If the President be guilty of a misdemeanor, will he not take care to have this excuse? And should it turn against him, may he not plead a mistake! or is he bound to understand the laws, or their operation? Should a Federal law happen to be as generally expressed as the President's authority; must he not interpret the Act! For in many cases he must execute the laws independent of any judicial decision. And should the legislature direct the mode of executing the laws, or any particular law, is he obliged to comply, if he does not think it will amount to a faithful execution? For to suppose that the legislature can make laws to affect the office of President, is to destroy his independence, and in this case to supersede the very constitution. Is there no instance in which he may reject the sense of the legislature, and establish his own, and so far, would he not be to all intents and purposes absolute?[9]

Better, said Patrick Henry, a dictator in times of need, like the one we had in 1781, who was chosen for his personal qualities and who rendered up his power after using it gloriously, rather than this American presidency which can scarcely be expected to be filled by a train of such men.[10]

In the Constitutional provisions for the judiciary, too, the Anti-Federalists thought they saw the tracks of a consolidating aristocracy. The weakening of the place of the jury, the provision for a complete system of national courts, the extensive jurisdiction of the national judiciary, the provision for appeal to the Supreme Court on questions of fact as well as law, and the supremacy of the Constitution and the laws and treaties made thereunder all seemed to give enormous power over the vital daily concerns of men to a small group of irresponsible judges.[11] Although the broadest reaches of the judiciary, described subsequently by Hamilton and Marshall, were seldom canvassed during the ratification debates, the Anti-Federalists glimpsed enough to make them wary.[12] The most farsighted of them, Brutus, very accurately anticipated the breadth with which the Supreme Court would construe its own powers and those of the general legislature and the line of reasoning that would be used. "I question whether the world ever saw, in any period of it, a court of justice invested with such immense powers, and yet placed in a situation so little responsible." Brutus predicted, moreover, the judicial review of acts of Congress and the consequent supremacy of an irresponsibile judiciary. "If . . . the legislature pass any laws, inconsistent with the sense the judges put upon the constitution, they will declare it void; and therefore in this respect their power is superior to that of the legislature."[13] The Federal Farmer joined Brutus in trying to show that the federal judiciary was a threat not only to state courts and to individuals but to the regime as a whole. Americans, accustomed to look to courts as checks on legislative and executive excesses, had forgotten their inherent arbitrariness. "We are not sufficiently attentive to the circumstances, that the measures of popular legislatures naturally settle down in time, and gradually approach a mild and just medium; while the rigid systems of the law courts naturally become more severe and arbitrary, if not carefully tempered and guarded by the constitution, and by laws, from time to time." Indeed, The Federal Farmer concluded—in direct contradiction to Publius' later contention that the judiciary was politically the "least dangerous" department—that "we are more in danger of sowing the seeds of arbitrary government in this department than in any other."[14] Thus some Anti-Federalists saw the general judiciary as a locus from which an irresponsible aristocracy of legal skill might gradually and irresistibly encroach on the more popular parts of government, an anticipation of more recent concerns about the implications of legal rationality and bureaucratization.

In reply to all of these objections, the Anti-Federalists complained, they were told, "trust your rulers; they will be good men." According to the Federalists, Centinel said, "a good administration will atone for all the defects in the government, which, say they, you must necessarily have, for how can it be otherwise, your rulers are to be taken from among yourselves."[15] A considerable amount of Anti-Federalist heat on this subject was generated by Judge Thomas McKean, who was reported to have said in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention that "though a good system is certainly a blessing, yet the wealth, the prosperity, and the freedom of the people, must ultimately depend upon the administration of the best government. The wisdom, probity and patriotism of the rulers, will ever be the criterion of public prosperity; and hence it is, that despotism, if well administered, is the best form of government invented by human ingenuity."*[16] Few Federalists went so far. Indeed, their principal argument was precisely that the interior arrangements of the Constitution were premised on a very realistic view of the untrustworthiness of rulers and cautiously provided "by opposite and rival interests, the defect of better motives." In the new system, "interest and integrity will be connected by the closest ties."[17] Nevertheless all the Federalists insisted that there must be some degree of confidence in rulers. Some relied heavily on the wisdom and virtue of the men they expected to be in charge of the new government. Thus a Federalist writer in Georgia contended that "none will be distinguished with places of trust but those who possess superior talents and accomplishments. . . ." Cassius, in a reply to Richard Henry Lee, argued that the House of Representatives would consist of men "of unsullied reputations;—of men, in whose bosoms the sacred principle of patriotism has, always, glowed in its utmost purity;—of men, who, in every possible situation of affairs, have, invariably, discovered an uncorruptible attachment to their country. . . ."[18] More commonly, however, the Federalist position was that jealousy of rulers must be kept within some kind of bounds, and not "extended to a degree which is degrading and humiliating to human nature. . . ."[19] "It is said that there ought to be jealousy in mankind," said Iredell. "I admit it as far as is consistent with prudence; but unlimited jealousy is very pernicious."[20] "[M]ean jealousy and groundless distrusts . . . in some measure authorize [our representatives] to betray their trust. . . ."[21] In the balanced terms of Publius, "the supposition of universal venality in human nature is little less an error in political reasoning than the supposition of universal rectitude. The institution of delegated power implies that there is a portion of virtue and honor among mankind, which may be a reasonable foundation of confidence."[22]

Nevertheless the extent to which the Federalists were willing to rely on the virtue and honor of the rulers seemed to the Anti-Federalists foolish or suspicious. A wise people will never place themselves in the hands of arbitrary government in the hopes that it will be virtuous. "Let us not flatter ourselves that we shall always have good men to govern us." The Spirit of '76 was not trust in rulers. "Confidence," Elbridge Gerry said in Philadelphia, "is the road to tyranny."[23] Of course no one denied that confidence is a necessary part of representative government (though it could be argued that that is precisely one of the reasons why representative government is so problematical), and the Anti-Federalists wanted to provide a basis for a reasonable degree of confidence by, among other things, increasing the representation in the House of Representatives. But public office tends to attract bad men and to bring out the worst in good ones. "[C]onstitutions are not so necessary to regulate the conduct of good rulers as to restrain that of bad ones." "Scruples would be impertinent," Robert Lansing told the New York convention, "arguments would be in vain, checks would be useless, if we were certain our rulers would be good men; but for the virtuous government is not instituted: its object is to restrain and punish vice; and all free constitutions are formed with two views—to deter the governed from crime, and the governors from tyranny." And while the Anti-Federalists, with Melancton Smith, would not affirm that all men are dishonest, in forming a constitution it is well to be on the safe side and assume that they are.[24]

The irony is that whereas "the primary object of government" is "to check and controul the ambitious and designing," government tends to become itself the tool of these very men. Thus the overriding concern of the founder, the statesman, and the alert citizen should be the danger of insidious usurpation by the few, the inevitable and persistent pressure of "the artful and ever active aristocracy."[25] If the people will not or cannot govern themselves, the few will do it; and the fact is that the people generally cannot govern themselves, at least not outside their small communities, which is another argument for the small republic.[26] The few never sleep, while the many are rarely truly awake. "The aristocracy," said A [Maryland] Farmer, "who move by system and design, and always under the colourable pretext of securing property, act as has been frequently said like the screw in mechanics, always gaining, holding fast what it gains, and never loosing; and in the event has ever proved an overmatch for the multitude, who never act but from their feelings, and are never permitted to feel until it is too late. . . ."[27] Were the people always attentive, they could call unfaithful lawmakers home and send others; but they are not always attentive. Thus except under the rare circumstances of the small, homogeneous republic (and perhaps even then) rigorous provision for popular responsibility is not sufficient. "Virtue will slumber," Patrick Henry warned. "The wicked will be continually watching: Consequently you will be undone."*[28]

7
Complex Government

A people can protect themselves, with what ultimate effect remains uncertain, from their own neglectful slumber and the encroachment of the watchful few through properly formed constitutions.[1] Through limited grants of power, tight responsibility, and internal checks, the few may be prevented from doing much harm while the people drowse or pursue their private lives. But it is important to do the job properly while the people are attentive, and this is why the Anti-Federalists distrusted proposals to ratify the Constitution in expectation of future amendments. "[W]e are to expect the ardour of many, yea, of most people, will be abated;—their exertions will cease, or be languid, and they will sit down easy, although they may see that the constitution . . . does not sufficiently guard the rights of the people, or secure them against the encroachments of their rulers." They will consider the work done and neglect their liberties. "Besides, the human mind cannot continue intensely engaged for any great length of time upon one object. As after a storm, a calm generally succeeds, so after the minds of a people have been ardently employed upon a subject, especially upon that of government, we commonly find that they become cool and inattentive. . . ." Future amendments are a weak reliance. "The deed is executed—the conveyance is made—and the power of reassuming the right is gone, without the consent of the parties.—Besides, when a government is once in operation, it acquires strength by habit, and stability by exercise."[2] Before the labyrinth of amendment can be traced, "perhaps the great principles upon which our late glorious revolution was founded, will be totally forgotten."[3]

The great principle of the revolution can be expressed for present purposes as the doctrine of limited government. The Federalists and Anti-Federalists agreed that government is properly directed to the pursuit of limited ends, namely the security of individual rights; and there was very little debate about limited government in this fundamental sense, although, as we have seen, the Anti-Federalists thought the defenders of the Constitution sometimes exceeded these limits.[4] But the chief concern of limited government for the Founding generation was with subordinate limits on governmental action. And here differences begin. The first of these subordinate limits is responsibility to the people. The second is limited powers. These were the major concern of the Anti-Federalists, as we have seen, and for many they were all that mattered. To this attitude the Federalists' impatient and powerful rejoinder was that it is not sufficient to talk of the dangers of the powers granted when all admit that broad powers are necessary, or to hark back to direct popular responsibility when all agree that a simple democracy would be both impracticable and positively undesirable. The way to limit government effectively is not by niggardly grants of power—which can only result in a government incapable of doing its work except by violating the Constitution—or by simple structure—which can only invite tyranny—but by a properly designed complex internal structure.

In the Federalists' view, one of the Founders' supreme achievements was the construction of a marvelous limited government in this third and crucial sense. Thus Alexander Hamilton argued in the New York Convention that the system of checks and balances in the Constitution "is so complex, so skilfully contrived, that it is next to impossible that an impolitic or wicked measure should pass the scrutiny with success."[5] But where Hamilton saw a finely wrought clock, the Anti-Federalists saw darkness and danger. They found the Constitution inexplicit, obscure, and dangerously complex. "A constitution," Patrick Henry said, "ought to be, like a beacon, held up to the public eye, so as to be understood by every man." But "this government is of such an intricate and complicated nature, that no man on this earth can know its real operation."[6] "[W]here is the man who can see through the constitution to its effects?" another Anti-Federalist asked. "The constitution of a wise and free people, ought to be as evident to simple reason, as the letters of our alphabet—."[7] The Constitution did not establish any identifiable kind of government. It was illegitimate as well as obscure. Again and again, the Anti-Federalists spat out their scorn of this "spurious brat," "this bantling," this "13 horned monster," "this heterogeneous phantom."[8] "What kind of government is this?" asked Patrick Henry. "Is this a Monarchy, like England—a compact between Prince and people; with checks on the former, to secure the liberty of the latter? Is this a Confederacy, like Holland—an association of a number of independent States, each of which retain its individual sovereignty? It is not a democracy, wherein the people retain all their rights securely."[9] The "favoured bantling" would have had no name, even, had not James Wilson, "in the fertility of his genius, suggested the happy epithet of a Federal Republic."[10]

Yet if the government had been truly a federal government, no complex internal checks would have been necessary. Luther Martin explained "that a federal government is formed by the States, as States that is in their sovereign capacities, in the same manner as treaties and alliances are formed—That a sovereignty considered as such, cannot be said to have jarring interests or principles, the one aristocratic, and the other democratic; but that the principles of a sovereignty considered as a sovereignty, are the same, whether that sovereignty is monarchical, aristocratical, democratical, or mixed—."[11] As we have seen, however, most of the Anti-Federalists admitted the need for something other than a federal government for the United States, and they admitted in consequence the need for a structure more complex than an assembly of sovereigns.*[12] Indeed, it is striking that while the Anti-Federalists often defended the pre-eminent place of the states in the general government formed by the Articles of Confederation and its very limited powers, they very seldom defended the absence from that government of any differentiation of functions or internal checks.

We come, then, to the question of the structure of the government. Cecelia Kenyon is generally correct in saying that the Anti-Federalists favored a system of separation of powers and checks and balances and would have dissented from the view that checks and balances are incompatible with genuine popular government.[13] The Anti-Federalists typically criticized the Constitution because there was too little separation, not too much, and too few checks, not too many. Yet it is not quite accurate to say, as Kenyon does, that no one among the Anti-Federalists "attacked the general validity of the system of separation of powers and checks and balances." The full explanation is more complex.

One of the major Anti-Federalist statements, the first essay by Centinel, does in fact contain a vigorous attack on the very principle of checks and balances.[14] Centinel chose for his target John Adams, whose discussion of balanced government was probably the best preconstitutional treatment of this matter and was considered by Centinel to have been influential among the Philadelphia delegates.*[15] While considering the differences between Adams and the Anti-Federalists, however, we shall also need to see that in their understanding of balanced government they stand together in contrast to the great theoreticians of the Constitution, such as James Madison and James Wilson. "Mr. Adams's sine qua non of a good government," Centinel wrote, "is three balancing powers whose repelling qualities are to produce an equilibrium of interests, and thereby promote the happiness of the whole community." Adams' view is that the governors will always be actuated by self-interest and therefore that it is necessary "to create an opposition of interests between the members of two distinct bodies, in the exercise of the powers of government, and balanced by those of a third."[16] According to Adams—and we are no longer relying on Centinel's report—there have been only three discoveries in the constitution of free government since the time of Lycurgus: "representation, instead of collections of the people; a total separation of the executive from the legislative power, and of the judicial from both; and a balance in the legislature, by three independent, equal branches. . . ."[17] The issue of representation need not concern us at present. The other two modern discoveries are of the utmost importance for the present discussion. As we shall see, the Anti-Federalists accepted and advocated a separation of legislative, executive, and judicial powers (or functions) and a system of checks and balances among them to maintain the separation and to avoid a concentration of power. But Adams' "balance" is essentially a balance within the legislature, and more important it is a balance of "orders" in the community—not hereditary orders but the natural arrangements of many, few, and one. This view cuts across and gets intertwined with the notion of a separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial functions; but the basic concern is with the balance of the different parts of the community, their different interests, and their different claims to rule, whether those parts are king, lords, commons; the many and the few; or any other fundamental differentiation.[18] This approach grows out of the great tradition of the mixed regime.*[19] As we shall see, the major Federalist theoreticians sharply modified or even abandoned this approach, providing a new statement of the whole issue of balanced government. Before considering this, however, we need to pursue further the Anti-Federalists' disagreement with Adams. For it is here, more than in their responses to specific provisions of the Constitution, that their own view of the question of "mixed" or "complex" or "balanced" government becomes most clear.

What is crucial for this purpose is that Adams directly and explicitly rejects the idea of simple government. Centinel, on the other hand, advocates simple government, and most of the Anti-Federalists were at least inclined in that direction, despite all their participation in the discussion about balances. Centinel contends that a system such as Adams' is beyond the wisdom of man to establish and maintain and that it would in any case not accomplish its objectives. "If the administrators of every government are actuated by views of private interest and ambition, how is the welfare and happiness of the community to be the result of such jarring adverse interests?" The true principle—or perhaps it would be better to say the pure or primary principle—of free government is not balance but responsibility. "I believe it will be found that the form of government, which holds those entrusted with power, in the greatest responsibility to their constituents, the best calculated for freemen." A republican or free government can only exist where the people are virtuous and property evenly distributed; "in such a government the people are the sovereign and their sense or opinion is the criterion of every public measure; for when this ceases to be the case, the nature of government is changed, and an aristocracy, monarchy or despotism will rise on its ruin."[20] This is of course a version of the argument for the small republic that we have considered above. Responsibility is best attained in a government of simple structure, under which the people can quickly and easily identify the source of abuse. Complex governments, A [Maryland] Farmer argued, "seem to bid defiance to all responsibility, (the only true test of good government) as it can never be discovered where the fault lies. . . ."[21]

If this is a basic Anti-Federalist position, or at least tendency, why was it not more often explicitly put forward? Why did the Anti-Federalists spend most of their time arguing about the inadequacy of the checks and balances provided in the Constitution rather than taking a firm stand for simple and responsible government? Part of the reason is that the conditions for simple government did not exist in the case of the general government; but there is a deeper problem, which is connected with the aristocratic tendency of government that we have already discussed.[22] The case for simple government never seems to be squarely put, either in theory or in practice. The extraordinary men, who have an interest in great, enterprising, ambitious government, are in control of both the councils of state and the theory books.

> Is it . . . possible that governments of simplicity and equal right, can have been fairly dealt by in theory or practice? The votaries of tyranny and usurpation stand not alone—in bitter opposition; every man of enterprize, or superior talents and fortune, is interested to debase them; their banners have ever been deserted because they never can pay their troops.—The most amiable and sensible of mankind seems to have made a stand in favour of a mixed government, founded on the permanent orders and objects of men. Thither I suspect the American government is now tending. If it must be so—Let it go gently then—with slow and equal steps.[23]

It is almost as if the fate of simple government is sealed once simple government is questioned or challenged—which means whenever any man exercises his greater ambition, or wisdom, or virtue. As the Anti-Federalists saw an inevitable aristocratic impulse in civil society, so they saw an irresistible tendency toward complex government. And however much they regretted it—and unlike the Federalists they did regret it—they saw more or less the necessity of accepting this tendency and putting it to the service of liberty. John Adams stressed that there are numerous sources of inequality even in America, arising from differences "founded in the constitution of nature" in wealth, talents, and family background. These differences give rise to a "natural aristocracy," which "forms a body of men which contains the greatest collection of virtues and abilities in a free government, is the brightest ornament and glory of the nation, and may always be made the greatest blessing of society, if it be judiciously managed in the constitution." But the natural aristocracy must be managed; otherwise it is dangerous and cannot fail to lead to the destruction of the commonwealth. The instrument of management is a carefully designed complex government.[24] However tempting the Anti-Federalists found Turgot's contention that complex government was unnecessary in America because there were no fixed orders and all men were equal, they saw the force of Adams' rebuttal. Thus A [Maryland] Farmer, one of the strongest advocates among the Anti-Federalists of simple government, was driven to conclude that the great task of a free people is to manage and control the natural aristocracy. "In fine, in all governments by representation or delegation of power, where property is secured by fixed and permanent laws, from the rage of the populace on one side, and the tyranny of a despot on the other, the aristocracy will and must rule; that is a number of the wealthiest individuals, and the heads of great families:—The perfection of all political wisdom is so to temper this aristocracy as to prevent oppression." A [Maryland] Farmer's view both of the problem and the solution was much like Adams': "The only remedy the ingenuity of man has discovered for this evil is—a properly constituted and independent executive, a vindex injuriarum—an avenger of public wrongs; who with the assistance of a third estate, may enforce the rigor of equal law on those who are otherwise above the fear of punishment. . . ."[25] The result was of course a much less unfavorable view of a strong executive and even of hereditary orders than might have been expected.

Many Anti-Federalists shared something of this view, though few had A [Maryland] Farmer's insight. The Anti-Federal position is characterized, finally, not so much by a commitment to simple government as by a strong tendency to think in terms of a great and traditional alternative: on the one hand, simple, responsible government based on a small homogeneous population, and on the other hand, complex, balanced government based on more or less fixed and permanent orders. The Anti-Federalists were likely to hold that simple (or relatively simple) government is more conducive to freedom, that it should be preserved as long as possible, and that a hasty and crude attempt to imitate more mature forms can only be disastrous;[26] but many saw merit in a balance of orders, as well as a more or less irresistible tendency in that direction. Their argument was that the Constitution failed to provide adequately for either simple government or balanced government. It was an imitation of the British government, built without the essential British materials.

"In the British Government there are real balances and checks," Patrick Henry argued; "In this system, there are only ideal balances. . . . The President and Senators have nothing to lose. They have not that interest in the preservation of the Government, that the King and Lords have in England. They will therefore be regardless of the interests of the people." This absence of checks based on the interests of permanent orders was what Henry meant when he said, "tell me not of checks on paper, but tell me of checks founded on self-love."*[27] Henry, who had earlier objected that the Constitution had a squint toward monarchy, was teased for his warm praise of the British monarchy; but he freely owned "that if you cannot love a Republican Government, you may love the British monarchy. . . ."[28] In America there could be no genuine monarchy; nor were there the social materials for a genuine differentiation of the two branches of the legislature. Thus The Federal Farmer warned that "the partitions between the two branches will be merely those of the building in which they sit: there will not be found in them any of those genuine balances and checks, among the real different interests, and efforts of the several classes of men in the community we aim at; nor can any such balances and checks be formed in the present condition of the United States in any considerable degree of perfection. . . ." The Federal Farmer thought that it was impossible that a Senate organized on "pure principles" could offset the democratic House of Representatives, and this important explanation followed:

I say, on pure principles; because I make a distinction between a senate that derives its weight and influence from a pure source, its numbers and wisdom, its extensive property, its extensive and permanent connections; and a senate composed of a few men, possessing small property, small and unstable connections, that derives its weight and influence from a corrupt or pernicious source; that is, merely from the power given it by the constitution and laws, to dispose of the public offices, and the annexed emoluments, and by those means to interest officers, and the hungry expectants of offices, in support of its measures. I wish the proposed senate may not partake too much of the latter description.*[29]

The Anti-Federalists were, here again, the conservatives, believing that the framers of the Constitution had fallen awkwardly and dangerously between the two stools of simple, responsible government and genuine balanced government. On the other hand, the Federalists claimed—or the most thoughtful of them did—that they had provided a new and better kind of balanced government. Consider, in contrast to The Federal Farmer's view of a senate, James Madison's proposal to his fellow delegates in Philadelphia. Madison argued that under American conditions the weight of the Senate would depend largely on the organization and powers given to it by the Constitution and not on anything intrinsic to its members or their social status. He urged the framers, that is to say, not to try to represent a certain social order or to represent property in the Senate (although neither of these is entirely absent, even in Madison's view), but to give their attention primarily to the constitutional organization, powers, and operation of the body, which would determine its weight and character and thus its part in the overall balance of the government.[30] The Constitution established neither a simple government nor a traditional mixture of orders or estates. Neither was it an attempt, following John Adams and favored (once simple government was admitted to be impracticable) by many Anti-Federalists, to represent and balance the natural orders that exist in any civilized community. It was something new, at least in the sense that it was a full working out of principles partially or incompletely expressed in the state constitutions and in earlier American thinking.[31] James Monroe saw the distinction clearly and, unlike many of his Anti-Federal colleagues, accepted the new view. In former governments, he explained, the object of the distribution of powers had been to maintain "a composition or mixture of aristocracy, democracy, and monarchy, each of which had a repellent quality which enabled it to preserve itself from being destroyed by the other two; so that the balance was continually maintained." In America, on the other hand, the object of the division of power is to provide "a more faithful and regular administration," and to prevent a union of governmental power, with all its dangers for the people.*[32] It is this new kind of balanced government that is described and defended in The Federalist and of which James Madison is the chief theoretician.

This new kind of balanced government can best be explored by approaching it through the separation of powers, the need for which, as Cecelia Kenyon correctly says, the Anti-Federalists fully accepted. A Pennsylvania Anti-Federalist made a common complaint when he wrote of the proposed Constitution that "the LEGISLATIVE and EXECUTIVE powers are not kept separate as every one of the American constitutions declares they ought to be; but they are mixed in a manner entirely novel and unknown, even in the constitution of Great Britain. . . ."[33] Even Centinel, who advocated a unicameral legislature, assumed as a matter of course "separating the executive and judicial." He argued, indeed, that "the chief improvement in government, in modern times, has been the compleat separation of the great distinctions of power; placing the legislative in different hands from those which held the executive; and again severing the judicial part from ordinary administrative." And Brutus, while contending for the principle of strict accountability to the people, went on to say that "to have a government well administered in all its parts, it is requisite the different departments of it should be separated and lodged as much as may be in different hands."[34]

The assumption behind such a separation (although neither Federalists nor Anti-Federalists give it much attention) is that all governments perform certain kinds of functions, which are best performed in distinctive ways and by distinctive kinds of bodies. "It is one of the greatest advantages of a government of different branches, that each branch may be conveniently made conformable to the nature of the business assigned to it. . . .[35] The legislative function requires large numbers, more or less public gatherings, procedures to foster deliberation, etc. The executive function requires, as was said so often, secrecy, energy and dispatch. Judging requires manifest impartiality and special training in the artificial reasoning of the law. With each branch distinct from the others, each can perform its function in its appropriate way. This division is not aimed primarily at mutual checking but at the efficient performance of certain kinds of tasks.[36] But two considerations of mutual checking immediately enter. First, there is a political dividend arising out of the functional distinction and the independence of the several branches: if one department becomes tyrannical or stupid, the others may remain sound and thus, to some extent, prevent tyranny or stupidity from seizing the whole government. Second, however, the functional distinction needs to be secured. To maintain their distinctiveness the different branches must be independent, and they require some defense of their independence. Mere parchment barriers will not suffice. Each branch will tend to encroach on the others, if only because of the extreme difficulty of drawing perfectly clear lines between their respective functions. "After discriminating, therefore, in theory, the several classes of power, as they may in their nature be legislative, executive, or judiciary, the next and most difficult task is to provide some practical security for each, against the invasion of the others."[37] There are two ways of doing this: by providing an appeal to some common superior—in this case presumably the people themselves—or by providing a capacity of self-defense in the several branches. The former, apart from its other difficulties, is scarcely feasible for everyday use in a large and diverse country, and it was not in fact advocated as such by the Anti-Federalists.[38] The latter was the main reliance in the Constitution, as it had been in Britain and in the states. This required that the three branches be brought into legitimate contact with one another to avoid illegitimate encroachment; they must be brought together for the purpose of keeping them apart.[39] Thus the executive might be given a veto over legislation for the purpose of securing executive independence, which is in turn necessary to perform effectively the executive function. Most of the Anti-Federalists accepted this in principle,[40] although some seemed to think that even this limited "mixing" should be avoided, and many thought that the Constitution had gone so far in the mixing as to endanger the separation. While it is true that there may be an incidental security deriving from such checks, the emphasis intended is on the functional discrimination.

Another step in this argument is to regard separation as a way of promoting wise deliberation. Thus one Federalist writer denied Centinel's contention that the branches "were intended to balance one another," explaining that "they all have the same interest"—i.e., that they do not represent different estates or orders.[41] "The sole intention of [the separation] is to produce wise and mature deliberation. Experience teaches us that individuals or simple bodies of men are liable to rash and hasty decisions—to party influence and cabal—that we are generally fond of what originates with ourselves—and that another person of no greater ability than ourselves, will easily discern a blemish in our productions to which we are blind until it be pointed out."[42] Arguments like this were extensions of the view of the separation of powers as promoting the proper conduct of the government's business by keeping the bodies that perform the functions of government separate and distinct.

In practice it is easy to move from considerations of this kind to a different notion of "balanced government," in which the separation of governmental power and mutual checking are seen as desirable quite apart from functional differentiation. In principle, however, this second view originates not with different governmental functions and their different modes but with government or political power per se. Political power is necessary but it is dangerous, and a way of guarding against the danger is to divide the power and arrange it in ways that prevent too much of it from accumulating in any one set of hands. Since the sovereign power in a state was traditionally held to reside in the legislature, the problem of concentration of power and the solution of dividing and balancing power were often applied to the legislature only.*[43] There is no necessary identity between this separation of power, as we may call it, and the earlier separation of functions. A usual view would have been that there should be a separation of the legislative, executive, and judicial functions and a separation and balancing of power within the legislature. (And this would be likely, in turn, to be connected, as in Adams' case, with the balancing of social orders.) However, a separation of functions and a separation of power easily become linked and confused. The functional differentiation can be used to distribute power.*[44] In particular, the legislature may not only be divided from within but it may be made part of a broader balance. The practical danger of legislative sovereignty is met by external as well as internal checks. And the theoretical claim of legislative sovereignty is met by the notion that the legislature is not sovereign but is the mere creature of the Constitution (behind which stands of course the people), which apportions power to the legislature and establishes limits on it as one among several instrumentalities of government and which enforces those limits by a nicely arranged scheme of constitutional (not merely legislative) balance.

The complex or balanced government provided for in the Constitution is, then, fundamentally a balance of constitutional orders or powers, blended with a constitutional differentiation of functions, formed by the makers of the Constitution and requiring only the impulse of popular consent to breathe life into it and the private interests and ambitions of citizens and representatives to keep it in motion. It was on this basis that James Wilson considered it the distinction of the Americans to have invented a mixed government made wholly out of popular elements. "What is the nature and kind of that government which has been proposed for the United States by the late Convention? In its principle, it is purely democratical. But that principle is applied in different forms, in order to obtain the advantages, and exclude the inconveniences, of the simple modes of government."*[45] The differences are not derived from natural or conventional differentiations of society but are constitutional or legal constructs.

In their different ways and according to their various capacities, the Anti-Federalists doubted the theoretical soundness, the practical feasibility, and even the good intentions of this new kind of balanced government.*[46] While accepting the need for a separation of functions—and typically insisting that the Constitution did not go far enough in this respect—the Anti-Federalists became uneasy as concern shifted to what we have called a separation and balancing of power. They conceded only reluctantly the insufficiency of simple popular government, and they were likely to judge constitutional arrangements according to how well they secured popular responsibility, a test that the proposed Constitution seemed to fail. Moreover, to the extent that the Anti-Federalists accepted the need for some form of complex government beyond a mere division of functions, they thought in traditional terms of a government composed of representatives of social orders—either the fixed orders of a mature Britain or the natural orders of a youthful America. Only such a mixture, intimately tied to the divisions inherent in society, could provide genuine checks among the parts of the government and thereby prevent the government from becoming independent of and hostile to the society. The Anti-Federalists admitted that there were slender materials for such a mixture in the United States, which was all the more reason for proceeding slowly and letting American government mature as American society matured. Instead, the framers rushed into a mere constitutional imitation of mixed government, which combined great powers with severely limited popular responsibility and ineffective internal checks.

8
Bill of Rights

It is often said that the major legacy of the Anti-Federalists is the Bill of Rights. Many of their suggestions found their way into the proposals for amendment made by state ratifying conventions and thence into the first ten amendments adopted in 1791. Three kinds of rights were stressed: the usual common law procedural rights in criminal prosecutions, liberty of conscience, and liberty of the press. The Anti-Federalists insisted that the Constitution should explicitly recognize the traditional procedural rights: to be safe from general search and seizure, to be indicted by grand jury, to trial by jury, to confront witnesses, and to be protected against cruel and unusual punishments. The most important of these was the trial by jury, and one of the most widely uttered objections against the Constitution was that it did not provide for (and therefore effectively abolished) trial by jury in civil cases. The Federalists' claim that practice among the states in this respect varied too much to provide a general rule was either denied by the Anti-Federalists or used as a further argument against the feasibility of consolidation. Regarding liberty of conscience, the Anti-Federalists' position was complex. Typically they favored both governmental encouragement of religion and liberty of individual conscience.[1] The first proposal of the minority of the Pennsylvania convention was that rights of conscience shall be held inviolable and that no state provision regarding liberty of conscience shall be abridged by the federal government.[2] Some Anti-Federalists professed to see in the prohibition against a religious test for officers of the United States a power to regulate religious beliefs in general, to which this prohibition was an exception.[3] The rights of conscience should be secured, even though there was no immediate threat. Times change, and "the seeds of superstition, bigotry and enthusiasm, are too deeply implanted in our minds, ever to be eradicated. . . ."[4] The third area of concern was liberty of the press, often declaimed upon by the Anti-Federalists as the palladium of American liberties.*[5] "It is the opinion of some great writers," Centinel argued, "that if the liberty of the press, by an institution of religion, or otherwise, could be rendered sacred, even in Turkey, that despotism would fly before it." "I say," another Anti-Federalist insisted, "that a declaration of those inherent and political rights ought to be made in a BILL OF RIGHTS, that the people may never lose their liberties by construction. If the liberty of the press be an inherent political right, let it be so declared, that no despot however great shall dare to gain say it."*[6] All of these concerns were pressed with enough vigor so that the Constitution was adopted only on the understanding that one of the first items of business of the new government would be the framing of amendments.

While the Federalists gave us the Constitution, then, the legacy of the Anti-Federalists was the Bill of Rights. But it is an ambiguous legacy, as can be seen by studying the debate. Indeed, in one sense, the success of the Bill of Rights reflects the failure of the Anti-Federalists. The whole emphasis on reservations of rights of individuals implied a fundamental acceptance of the "consolidated" character of the new government. A truly federal government needs no bill of rights. Indeed, there were some Federalists who tried to use the Anti-Federalists' federalism to destroy the Anti-Federalists' argument for a bill of rights (incidentally undermining their own position). One Alfredus contended, for example, that a bill of rights was not necessary because the Constitution was a compact not between individuals but between sovereign and independent societies.[7] This argument is easy enough to answer, and the Anti-Federalists often answered it: the government under the Constitution was not a mere compact of sovereign states—at least not in its operation—and it was not exempt from the need for a bill of rights on that account. But in making this reply the Anti-Federalists decisively abandoned the doctrine of strict federalism.

A more substantial "federal" argument against a bill of rights was made by James Wilson in his famous "State house speech" of 4 October 1787. Wilson acknowledged the maxim often put forward by the Anti-Federalists that in establishing governments all powers not expressly reserved are presumed to be granted, but he denied that it applied to the proposed general government, because that was to be a government of specifically enumerated powers. Whereas in the state constitutions the people "invested their representatives with every right and authority which they did not in explicit terms reserve," under the proposed Constitution "the congressional power is to be collected, not from tacit implication, but from the positive grant expressed in the instrument of the union. Hence, it is evident, that in the former case, everything which is not reserved is given; but in the latter the reverse of the proposition prevails, and everything which is not given is reserved." Thus, Wilson concluded, "it would have been superfluous and absurd to have stipulated with a federal body of our own creation, that we should enjoy those privileges of which we are not divested, either by the intention or the act that has brought the body into existence."[8] This is a substantial argument; it was heavily relied on by defenders of the Constitution; and the basic theory on which it rests has become a part of American constitutional orthodoxy. Yet it has some serious difficulties, especially when applied to the question of a bill of rights.

Wilson's position depends on the assumption that the "powers" delegated to the government are fairly easily identifiable and unambiguous.

Thus, for example, he contended that there is no "power" granted to the federal government "to regulate literary publications" and therefore no need for a reservation in favor of liberty of the press. If Congress should enact such a law, the judges would declare it null and void because "inconsistent with those powers vested by this instrument in Congress. . . ."[9] But (even leaving aside the question of libel and seditious libel)[10] the general government is given authority to lay and collect taxes and to regulate commerce, for example, and could not either of these be used to stifle the press? More generally, does not the general government, in the pursuit of its delegated powers, have implied powers that need to be limited for the sake of individual liberties? Cannot the federal government define crimes and criminal procedures, in connection with federal postal regulations, for example; and is there not therefore a need for procedural restraints of the traditional kind? Brutus made the argument thus: "The powers, rights, and authority, granted to the general government by this constitution, are as complete, with respect to every object to which they extend, as that of any state government—It reaches to every thing which concerns human happiness—Life, liberty, and property, are under its controul. There is the same reason, therefore, that the exercise of power, in this case, should be restrained within proper limits, as in that of the state governments."[11]

The constitutional grant of power to Congress—so laconic and broad—is an argument in favor of a bill of rights, not against it. In fact, said the satirical Aristocrotis, "this constitution is much better and gives more scope to the rulers than they durst safely take if there was no constitution at all; for then the people might contend that the power was inherent in them; and that they had made some implied reserves in the original grant; but now they cannot, for every thing is expressly given away to government in this plan."[12] Who can overrule the pretensions of Congress that any particular law is "necessary and proper"? "No one; unless we had a bill of rights to which we might appeal, and under which we might contend against any assumption of undue power and appeal to the judicial branch of the government to protect us by their judgements."[13]

The inadequacy of Wilson's argument is further demonstrated by the presence in the Constitution of a truncated bill of rights. Why was there any need to restrict the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus or to prohibit granting titles of nobility? Where were such powers granted? The very few Federalists who made any attempt to meet this objection sought to show that these were exceptions to implied powers,[14] but this only reenforced the contention that the "powers" granted are anything but simple and unambiguous—that they are in fact complex and doubtful and capable of great extension.

Nor was it any use to point, as some Federalists did, to the state bills of rights or to the general principles of the common law. The Constitution is an original compact, dependent on nothing but itself. It "is not dependent on any other book for an explanation, and contains no reference to any other book. All the defences of it, therefore, so far as they are drawn from the state constitutions, or from maxims of the common law, are foreign to the purpose."[15]

Even if it were granted that a bill of rights was, strictly speaking, unnecessary, the Anti-Federalists asked, why not be safe? What is the harm? Would it, Patrick Henry asked, have taken too much paper? One answer was that a bill of rights would be positively dangerous, because, as Wilson explained, "it would imply that whatever is not expressed was given, which is not the principle of the proposed constitution."[16] There is some basis for this view. Yet the Anti-Federalists could forcefully contend that any harm of this kind had already been done by the reservations in behalf of individual rights included in the Constitution. And, all things considered, this Federalist argument seemed a bit sophistical. "This indeed is a distinction of which the votaries of scholastic philosophy might be proud—but in the political world, where reason is not cultivated independently of action and experience, such futile distinctions ought not to be agitated."[17]

Despite all their rhetorical emphasis on a bill of rights, however, the Anti-Federalists were typically quite doubtful about the practical utility of this kind of provision in the new Constitution. Thus Samuel Chase wrote to John Lamb, "A declaration of rights alone will be of no essential service. Some of the powers must be abridged, or public liberties will be endangered, and, in time, destroyed."[18] Of far more practical importance than bills of rights were the powers and structure of the general government—the unlimited power to tax, for example, and the inadequate representation in the federal legislature. A bill of rights, without more, would make little difference. Why, then, did the Anti-Federalists emphasize a bill of rights as much as they did? Why did they invite the brilliantly successful Federalist tactic of first standing fast on all points, then opening the door to a bill of rights and watching the Anti-Federalists stumble through it to a strong national government? In some cases they doubted that they could win on the greater questions. In many cases they must have been influenced by the rhetorical attractiveness of arguments for bills of rights compared to arguments about state prerogatives and federal powers. But there were also deeper reasons. The debate over the bill of rights was an extension of the general debate over the nature of limited government, and at this level the Anti-Federalists can perhaps claim a substantial, though not unmitigated, accomplishment.

"I presume," one Anti-Federalist wrote, "that the liberty of a nation depends, not on planning the frame of government, which consists merely in fixing and delineating the powers thereof; but on prescribing due limits to those powers, and establishing them upon just principles."[19] Yet this seems a bit odd. If liberty depends on establishing limits on government, what is government itself for? The problem arises even more sharply in a comment by the wise Brutus: " . . . in forming a government on its true principles, the foundation should be laid . . . by expressly reserving to the people such of their essential natural rights, as are not necessary to be parted with."[20] Again, is this not putting the cart before the horse? However necessary a reservation of rights may be, how can the foundation of government be laid in reservations against that very government? To answer that question is to grasp the Anti-Federalist case for a bill of rights in its most fundamental aspect.

The Federalists contended that the proponents of a bill of rights failed to grasp the crucial fact that a constitution is a bill of rights. A bill of rights was unnecessary, Judge McKean told the Pennsylvania ratifying convention; "for in fact the whole plan of government is nothing more than a bill of rights—a declaration of the people in what manner they choose to be governed."[21] "What have we to do with bills of rights?" Edmund Randolph asked his fellow Virginians. Many states have none, and the predilection for it has arisen from a misunderstanding of its principles. In England, where the king might do what he liked in the absence of restraint, the bill of rights is needed; but in a republic it is useless if not dangerous.[22] A country free from its birth and resting on constitutions establishing government and granting its powers has no need to imitate the bills of rights of a country that established its liberty by gradual encroachments on royal prerogative.[23] The place to look for security of liberty is not in bills of rights, Benjamin Rush said, but in a pure and adequate representation. He considered it "an honor to the late convention, that this system has not been disgraced with a bill of rights," although he intended no reflection upon those states "which have encumbered their constitutions with that idle and superfluous instrument."[24] "Men in full possession and enjoyment of all their natural rights, cannot lose them but in two ways, either from their own consent, or from tyranny. This Constitution, neither implies the former, nor creates an avenue to the latter. Therefore no cause can operate to this effect,—because the people, are always both able and ready, to resist the encroachments of Supreme Power."[25]

One reply to these arguments—one that strikes the Federalists close to home—is that the supremacy of the people does not secure the rights of individuals and minorities against the majority. As we have seen, some of the Anti-Federalists argued that one of the functions of a bill of rights in a republican government is to serve as a check against majority faction. To the question, whom does a bill of rights protect in a popular government? Agrippa answered: "such a government is indeed a government by ourselves; but as a just government protects all alike, it is necessary that the sober and industrious part of the community should be defended from the rapacity and violence of the vicious and idle. A bill of rights therefore ought to set forth the purposes for which the compact is made, and serves to secure the minority against the usurpation and tyranny of the majority."[26]

Moreover, the Anti-Federalists contended that this constitution was not an adequate bill of rights. If ever there was a case for an explicit reservation of individual rights, the proposed constitution provided one, with its very extensive powers, its shadow of genuine representation, and its weak and dubious checks on the encroachments of the few. Identical considerations apply to the Federalist argument that the states would serve as powerful checks on the general government.[27] If the general government lays excessive taxes, "the constitution will provide . . . no remedy for the people or the states—the people must bear them, or have recourse, not to any constitutional checks or remedies, but to that resistance which is the last resort, and founded in self-defence."[28] The state legislatures can only check the general legislators "by exciting the people to resist constitutional laws."[29] The best of the Federalists understood the validity of this point. Although they judged the states' intrinsic advantages to be weightier, longer-lasting, and more dangerous than did the Anti-Federalists, they saw that the Constitution placed the weight of legality on the side of the federal government. The ultimate check is, indeed, the revolutionary one, made more significant, however, by the support and coherence that the state governments will lend the populace in case of such an ultimate resort. After all, Publius emphasized, along with many defenders of the Constitution, the ultimate security of the people rests in their understanding of their rights and their willingness to defend them.*[30]

This leads to the deepest level of the argument over a bill of rights. The final Federalist answer to the question, what harm can a bill of rights do? was the seldom explicitly stated fear that a bill of rights, especially undue emphasis on a bill of rights, might weaken government, which is the first protection of rights and which was in 1787 in particular need of strengthening. The first defense of individual rights is a government able to accomplish the necessary tasks of self-defense, regulation of commerce, administration of justice, etc. Loose and easy talk about rights was likely to distract attention from the difficult but fundamental business of forming a government capable of doing the things that have to be done to protect rights.*[31]

The Anti-Federalists replied that the need for government is not yet the bedrock of the free republic. For there remains the question, what does that government depend on? On nothing, as the Federalists themselves admit, but the people themselves, specifically on the people's understanding of the purpose of government, their sharp-eyed scrutiny of the actions of government, and their willingness to resist the encroachments of that government on their own behalf and that of their fellow citizens. An enumeration of individual rights and of the basic principles of free government at the head of the Constitution "can inspire and conserve the affection of the native country, they will be the first lesson of the young citizens becoming men, to sustain the dignity of their being. . . ." Specific reservations in favor of individual liberty actually strengthen republican government by strengthening the people's attachment to it.[32] Even admitting that all rights not expressly given up are reserved, and admitting of course that no bill of rights can add anything to men's natural rights, there are "infinite advantages," The Federal Farmer insisted, in an enumeration of reserved rights.

> We do not by declarations change the nature of things, or create new truths, but we give existence, or at least establish in the minds of the people truths and principles which they might never otherwise have thought of, or soon forgot. If a nation means its systems, religious or political, shall have duration, it ought to recognize the leading principles of them in the front page of every family book.[33]

This is the reason for bills of rights serving, as they often did in the state constitutions, as preambles, often of an exhortatory kind. This is the reason for apparently paradoxical arguments like that of Brutus, that reservations of individual rights precede, in principle, the very government against which those reservations are made. The fundamental case for a bill of rights is that it can be a prime agency of that political and moral education of the people on which free republican government depends. The famous Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776 held "that no free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles."[34] One of the main texts in which these principles are to be read is a well-formed bill of rights, reminding citizens of the beginning and therefore of the end of civil government.

9
Conclusion

The Anti-Federalists lost the debate over the Constitution not merely because they were less clever arguers or less skillful politicians but because they had the weaker argument. They were, as Publius said, trying to reconcile contradictions. There was no possibility of instituting the small republic in the United States, and the Anti-Federalists themselves were not willing to pay the price that such an attempt would have required. A basis for republican government and the solution of the problems of republican government had somehow to be found in the great and complex republic. To this task the framers directed their attention, and the Constitution was their magnificent response. The Federalists, moreover, reminded Americans that the true principle of the Revolution was not hostility to government but hostility to tyrannical government. They sought to recover the balance that Americans had lost in the zeal of revolution. "There is no quarrel between government and liberty; the former is the shield and protector of the latter. The war is between government and licentiousness, faction, turbulence, and other violations of the rules of society, to preserve liberty."[1]

In the commencement of a revolution which received its birth from the usurpations of tyranny, nothing was more natural than that the public mind should be influenced by an extreme spirit of jealousy. To resist these encroachments, and to nourish this spirit, was the great object of all our public and private institutions. The zeal for liberty became predominant and excessive. In forming our Confederation, this passion alone seemed to actuate us, and we appear to have had no other view than to secure ourselves from despotism. The object certainly was a valuable one, and deserved our utmost attention; but, sir, there is another object, equally important, and which our enthusiasm rendered us little capable of regarding: I mean a principle of strength and stability in the organization of our government, and vigor in its operations.*[2]

The framers of the Articles of Confederation, misled by the vigor and good sense displayed by the people during the war, made the "amiable mistake" of thinking that the Americans needed no government, "that the people of America only required to know what ought to be done to do it."[3] The Americans are, however, like other men, which is to say that they cannot be relied on to govern themselves voluntarily. The Anti-Federalists' fondness for the small republic and their concern with the inculcation of civic virtue amounted to an attempt to push aside this harsh truth.[4] Thus they refused to accept, or they accepted only halfheartedly, that the prime need was a government with a capacity to govern and not dependent for its goodness and trustworthiness on the everyday goodness and trustworthiness of the people or their representatives. The Constitution was designed so that, as far as possible, the ordinary operations of government would call for little more than the reliable inclination of men to follow their own interests, fairly narrowly understood. This system has been remarkably, if not gloriously, successful.

If, however, the foundation of the American polity was laid by the Federalists, the Anti-Federalist reservations echo through American history; and it is in the dialogue, not merely in the Federalist victory, that the country's principles are to be discovered. The Anti-Federalists were easily able to show that the Constitution did not escape reliance on republican virtue. One of the chief replies to the critics' descriptions of dangers of the new and powerful general government was that the American people could be trusted to elect good men to office and to keep them under scrutiny while there. There were frequent remarks like that of James Wilson that the framers must have assumed that the people and the states would give proper attention to the men elected to the legislature: "If they should now do otherwise, the fault will not be in Congress, but in the people . . . themselves. I have mentioned oftener than once, that for a people wanting to themselves, there is no remedy."[5] "Let the Americans be virtuous," an anonymous Federalist wrote, "let them be firm supporters of Republicanism—let them have confidence in their representatives—then their Liberties will be secured to them, and peace and prosperity will ensue."*[6] Nor were these only the arguments of lesser Federalist thinkers or the ones least free of the old reliance on civic virtue. Madison himself defended the provisions for representation on the ground that "the people will have virtue and intelligence to select men of virtue and wisdom." He went on to ask:

> Is there no virtue among us? If there be not, we are in a wretched situation. No theoretical checks, no form of government, can render us secure. To suppose that any form of government will secure liberty or happiness without any virtue in the people is a chimerical idea. If there be sufficient virtue and intelligence in the community, it will be exercised in the selection of these men; so that we do not depend on their virtue, or put confidence in our rulers, but in the people who are to choose them.[7]

Publius, too, perhaps the least equivocal advocate of the constitutional system of channeled self-interest, remarked that the genius of the American people is such as to make it unlikely that they will put up with the loss of their liberty, or will take no interest in the activities of the government, or will choose ignorant or bad men as representatives. The crucial point is conceded in The Federalist, no. 55, where Publius argues that "as there is a degree of depravity in mankind which requires a certain degree of circumspection and distrust, so there are other qualities in human nature, which justify a certain portion of esteem and confidence. Republican government presupposes the existence of these qualities in a higher degree than any other form."[8] Publius did not here name the "other qualities"—itself a point of some interest—but they must include an enlightened understanding of the objects of government, a degree of public-spiritedness, a participation in citizenship as distinct from a merely private life.

Given this kind of argument, the Anti-Federalists could rightly contend that the new Constitution does, after all, depend on something like republican virtue. It is distinguished not by emancipation from this old dependence but by a lack of much attention to the question of how that necessary republican virtue can be maintained. As they took for granted a certain kind of public-spirited leadership,*[9] so they took for granted the republican genius of the people; but that cannot prudently be taken for granted.

The Federalist solution not only failed to provide for the moral qualities that are necessary to the maintenance of republican government; it tended to undermine them. Will not the constitutional regime, the Anti-Federalists asked, with its emphasis on private, self-seeking, commercial activities, release and foster a certain type of human being who will be likely to destroy that very regime?

> It is alledged that the opinions and manners of the people of America, are capable to resist and prevent an extension of prerogative or oppression; but you must recollect that opinion and manners are mutable, and may not always be a permanent obstruction against the encroachments of government; that the progress of a commercial society begets luxury, the parent of inequality, the foe to virtue, and the enemy to restraint; and that ambition and voluptuousness aided by flattery, will teach magistrates, where limits are not explicitly fixed to have separate and distinct interests from the people, besides it will not be denied that government assimilates the manners and opinions of the community to it. Therefore, a general presumption that rulers will govern well is not a sufficient security.*[10]

Can a legal system for the regulation of private passions to the end that those passions may be more fully gratified serve as the foundation of civic virtue? Montesquieu argued that the virtue required in a republican government is "the love of laws and of our country," that such love "requires a constant preference of public to private interest," that "every thing . . . depends on establishing this love in a republic; and to inspire it ought to be the principal business of education. . . ."[11] The question is whether the Constitution, as the Federalists understood it, succeeded in laying that argument to rest. The Anti-Federalists contended that it did not; "Whatever the refinement of modern politics may inculcate, it still is certain that some degree of virtue must exist, or freedom cannot live." They rejected "Mandervill's [sic] position . . . 'that private vices are public benefits.' . . ."[12]

The Federalists did not, it should be emphasized, rely on some unseen hand to produce public good out of individual selfishness. The foundation was the Constitution, and the working of the system depended upon an attachment of the people to the Constitution. It was admitted that that attachment was not sufficiently assured by narrow self-interest. Whereas the Federalists regarded this as a somewhat peripheral problem, however, to be dealt with by avoiding certain kinds of mistakes and providing auxiliary institutions, such as judicial review, the Anti-Federalists saw it as a permanent and central concern of the republic.

The matter was canvassed most profoundly on the Federalist side by Publius in The Federalist, no. 49, and by Chief Justice John Marshall in his Opinion in Marbury v. Madison.[13] A brief consideration of the former will suffice for the present purpose. The specific question was how to settle disputes between the different departments of government and whether provision should be made, as Jefferson had suggested, for appeals in such cases to the people. Publius treated this proposal with great respect, due not only to its author but also to its theoretical cogency, given the principles of popular government; but he rejected it. Two arguments are of special importance here. First, he suggested that every appeal to the people "would carry on implication of some defect in the government," and "frequent appeals would in great measure deprive the government of that veneration, which time bestows on every thing, and without which perhaps the wisest and freest governments would not possess the requisite stability." While a nation of philosophers would be led to revere the laws by an enlightened reason, "in every other nation, the most rational government will not find it a superfluous advantage, to have the prejudices of the community on its side." Second, Publius pointed to the danger of "disturbing the public tranquillity by interesting too strongly the public passions. . . . Notwithstanding the success which has attended the revisions of our established forms of government and which does so much honor to the virtue and intelligence of the people of America, it must be confessed that the experiments are of too ticklish a nature to be unnecessarily multiplied."*[14]

The basis of this argument is a radical disjunction between the founding of the government and its operation. The circumstances conducive to the good operation of a government under a properly constructed constitution (e.g., a wide variety of interests) are extremely pernicious in the making or altering of the Constitution.[15] American constitutional reform occurred during a time when sharp diversities of opinion were muted and patriotic sentiments relatively great, when confidence in leaders was high, and when excesses of liberty had made the people willing to accept a sound constitution. It was the Americans' good fortune that the need for constitutional reform coincided with circumstances conducive to it, but these circumstances are rare and the coincidence unlikely. As a general rule, "a people does not reform with moderation."[16] It is necessary that every precaution be taken not to upset that original patriotic act and to preserve and foster reverence for the laws, and particularly for the highest law. The Federalist authors did not argue, as Lincoln later did, that reverence for the laws ought to become the political religion of the nation. They took a narrower view of the problem and proposed more modest means. The task of basic lawmaking having been done, in the main successfully, the aim must be to avoid reopening the fundamental political questions, which were hardly likely to be so well answered another time, and to let time do its work of fostering veneration. Publius' argument was a negative one: do nothing to disturb "that veneration, which time bestows on everything."

But will the mere passage of time be enough? Many of the Anti-Federalists thought that it would not, that the passage of time would magnify the difficulty of preserving the American republic, rather than overcoming it. The Revolutionary preoccupation with liberty, which may have made men forget the need for government, nevertheless had a profound effect in holding the American governments true to their ends. And the spirit of the Revolution was a spirit of dedication to the common good.

> It is next to impossible to enslave a people immediately after a firm struggle against oppression, while the sense of past injury is recent and strong. But after some time this impression naturally wears off;—the ardent glow of freedom gradually evaporates;—the charms of popular equality, which arose from the republican plan, insensibly decline;—the pleasures, the advantages derived from the new kind of government grow stale through use. Such declension in all those vigorous springs of action necessarily produces a supineness. The altar of liberty is no longer watched with such attentive assiduity;—a new train of passions succeeds to the empire of the mind;—different objects of desire take place;—and, if the nation happens to enjoy a series of prosperity, voluptuousness, excessive fondness for riches, and luxury gain admission and establish themselves—these produce venality and corruption of every kind, which open a fatal avenue to bribery. Hence it follows, that in the midst of this general contageon a few men—or one—more powerful than all the others, industriously endeavor to obtain all authority; and by means of great wealth—or embezzling the public money,—perhaps totally subvert the government, and erect a system of aristocratical or monarchic tyranny in its room. . . . It is this depravation of manners, this wicked propensity, my dear countrymen, against which you ought to provide with the utmost degree of prudence and circumspection. All nations pass this parokism of vice at some period or other;—and if at that dangerous juncture your government is not secure upon a solid foundation, and well guarded against the machinations of evil men, the liberties of this country will be lost—perhaps forever!*[17]

This view is strikingly like that of Abraham Lincoln in his speech in 1838 on "The Perpetuation of Our Political Institutions."[18] And some of the Anti-Federalists also saw the need, if the country was to survive its great moral crises, of leaders "who have genius and capacity sufficient to form the manners and correct the morals of the people, and virtue enough to lead their country to freedom."[19]

Indeed, the crisis might not be so far off. The post-Revolutionary period was a time, Federalists and Anti-Federalists seem to have agreed, when men's lives, thoughts, and guiding principles were increasingly detached from the community. The Anti-Federalists thought that the Constitution would strengthen this tendency, and they feared for the Republic. It is a simplification, but not a misleading simplification, to say that the crisis faced by Abraham Lincoln seventy years later required a synthesis of the Federalist solution and the Anti-Federalist reservation. And if the major element in the synthesis was still the Federal one, yet it is due the Anti-Federalists to say that it was they, more than the defenders of the Constitution, who anticipated the need. The Anti-Federalists saw, although sometimes only dimly, the insufficiency of a community of mere interest.*[20] They saw that the American polity had to be a moral community if it was to be anything, and they saw that the seat of that community must be the hearts of the people.

Mercy Warren's reflections a decade after the adoption of the Constitution—not bitter or partisan reflections, but somewhat melancholy ones—suggest a question about the American experiment that is not less vital today than it was in the 1780s or the 1850s.

> [S]uch a people as the Americans cannot suddenly be reduced to a state of slavery; it is a work of time to obliterate old opinions, founded in reason, and fanned by enthusiasm, till they had become a part of the religious creed of a nation. Notwithstanding the apprehensions which have pervaded the minds of many, America will probably long retain a greater share of freedom than can perhaps be found in any other part of the civilized world. This may be more the result of her local situation, than from her superior policy or moderation. From the general equality of fortune which had formerly reigned among them, it may be modestly asserted, that most of the inhabitants of America were too proud for monarchy, yet too poor for nobility, and it is to be feared, too selfish and avaricious for a virtuous republic.[21]

Works Frequently Cited

John Adams, Works	The Works of John Adams, ed. Charles Francis Adams (Boston 1851)
Cranch	Cranch's United States Supreme Court Reports, 1801–15
Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution	William W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (Chicago 1953)
Curtis, Constitutional History	George Ticknor Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States: From Their Declaration of Independence to the Close of the Civil War (New York 1889)
Dall.	Dallas' Pennsylvania and United States Reports, 1790–1800
Documentary History of the Constitution	A Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States of America, 1786–1870; Derived from the Records, Manuscripts, and Rolls Deposited in the Bureau of Rolls and Library of the Department of State (Washington, D.C., 1894–1905)
Elliot	The Debates of the State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, as Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787, 2d ed., ed. Jonathan Elliot (Philadelphia 1866)
Evans, Early American Imprints	Charles Evans, Early American Imprints, 1639–1800 (Worcester, Mass., 1955–)
Farrand	The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, ed. Max Farrand (New Haven 1911–37)
The Federalist	The Federalist, ed. Jacob E. Cooke (Middletown, Conn., 1961)
Ford, Essays	Essays on the Constitution of the United States, Published during Its Discussion by the People, 1787–1788, ed. Paul Leicester Ford (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1892)

Ford, Pamphlets	Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States, Published during Its Discussion by the People, 1787–1788, ed. Paul Leicester Ford (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1888)
How.	Howard's United States Supreme Court Reports, 1843–60
Jensen, New Nation	Merrill Jensen, The New Nation (New York 1950)
Lee, Letters	The Letters of Richard Henry Lee, ed. James Curtis Ballagh (New York 1911–14)
Lincoln, Collected Works	Abraham Lincoln, Collected Works, ed. Roy P. Basler (New Brunswick, N.J., 1953)
Lincoln, Speeches and Writings	Abraham Lincoln: His Speeches and Writings, ed. Roy P. Basler (Cleveland and New York 1946)
Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt)	The Writings of James Madison, ed. Gaillard Hunt (New York 1900–1910)
Main, Antifederalists	Jackson Turner Main, The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1960)
McMaster and Stone	Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution, 1787–1788, ed. John Bach McMaster and Frederick D. Stone (Published for the Subscribers by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, 1888)
Thorpe, Federal and State Constitutions	The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the States, Territories, and Colonies Now or Heretofore Forming the United States of America, comp. Francis Newton Thorpe (Washington, D.C., 1931–44)
Washington, Writings	The Writings of George Washington from the Original Manuscript Sources, 1745–1799, ed. John C. Fitzpatrick (Washington, D.C., 1931–44)
Wheat.	Wheaton's United States Supreme Court Reports, 1816–27
Wood, Creation	Gordon Wood, The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1969)

Notes

An asterisk indicates a note of substance. For the use of paragraph numbers (e.g., Martin 2.4.36) in references to volumes 2–6 of The Complete Anti-Federalist, see above, pp. xvii–xviii. For works cited in shortened form, see above, pp. 77–78.

CHAPTER ONE

1. See John Fiske, The Critical Period of American History, 1783–1789 (Boston 1888) ch. 7; George Bancroft, History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States of America (New York 1882) II, book 4 passim; George Ticknor Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States: From Their Declaration of Independence to the Close of the Civil War (New York 1889) I, 626; Andrew McLaughlin, The Confederation and the Constitution, 1783–1789 (New York 1905) ch. 17; Forrest McDonald, E Pluribus Unum (Boston 1965) 208.

2. Charles A. Beard, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution (New York 1913, 1935); Merrill Jensen, The Articles of Confederation (Madison, Wisc., 1940); Jensen, The New Nation (New York 1950); Jackson Turner Main, The Anti-federalists: Critics of the Constitution (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1960); Forrest McDonald, We the People: The Economic Origins of the Constitution (Chicago 1958); Robert E. Brown, Charles Beard and the Constitution: A Critical Analysis of "An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution" (Princeton 1956); Jackson Turner Main, "Charles A. Beard and the Constitution: A Critical Review of Forrest McDonald's We the People," William and Mary Quarterly January 1960, 88–102, with a rebuttal by Forrest McDonald, ibid. 102–10.

3. See, e.g., Main, Antifederalists 280–81.

4. Cecelia Kenyon, "Men of Little Faith: The Anti-Federalists on the Nature of Representative Government," William and Mary Quarterly January 1955; Kenyon, "Introduction," The Anti-Federalists (Indianapolis 1966).

5. Gordon Wood, The Creation of the American Republic, 1776–1787 (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1969) ch. 12. See Bernard Bailyn, The Ideological Origins of the American Revolution (Cambridge, Mass., 1967).

*6. For this reason "Anti-Federalist" seems the best rendering of the name. There was no consistent usage at the time and there has been none since. "Anti-Federalist" balances the positive and negative sides by giving the group (or the position) a proper name, while still emphasizing its character as opposition. The typographically convenient "Antifederalist," now generally in favor, suggests more cohesion than actually existed, while "anti-Federalist" suggests a merely negative, dependent unity. Forrest McDonald, apparently the only other writer to consider this little question in print, agrees about the implications of the main forms. He adopts "anti-Federalist" as "the more neutral term"; and while it is not neutral, it does accurately reflect his opinion, contrary to the conclusion here, that there was no significant theoretical coherence in the Anti-Federalist arguments or principles. Forrest McDonald, "The anti-Federalists, 1781–1789," Wisconsin Magazine of History Spring 1963, 206n.

7. Plebeian 6.11 and others.

*8. The fundamental unity of The Federalist can be disputed. See Douglass Adair, "The Authorship of the Disputed Federalist Papers" part 2, William and Mary Quarterly April and July 1944; repr. in Adair, Fame and the Founding Fathers, ed. H. Trevor Colbourn (New York 1974) 27–74. Alpheus Mason, "The Federalist—a Split Personality," American Historical Review LVII, no. 3 (1952). Gottfried Dietze, The Federalist (Baltimore 1960).

9. See Daniel Boorstin, The Genius of American Politics (Chicago 1953).

10. The Federalist no. 23, 151.

CHAPTER TWO

1. Brutus XIV, 2.9.184; [Maryland] Farmer I, 5.1.3; Martin 2.4.26; see Agrippa X, 4.6.43; XI, 4.6.47; XIV, 4.6.60; Monroe 5.21.37; Newport Man 4.25.1.

*2. "There is nothing solid or useful that is new—and I will venture to assert, that if every political institution is not fully explained by Aristotle, and other ancient writers, yet that, there is no new discovery in this the most important of all sciences, for ten centuries back." [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.21. In the exchange between A [Maryland] Farmer and his critic, Aristides, the former speaks in behalf of the older Anti-Federal heads against the rash, know-it-all Federalist youths. See Stanley Elkins and Eric McKitrick, "The Founding Fathers: Young Men of the Revolution," Political Science Quarterly LXXVI, no. 2 (1961).

3. Resolution of Congress, 21 February 1787, Farrand III, 14; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.22; Denatus 5.18.4; Henry 5.16.1; Columbian Patriot 4.28.4 (objections 16–18); Warren 6.4.38; Sydney 6.9.2, 7–8; Republican Federalist 4.13.5–7, 16; see Lansing and Paterson, Farrand I, 249–50 (16 June). See this volume, ch. 3 n. 17.

4. Martin 2.4.36; Lowndes 5.12.1; Republican Federalist 4.13.15 and passim. See also Federal Farmer II, 2.8.23; Republican Federalist 4.13.16; Delegate Who Has Catched Cold 5.19.13ff; Cornelius 4.10.15.

5. Centinel I, 2.7.4; Federal Farmer I, 2.8.1. See Smith 6.12.7 on the "fickleness and inconstancy" of a free people and the implications of that for governmental change. See Impartial Examiner 5.14.26; Countryman 6.7.8, 9; Warren 6.14.49–51.

6. The Federalist no. 78, 527. For an unusually radical Federalist statement of the right of the people to change their governments, see Conciliator to the Honest American, Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 15 January 1788.

7. Henry 5.16.1.

8. G. Livingston, Elliot II, 287. Cf. Jensen, The Articles of Confederation ch. 1; Jensen, New Nation, conclusion; Vernon Parrington, Main Currents in American Thought (New York 1927–30) I, chs. 1, 2; III, pp. 410–11.

9. Lowndes 5.12.1; Philadelphiensis XI, 3.9.89; Denatus 5.18.14. See also Old Whig I, 3.3.3; Tredwell, Elliot II, 401.

10. Aristocrotis 3.16.17; Sidney, New York Journal 4 December 1888. See Isaac Q. Leake, Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb (Albany 1850) 305–6; McDonald, We the People 113; McDonald, "The anti-Federalists," Wisconsin Magazine of History XLVI, no. 3 (1963); Main, Antifederalists xi–xii; Robert Rutland, The Ordeal of the Constitution (Norman, Okla., 1966) 5–6; Linda Grant DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar: New York State and the Federal Constitution (Ithaca, N.Y., 1966) 170–72. Federalist larceny on a much larger scale is a major theme of Wood's Creation (see p. 562).

11. [James Wilson] Considerations on the Bank of North-America (Philadelphia 1785) 19; Elliot III, 157; E. Wilder Spaulding, New York in the Critical Period, 1783–1789 (New York 1932) 184. See Ford, Essays 412; Farrand I, 487 (30 June); Elliot IV, 281; Symmes 4.5.2; Henry 5.16. Federal Farmer IX, 2.8.116; XI, 2.8.143, 147; Kate Mason Rowland, The Life of George Mason, 1725–1792 (1892) II, 190, 191; Monroe 5.21.12.

12. Burton A. Konkle, George Bryan and the Constitution of Pennsylvania, 1731–1791 (Philadelphia 1922) 305.

*13. Main, Antifederalists xi. "Blush ye well meaning citizens, who have associated with such men as are the ringleaders of antifederalism (alias sedition) in the United States." A Patriotic Citizen, New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 6 June 1788.

14. See the references to an "efficient federal government" by Federalists Rufus King, Nathaniel Gorham, and William Heath, Elliot II, 55–57, 69, 121.

15. Impartial Examiner 5.14.26.

16. See Candidus 4.9.23, 41, whose plan aimed at true federalism in both senses.

17. Albany Anti-Federal Committee 6.10.2; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.16–20; Smith 6.12.5; Plebeian 6.11.13; Warren 6.14.49; Philadelphiensis IX, 3.6.60; Gerry 2.1.4–5; Officer of the Late Continental Army 3.8.3; Agrippa III, 4.6.13; X, 4.6.43; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.18–21; Symmes 4.5.2; Brutus I, 2.9.5; Mason, Virginia ratifying convention, Elliot III, 29; Georgian 5.9.2–3; Martin 2.4 passim.

18. Farrand II, 667. See Republican Federalist 4.13.10; see extract of letter from William Pierce to St. George Tucker, 28 September 1787, Gazette of the State of Georgia 20 March 1788: "The great object of this new government is to consolidate the Union, and to give us the appearance and power of a nation."

19. The Federalist no. 85, 594. Cf. King, Elliot II, 55; Charles Pinckney, Elliot IV, 255–56.

20. James Wilson, Farrand I, 413 (25 June); Demosthenes Minor, Gazette of the State of Georgia 15 November 1787.

21. Brutus I, 2.9.5.

22. Yates and Lansing 2.3.6.

23. Monroe 5.21.11; see Symmes 4.5.3; Federal Farmer I, 2.8.12–14.

24. Elliot II, 46. Cf. James Wilson in the Philadelphia ratifying convention, McMaster and Stone 263–64.

25. Farrand I, 166 (8 June); McMaster and Stone 227. Cf. similar arguments of A Citizen of America, Fabius, and David Ramsay, in Ford, Pamphlets 38, 55, 176–77, 373; A Citizen, Carlisle Gazette 24 October 1787; Plain Truth, McMaster and Stone 189.

26. See Farrand I, 166 (8 June); McMaster and Stone 301, 395; Elliot II, 445–47. Cf. Madison's draft of a preface to the Debates of the Constitutional Convention, Farrand III, 539ff; and a letter by William Pierce to St. George Tucker, dated 28 September 1787, Gazette of the State of Georgia 20 March 1788.

27. See Paterson, Farrand I, 259 (16 June); Clinton 6.13.16–18.

28. Agrippa VI, 4.6.24; XIII, 4.6.60. See, for the same view, Monroe 5.21.14; Lowndes 5.12.5; [Maryland] Farmer VII, 5.1.112.

*29. Whether there is some deeper basis of reconciliation of the parts of Wilson's argument need not be pursued here. Consider, however, his remarks to the Pennsylvania ratifying convention on 28 November 1787 to the effect that "to preserve the state governments unimpaired" was the "favorite object" of the framers; "and, perhaps, however proper it might be in itself, it is more difficult to defend the plan on account of the excessive caution used in that respect than from any other objection that has been offered here or elsewhere." McMaster and Stone 265. See Ralph Rossum, "The Political Pyramid and the Federal Republic: The Political Thought of James Wilson" (University of Chicago, Ph.D. diss. 1973). Cf. the interesting argument of Fabius (John Dickinson), Ford, Pamphlets 176–77.

30. Elliot III, 93–94; McMaster and Stone 322.

31. Centinel V, 2.7.99; Agrippa V, 4.6.21. See also Impartial Examiner 5.14.4; Officer of the Late Continental Army 3.8.3; One of the Common People 4.8.1; Martin 2.4.114; Pennsylvania House Minority 3.2.6–7; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.8. Cf. Hamilton's objection to divided sovereignty in Farrand I, 287 (18 June).

32. Ford, Essays 367–68. James Monroe was, as usual, more open to the Federalist view: "The mixture between the general and state governments, being partly a consolidated and partly a confederated one, suggests a balance between sovereignties that is new and interesting." He hoped that by drawing precise boundaries and establishing proper checks, it might survive. Monroe 5.31.36. See also this volume 34.

33. Henry 5.16.1. See the similar objections of Whitehill in Pennsylvania and Caldwell in North Carolina: McMaster and Stone 256–57; Elliot IV, 15–16, 23–24.

*34. Alexander Hamilton, Elliot II, 234. Also The Federalist no. 15, 93: "the evils we experience do not proceed from minute or partial imperfections, but from fundamental errors in the structure of the building which cannot be amended otherwise than by an alteration in the first principles and main pillars of the fabric."

*35. When it was argued by the Pennsylvania republicans in 1785 that the Bank of North America, established by Pennsylvania on the recommendation of Congress, should not be abolished without at least notifying Congress of the reasons for the repeal of the charter, Jonathan Dickinson Sergent replied with (according to Brunhouse) "characteristic Radical reasoning: 'We are not bound by any terms made by Congress—Congress are our creatures!' " Robert L. Brunhouse, The Counter Revolution in Pennsylvania: 1776–1790 (Harrisburg, Pa., 1942) 175.

36. Farrand I, 250 (16 June).

37. Farrand I, 324 (19 June); see also ibid. 340–41 (20 June). See also Monroe 5.21.4ff; Martin 2.4.39; Henry 5.16.2; Massachusetts ratifying convention, Elliot II, 54–55 (King); Justice Chase in Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall. 199, 224 (1798).

*38. Whether this is the true implication of the ratification provision is of course controversial; and some Federalists denied, or at least softened, this interpretation. Cf. the account in The Federalist no. 39, 253–54, with Chief Justice Marshall's interpretation in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 403–5 (1819). And see the arguments of A Freeman, who was a Federalist, that the Constitution is the act of the people of the United States as several and separate sovereignties, Pennsylvania Gazette 23 January 1788.

*39. Again it can be argued that the ratification provision is based on federal principles, since the Constitution was to come into effect, when nine states had ratified, only as between the ratifying states. This equivocation is important, but, as the Anti-Federalists saw, the thrust is in the national direction. The underlying rationale is that the Union is the decisive political entity, as was very widely recognized on both sides at the time. Moreover the practical effect supports and underlines the theory. It is true that a state might decide to stay out of the new government. That that would be extremely difficult is less important than that a state could not alone prevent the others from making fundamental constitutional change, as it could under the Articles. That obviously alters the situation not only of a majority wanting to act but also of a minority wanting to block action. The practical effect of the nine-state ratification provision was to make not merely ratification but ratification by thirteen states more likely than it would have been under a thirteen-state ratification provision.

*40. General Charles Cotesworth Pinckney told the South Carolina House of Representatives: "The separate independence and individual sovereignty of the several states were never thought of by the enlightened band of patriots who framed this Declaration; the several states are not even mentioned by name in any part of it,—as if it was intended to impress this maxim on America, that our freedom and independence arose from our union, and that without it we could neither be free nor independent. Let us, then, consider all attempts to weaken this Union, by maintaining that each state is separately and individually independent, as a species of political heresy, which can never benefit us, but may bring on us the most serious distress." Elliot IV, 301–2. See Abraham Lincoln, Message to Congress in Special Session, 4 July 1861, Collected Works (ed. Basler) IV, 421–41. William W. Crosskey and William Jeffrey, Jr., The Political Background of the Federal Convention (Chicago 1980), the third volume of Crosskey's Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (vols. 1 and 2, Chicago 1953), is largely devoted to showing the primacy of the Union to the states, both in practice and in common opinion. Not all Federalists, however, took this view. See A Freeman, cited above, n. 38, and Thomas McKean, who described the new system as proposing a union of thirteen sovereign and independent states, McMaster and Stone 272. See also Penhallow v. Doane, 3 Dall. 54 (1795), where Justice Paterson took the view, contrary to Iredell, that external sovereignty never did belong to the states and that the sovereignty of the national government as to foreign relations was inherited from the Continental Congress. See U.S. v. Curtis-Wright Export Co., U.S. 304 (1936), p. 299.

41. Elliot II, 158.

*42. After the Declaration of Independence the people "relaxed their union into a league of friendship between sovereign and independent states." State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 6 February 1788. "It was an honest and solemn covenant among our infant States, and virtue and common danger supplied its defects." A Citizen of Philadelphia, McMaster and Stone 106. See also Wilson, McMaster and Stone 226; Iredell, Elliot IV, 227; Kent's Commentaries on American Law, 12th ed., ed. O. W. Holmes, Jr. (Boston 1893) I, part 2, lect. 10, p. 212.

43. Resolution of Congress, 21 February 1787, Farrand III, 14.

*44. Farrand I, 253, 255 (16 June); 283 (18 June); 324 (19 June). See Elliot IV, 206, 215, 229. "The confederation had failed to answer the purposes for which governments are instituted among men. Its powers or its impotence operated to the destruction of those ends, which it is the object of government to promote." John Quincy Adams, The Jubilee of the Constitution (New York 1839) 65.

CHAPTER THREE

1. McMaster and Stone 287.

2. Henry 5.16.2.

3. Farrand I, 340–41 (20 June); see Brutus VII, 2.9.87.

*4. Hamilton himself confessed that "the extent of the Country to be governed, discouraged him." Farrand I, 287 (18 June); see also Wilson's account, McMaster and Stone 220ff. For arguments in defense of the small republic, this volume 16–21; Yates and Lansing 2.3.7; Brutus I, 2.9.11; Federal Farmer I, 2.8.14; IV, 2.8.75; XVII, 2.8.208; Sidney 6.8.1–2; Cato Uticensis 5.7.6; [Maryland] Farmer III, 5.1.52–53; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.16; Old Whig IV, 3.3.20; Monroe 5.21.13; Cato III, 2.6.12–13; Agrippa XII, 4.6.48; Albany Anti-Federal Committee 6.10.2; Centinel I, 2.7.19; V, 2.7.94; Martin 2.4.44; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.7, 9; Columbian Patriot 4.28.4; Warren 6.14.5; Smith 6.12.19–20; Henry 5.16.2; Clinton 6.13.13; etc.

5. Ellsworth, Farrand I, 406 (25 June); see Martin, Farrand II, 4 (14 July).

6. Federal Farmer II, 2.8.17; XII, 2.8.158; Cato III, 2.6.16; Impartial Examiner 5.14.6.

*7. In Gordon Wood's view, the Anti-Federalists became fervent defenders "of the traditional assumption that the state was a cohesive organic entity with a single homogeneous interest at the very time they were denying the consequences of this assumption." Wood understands this traditional view, the "republicanism" of the Revolution, to be a secularized Puritanism aimed at securing a sacrifice of individual interest to the common good. Creation 499, 418, and ch. 2. One of my own reasons for turning to the study of the Anti-Federalists was the expectation that they defended some such tradition; the Anti-Federalists seemed to be of interest as defenders of at least residual principles of premodern, preindustrial, preliberal worlds. Yet, without here taking up the more complex question of how far such principles may in fact have been involved in Revolutionary republicanism, they are strikingly absent from the Anti-Federalist thought. The Anti-Federalists are liberals—reluctant and traditional, indeed—in the decisive sense that they see the end of government as the security of individual liberty, not the promotion of virtue or the fostering of some organic common good. The security of liberty does require, in the Anti-Federalist view, the promotion of civic virtue and the subordination (not, in the usual case, "sacrifice") of individual interest to common good; but virtue and the common good are instrumental to individual liberty, and the resemblance to preliberal thought is superficial.

8. Farrand I, 49 (31 May).

*9. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.24. Agrippa XII, 4.6.50, referred to our present government, which "is respected from principles of affection and obeyed with alacrity." See Mason, Farrand I, 112 (4 June); Smith 6.12.10; Henry 5.16.17; Clinton 6.13.13.

10. Brutus I, 2.9.18.

*11. Richard Henry Lee, letter to ——, 28 April 1788, in Lee, Letters II, 464; Federal Farmer III, 2.8.24; VII, 2.8.93. One of the arguments for leaving the states to decide how they would raise the money needed by the general government was this need for popular confidence. "Because each being thus accommodated, and participating [in] the advantages of union,—none subjected to any inconvenience thereby,—all will consequently concur in nourishing an affection for the government, that so cemented them." Impartial Examiner 5.14.6.

*12. Agrippa XII, 4.6.48. See Cato III, 2.6.16; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.51; Brutus IX, 2.9.105–10; Candidus 4.9.23. If this thought seems utterly archaic, the modern reader may grasp it better by substituting "bureaucracy" for "standing army." The Anti-Federalists were not so much worried about military coups or about "militarism" in the popular sense, as about rigid rule of a large and varied republic by the force of government, of which the standing army is the ultimate expression. Consider Cato's challenge: "will you submit to be numbered like the slaves of an arbitrary despot; and what will be your reflections when the taxmaster thunders at your door for the duty on that light which is the bounty of heaven." VI, 2.6.41.

13. Cf. Brutus I, 2.9.14ff; IV, 2.9.45ff; [Maryland] Farmer VII, 5.1.98. Cf. James Wilson's remarks in the Constitutional Convention on representation with those in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention. Farrand I, 132–33 (6 June); McMaster and Stone 221ff. See Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6.

14. Cf. Federal Farmer I, 2.8.4–6; VIII, 2.8.108; The Federalist no. 63; no. 74, 500; no. 76, 510–12; no. 79, 532.

15. Columbian Patriot 4.28.4; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.33–37; Tamony 5.11.7; Warren 6.14.8, 47; Symmes 4.5.7; Smith 6.12.9; Federal Farmer XIV, 2.8.178. Rotation was thought to serve not only as an instrument of responsibility but also as training in public service, thus contributing to the attachment of the citizens to their community. Smith 6.12.27–28.

16. Federal Farmer II, 2.8.15; Smith 6.12.15. See Brutus I, 2.9.14; III, 2.9.42; and passim; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.4–5; Martin 2.4.42; Clinton 6.13.35.

*17. The state legislatures "are so numerous as almost to be the people themselves. . . ." Federal Farmer XII, 2.8.163. See ibid. 2.8.155; VIII, 2.8.106; IX, 2.8.113; Smith 6.12.15, 22; Henry, Elliot III, 322; Lee 5.6.2.

18. Federal Farmer VII, 2.8.97.

*19. Federal Farmer XII, 2.8.158; see Centinel I, 2.7.3; VI, 2.7.106–10; IX, 2.7.129. "There are no such mighty talents necessary for government as some who pretend to them, without possessing them, would make us believe. Honest affections, and common qualifications, are sufficient. . . . Great abilities have generally, if not always, been employed to mislead the honest unwary multitude, and draw them out of the plain paths of public virtue and public good." [Trenchard], Cato's Letters I, 177–78, quoted by Friend to the Republic 4.23.8.

20. Federal Farmer IX, 2.8.113.

*21. There is a continuity in the argument, since the principle of representation, which is the cause of the difficulty, is generally admitted by the Anti-Federalists even in the small republic. Many of them did think that there is a quantitative limit to the reach of the representative principle, that that limit was exceeded by the dimensions of the United States, and that therefore any representative body covering the whole United States must be inherently inadequate and untrustworthy. See Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.75; VII, 2.8.99; Smith 6.12.9.

22. Smith 6.12.17–18; cf. Hamilton, Elliot II, 254–57.

23. Sydney 6.9.19. See [Maryland] Farmer III, 5.1.56–58.

*24. See this volume 41, 43–45. In addition, because of the dispersed circumstances of the landed interest it would not be equally represented under the new system, which would tend to follow the lead of the commercial interests. Cornelius 4.10.11.

*25. Federal Farmer XV, 2.8.190. A general verdict is one in which the jury finds either for the plaintiff or for the defendant in general terms, judging both law and fact, as opposed to a special verdict, in which a particular finding of fact is made by the jury, leaving to the court the application of the law to the facts thus found.

26. [Maryland] Farmer IV, 5.1.65; see generally ibid. 5.1.61ff.

*27. Federal Farmer XV, 2.8.190. Noah Webster argued, for example, that the trial of the vicinage was no longer necessary to do justice in individual cases. Ford, Pamphlets 53. However, the Federal Farmer made it clear that for him that was not the main concern.

*28. Smith 6.12.20; Federal Farmer V, 2.8.59. See [Maryland] Farmer III, 5.1.52; Turner in Massachusetts ratifying convention, Elliot II, 31; Smith 6.12.9; Agrippa XII, 4.6.48. While the Federalist writers were less concerned with this question, see A Federalist, Boston Gazette and Country Journal 3 December 1787, who denied an Anti-Federalist argument that a constitution maker should adapt the constitution to the pre-civil habits of the people: ". . . his object would be, to introduce a code of laws that would induce those habits of civilization and order, which must result from good government. The truth of the case is, that as a people, we are destitute of Federal Features and Habits—the several State Constitutions are local, partial, and selfish; they are not calculated in their construction to form national views. . . ."

29. Brutus I, 2.9.16.

30. Republican Federalist 4.13.26.

31. Agrippa IX, 4.6.34.

32. See Impartial Examiner 5.14.6; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.7.

33. Henry 5.16.8; cf. The Federalist no. 19, 122–23.

34. Cato IV, 2.6.27. See Friend to the Rights of the People 4.23.3; [Maryland] Farmer VII, 5.1.111; Turner 4.18.2; Columbian Patriot 4.28.1.

35. Federal Republican 3.6.21. See "The Congress under the New Constitution," New York Journal 28 January 1788; [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.4; Impartial Examiner 5.14.8.

36. See discussion of Agrippa, this volume 24, 25.

37. Turner 4.18.1. See Cato V, 2.6.34; Alfred 3.10.5; Lansing (New York), Elliot II, 218; Williams, Elliot II, 240; Warren 6.14 passim; Delegate Who Has Catched Cold 5.19.9. See Andrew Carnegie, The Gospel of Wealth and Other Timely Essays (1933), ed. Edward C. Kirkland (Cambridge, Mass., 1962) 3; Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws XX, ch. 1.

*38. Thoughts on Government, John Adams, Works IV, 109. See Livingston, Elliot II, 341. Some of the Anti-Federalists for this reason favored sumptuary laws. See [Maryland] Farmer V, 5.1.82; George Mason, Farrand II, 344 (20 August), 606 (13 September). See this volume 75, 76 and ch. 4. n. 42.

39. Warren 6.14.157.

40. [Maryland] Farmer VI, 5.1.82; see Warren 6.14.132–33.

41. Delegate Who Has Catched Cold 5.19.16. See Federal Farmer XVI, 2.8.196; Henry 5.16.37; this volume, ch. 8.

42. R. H. Lee, letter to James Madison, 26 November 1784, Lee, Letters II, 304.

43. David 4.24.2.

44. See Clinton Rossiter, Political Thought of the American Revolution (New York 1963) 204–6. See Alexis de Tocqueville, Democracy in America I, part 1, ch. 9; II, part 2, chs. 15–19. Alan Aichinger, "Civic Education in the New Republic" (University of Chicago Ph.D. diss. 1970).

45. David 4.24 n.1. See the satire of Aristocrotis (3.16.3) describing the free-thinking origin of the Constitution as an attempt to deny any divine limits on civil rulers.

46. Virginia Independent Chronicle 31 October 1787. See Federal Republican 3.6.21.

47. Warren 6.14.148, 135–37. See Agrippa IX, 4.6.34; XII, 4.6.48. Also Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.53. American fears about American corruption are considered at length by Gordon Wood in Creation chs. 3 and 10.

*48. R. H. Lee, letter to James Madison, 26 November 1784, Lee, Letters II, 304. "William Penn" (Penn 3.12.18) found a contradiction in state constitutional provisions for liberty of conscience alongside provisions for religious oaths for office-holders; but he made no attempt to resolve it.

*49. See, for example, the remarks of Amos Singletary, Elliot II, 44. For a good statement of the Federalist case against test oaths (and civil religion in general), see A Landholder (Oliver Ellsworth) in Ford, Essays 168–71, who, however, approved of "our laws against drunkenness, profane swearing, blasphemy, and professed atheism." See letter of William Williams, Ford, Essays 207–9.

50. Turner 4.18.2; see David Caldwell, Elliot IV, 199; Friend to the Rights of the People 4.23.3(9).

CHAPTER FOUR

1. Henry 5.16.6; Smith 6.12.2.

*2. See Madison's Notes of Proceedings of Congress, 21 February 1787; Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 80–81; see ibid. 22, 24–25; Luther Martin in the Constitutional Convention as favoring a dissolution of the Union in preference to any plan abandoning the equality of the states, Farrand I, 445 (28 June); II, 4 (14 July). While Patrick Henry and some other Anti-Federalists were widely thought to favor separate confederacies, their public statements described dissolution of the Union only as the lesser of evils. Main, in an appendix entitled "Separate Confederacies," concludes: "Possibly some of the Antifederalists favored the idea; however the evidence is very strong that most of the talk about separate confederacies was generated by the other side." Antifederalists 283–84. Main somewhat underestimates Anti-Federal support (equivocal as it surely was) for separation. See (in addition to the citations in Main) Lansing, Elliot II, 219; Smith, ibid. 382; Countryman 6.7.8; Sydney 6.9.2; Centinel XI, 2.7.140–42; Henry 5.16.8. The Federalists "generated" much of the talk about separate confederacies in 1787–88 because they thought it was the end to which the Anti-Federal opposition to the Constitution was, more or less deliberately, pointing. The Anti-Federalists' frequent denial of the capacity of any republican government to extend over such a wide territory as the United States left them open to the criticism of striking at the root of Union itself. (See Wilson, McMaster and Stone 386; Randolph, Elliot III, 71.) In attributing to the Anti-Federalists an intention to move toward separate confederacies, such Federalists as Publius were doubtless more than a little disingenuous. See The Federalist no. 1, 7; no. 2, 8; no. 2, 12; no. 59, 402; State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 6 February 1788; Ford, Pamphlets 81–82. Main indeed produces evidence to show that there was more support of separate confederacies among Federalists than among Anti-Federalists; but he does not make it sufficiently clear that the Federalist support of separate confederacies occurred prior to the proposed new Constitution. During the ratification debates the only support seems to have come from the other side. Previous to the appearance of the Constitution, separate confederacies were seen as means of strengthening bonds of interstate association. Thus Benjamin Rush wrote in October 1786 that "some of our enlightened men who begin to despair of a more complete union of the States in Congress" had secretly proposed three confederacies, each of which "they say will be united by nature, by interest, and by manners, and consequently they will be safe, agreeable and durable." Benjamin Rush to Richard Price, 27 October 1786, Letters of Benjamin Rush, ed. L. H. Butterfield (Princeton, 1951) I, 408. Once the proposed constitution was on the agenda, separate confederacies appeared rather as means of loosening interstate bonds.

*3. Jensen, New Nation xiv. But cf. the comment by Elbridge Gerry defending the report that was the basis of the "Great Compromise" in the Constitutional Convention: "We were neither the same Nation nor different Nations. We ought not therefore to pursue the one or the other of these ideas too closely." Farrand I, 532 (5 July).

*4. Where the Anti-Federalists used "nation," they nearly always meant the United States. Cato I, 2.6.4; III, 2.6.10, 18; Warren 6.14.21, 133, passim; [Maryland] Farmer III, 5.1.50–52 passim; Impartial Examiner 5.14.7; Plebeian 6.11.7, 23; Federal Farmer I, 2.8.10; etc. "Community" and "country" refer sometimes to the states, more often to the United States. Federal Farmer I, 2.8.6; II, 2.8.15; V, 2.8.61,62; IX, 2.8.113; Brutus I, 2.9.15; Brutus [Virginia] 5.15.1.

Patrick Henry's equivocal terminology is of a piece with his argument. While at least once he used "nation" in a context where it must refer to the state (Elliot III, 386), he began his first speech in the Virginia ratifying convention with a reference to "this great national [American] question," in the deliberations of which he regarded himself as the servant of the people of "this commonwealth" [Virginia]. He conceived "the republic" [probably Virginia] to be endangered and asked whether the existence of "the country" [probably the United States] was threatened. Elliot III, 21. Later he said he had come to preserve "the poor commonwealth of Virginia," and he appealed to "my beloved Americans" and the American spirit (5.16.2). He argued that "a majority of the community" [Virginia] has a right to alter the government (ibid.). "This country" [the United States] has not virtue enough to manage its own affairs (5.16.9). Epithets on "our country" [Virginia] are undeserved. Elliot III, 163.

5. Agrippa VIII, 4.6.31.

*6. Agrippa (VIII, 4.6.32) does not resolve the deeper question whether commerce is a unifying force within the states themselves, and in this he exhibits a characteristic Anti-Federal tension. On the one hand, he suggests that "the spirit of commerce is the great bond of union among citizens," presumably within as well as between states (I, 4.6.6). On the other hand, he is concerned to maintain a purity of population, morals, and religion that does not seem to be consistent with an open, vigorous commercial society. See for example, his criticism of Pennsylvania, VII, 4.6.26; cf. III, 4.6.12–13; Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws XX, chs. 1–2.

7. Monroe 5.21.17.

8. The Federalist no. 15, 91–92.

*9. Citizen 6.5.4. "Like a person in the agonies of a violent disease, who is willing to swallow any medicine, that gives the faintest hope of relief; the people stood ready to receive the new constitution, in almost any form in which it could be presented to them," the Old Whig asserted, IV, 3.3.18.

10. McDonald, We the People 3. See Jensen, New Nation passim; Wood, Creation 393–94.

*11. Madison reported to Edmund Pendleton on 27 May 1787 that in general the members of the Convention "seem to accord in viewing our situation as peculiarly critical. . . ." Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 169; see ibid. 347; Ford, Pamphlets 369; A Landholder II, ibid. 142–45; The Federalist no. 37. See the oration of the youthful John Quincy Adams on 18 July 1787: "At this critical period, when the whole nation is groaning under the intolerable burden of these accumulated evils. . . ." Columbian Magazine September 1787.

12. Old Whig VI, 3.3.32; cf. The Federalist no. 15.

13. Federal Farmer I, 2.8.1.

14. Old Whig IV, 3.3.18; see Citizen 6.5.4.

*15. Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.70; Philadelphiensis II, 3.9.8–9; III, 3.9.17–18; Brutus I, 2.9.2; Candidus 4.9.5; Centinel I, 2.7.3.

A favorite target of those historians who doubt that the American difficulties in 1787 were as serious as they have been pictured is of course John Fiske's The Critical Period of American History, a popular version of what Merrill Jensen calls the "chaos and patriots to the rescue" view of the American Founding. "The point is," Jensen writes, "there were patriots on both sides of the issue, but . . . they differed as to desirable goals for the new nation. At the same time, of course, there were men as narrow and selfish on both sides as their political enemies said they were." New Nation xiii. The observation was anticipated and met by Publius; see The Federalist no. 1, 4–6; no. 37, 231–32.

16. See Smith 6.12.10.

17. Candidus 4.9.13.

18. Williams, Elliot II, 240.

19. Letter from Lee to George Mason, 15 May 1787, Lee, Letters II, 419. See Alfred 3.10.2; cf. Henry 5.16.20; Lansing, Elliot II, 218; Warren 6.14.14.

20. Candidus 4.9.18.

21. Alfred 3.10.5; Plebeian 6.11.22.

22. The Federalist no. 42, 279.

23. Henry 5.16.2; DeWitt 4.3.29; Alfred 3.10.2; Centinel I, 2.7.26; Warren 6.14.14, 125, 157; Citizen 6.5.4.

24. Elliot III, 358.

25. Farrand I, 110–14 (4 June).
26. Philadelphiensis III, 3.9.22; [Maryland] Farmer V, 5.1.75; see also Old Whig IV, 3.3.22.
*27. Henry 5.16.2. A Federalist writer in Albany asked the opponents "whether they imagine that the sounds of public spirit and DEMOCRACY will prove as effectual a charm in blunting the tomahawk and dagger, as they have been in lulling the senses and fears of the multitude." P. Valerius Agricola, Albany Gazette 6 December 1787.
28. Plebeian 6.11.12; Tredwell, Elliot II, 358; see Gerry 2.1.3, 8; Old Whig 3.3.18; Republican Federalist 4.13.25.
29. See this volume 111–12, references at Art. I, sec. 4.
30. See this volume 67–68.
31. Elliot III, 375.
32. State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 16 January 1788.
33. Hamilton, Elliot II, 351; Iredell, Elliot IV, 95; see also Gore, Elliot II, 66; Sedgwick, ibid. 96.
34. The Federalist no. 23, 151.
35. Symmes 4.5.20; see Clinton 6.13.5.
36. Widgery, Elliot II, 28; see also Turner 4.18.1; Elliot IV, 276.
37. [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.46.
38. Brutus VII, 2.9.90; cf. Federal Farmer XVIII, 2.8.215ff.
39. Smith 6.12.37; Plebeian 6.11.2; Cornelius 4.10.3; Old Whig IV, 3.3.38; Symmes 4.5.2.
40. Henry 5.16.23.
41. State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 6 February 1788; letter from a correspondent, ibid. 28 November 1787; see Freeholder, ibid. 9 April 1788.
*42. Henry 5.16.2 (toward end of speech). Cf. Madison, Elliot III, 135; Warren 6.14.121, 15, 23. In 1834 Andrew Jackson sought to persuade his fellow countrymen in his famous "Protest" that "it is not in a splendid government supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratical establishments that they will find happiness or their liberties protection, but in a plain system, void of pomp, protecting all and granting favors to none, dispensing its blessings, like the dews of Heaven, unseen and unfelt save in the freshness and beauty they contribute to produce." Andrew Jackson, "Protest," April 1834, James D. Richardson, A Compilation of the Messages and Papers of the Presidents of the United States III, 93.
43. Officer of the Late Continental Army 3.8.5; see Lee, Letters II, 464; Agrippa XI, 4.6.45; Aristocrotis 3.16.11.
44. Brutus VII, 2.9.87; cf. The Federalist no. 34.
45. Federal Farmer XVII, 2.8.213.
46. The Federalist no. 34, 211; cf. Brutus VIII, 2.9.96ff; etc.; but for a different Anti-Federal view, see Impartial Examiner 5.14.13–16.
47. [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.4.
48. Brutus VII, 2.9.86–87.
49. Brutus VI, 2.9.80.
50. See this volume 9–14. See Martin Diamond, "What the Framers Meant by Federalism," A Nation of States, ed. Robert A. Goldwin, 2d ed. (Chicago 1974).
51. See The Federalist no. 39; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (1819); James Wilson, McMaster and Stone 322.
52. The Federalist no. 9; but cf. no. 15.
53. Federal Farmer I, 2.8.10–11 and n. 9; VI, 2.8.72.
54. See this volume 15.
*55. The new federalism is anticipated in the Articles of Confederation in its attempt to secure the sovereignty of the states while also providing that the league shall be perpetual.
56. James Wilson, McMaster and Stone 229–31, 301–3; see Wood, Creation 524–32.
57. Elliot II, 195.
58. Monroe 5.21.17.
59. Agrippa VI, 4.6.23; see Henry 5.16.36.

*60. Henry 5.16.2. The power of the states to provide military training according to congressional discipline only meant that "the states are constituted drill sergeants and fuglemen to train up soldiers for the general government." Aristocrotis 3.16.11.

*61. Rufus King argued in Massachusetts that if the state legislatures found their delegates erring they could give them public instructions, which the senators would scarcely dare to ignore. Elliot II, 47. But while the Federal Farmer and other Anti-Federalists referred to the Senate as "representing 13 sovereign states" and as being organized "entirely on the federal plan" (Federal Farmer III, 2.8.28; XI, 2.8.143), others pointed out that the Senate was not in fact based on federal principles. The senators were elected by the state legislatures but were to vote as individuals and not as state delegates, and the implication surely was that, once elected, they were not mere delegates of the states. Countryman from Dutchess County 6.6.45. In fact, as a Pennsylvanian replied to James Wilson, the power to appoint means nothing without the power to control and dismiss. [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.14–16. There was a considerable measure of disagreement among the Anti-Federalists on this whole issue; some opposed equal representation of the states in the Senate, others regarded it as the only good thing in the Constitution.

62. McMaster and Stone 264.

63. Federal Farmer XVII, 2.8.211.

64. Henry 5.16.16.

65. Ibid.

66. Farrand I, 286 (18 June).

67. [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.8.

CHAPTER FIVE

1. Farrand I, 51 (31 May).

2. Ibid. 134 (6 June). Brackets indicate James Madison's revision; see C. J. Taney in Ableman v. Booth, 21 How. 506, 516 (1859).

*3. This leaves aside the additional and practically very powerful argument that the states were mostly larger than the traditional small republics anyway. See The Federalist no. 9, 52–53.

4. The Federalist no. 10, 57.

5. See Gordon Wood's excellent discussion of this point, Creation 409–13.

6. See Parrington, Main Currents in American Political Thought I, chs. 1, 2; III, pp. 401–3; Jensen, New Nation 424–27; Jensen, The Articles of Confederation passim; Wood, Creation 513.

7. See for example Farrand I, 51 (31 May), 288 (18 June); Elliot II, 10.

8. Letter from James Madison to Thomas Jefferson, 17 October 1788. Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) V, 272.

9. Philadelphiensis X, 3.9.76.

10. Brutus IV, 2.9.45 and passim.

11. Clinton 6.13.2.

*12. "He had," Elbridge Gerry told his fellow delegates at Philadelphia, "been too republican heretofore: he was still however republican, but had been taught by experience the danger of the levilling spirit." Farrand I, 48 (31 May); see Mason, Farrand I, 101 (4 June).

13. James Burgh, Political Disquisitions (London 1774) I, 117. See Caroline Robbins, The Eighteenth-Century Commonwealthman (Cambridge, Mass., 1959).

*14. The difficult question of the franchise played little part in the ratification debate, since the Constitution left this matter to the states. While James Madison initially favored some form of freehold suffrage requirement as a way of checking the excesses of popular government, he later concluded that such a restriction on the franchise was dubious both in practice and in principle. See Farrand II, 203–4 (7 August) and Madison's very interesting fuller and more mature views in Farrand III, 450–55. See Wood, Creation 167–70.

15. Agrippa XVI, 4.6.73.

16. [Maryland] Farmer I, 5.1.15.

*17. Main, Antifederalists 173. Whether unmuted democratic views were as common as Main assumes even among the obscure people may well be questioned on the basis of the available evidence.

18. Wood, Creation 516.

*19. On the other hand, there were very few nondemocrats among the Federalists if by that is meant those who deny (1) that all powers derive from the consent of the governed and (2) that in general the will of the majority should prevail. Indeed, in his very important restoration of the thought of The Federalist, Martin Diamond insists on the Founders' "democratic" intentions. Martin Diamond, "Democracy and The Federalist: A Reconstruction of the Framers' Intent," American Political Science Review March 1959 (reprinted in Richard Stevens and Morton Frisch, American Political Thought [New York 1971]); "The Federalist," in History of Political Philosophy, ed. Leo Strauss and Joseph Cropsey, 2d ed. (Chicago 1972) 636–41. There is usage to support this view. Madison spoke in the Constitutional Convention of the need to remedy "the inconveniences of democracy" in ways "consistent with the democratic form of Govt." Farrand I, 135 (6 June). John Marshall said that the Federalists (in contrast to their opponents who had praised monarchy) "idolize democracy" and consider the Constitution to provide for "a well-regulated democracy." Elliot III, 222. Nathaniel Gorham asserted that the preponderance of the landed interest will enable it to prevent the introduction "of any other than a perfectly democratical form of government." Elliot II, 69. A Federalist essayist, A Patriotic Citizen, in New Hampshire (see above, ch. 2 n. 13) stressed that "the people are the sole, the great source from which all powers delegated to the federal government, by this truly democratic constitution, are to flow. . . ." See also [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.2–3; Monroe 5.21 passim; Cato II, 2.6.8; Elliot II, 242; Penn 3.12.12. Nevertheless, while it is not inaccurate to say that the Founders favored a "well regulated democracy," to say that they favored "democracy" does not reflect dominant contemporary usage nor, I think, does it foster analytical clarity. The term "democracy" is ambiguous, containing a range of ideas from simple, direct popular rule to a regulated, checked, mitigated rule of the people. Generally, especially when aiming at precision of expression, both the Federalists and the Anti-Federalists used the term "popular government" to contain this whole range of ideas, reserving "democracy" for the former end of the scale and "republic" for the latter. See Elliot III, 394, and the very clear distinction drawn in The Federalist nos. 14 and 10. John Adams provides a good explanation in his Defence I, letter 3 (Works IV, 308–9).

*20. Henry 5.16.2. Cf. Federal Farmer V, 2.8.59; VII, 2.8.100. Cf. Madison, Elliot III, 87. On their side, the Federalists did not deny that rulers might be tyrannical, but they saw it as the secondary danger. But see the comment by Fabius (John Dickinson) that history "holds up the licentiousness of the people, and turbulent temper of some of the states, as the only causes to be dreaded, not the conspiracies of federal officers." Ford, Pamphlets 200. See this volume 50, 51.

21. See this volume, ch. 3.

22. Federal Farmer II, 2.8.23; see Brutus I, 2.9.18.

23. Cato III, 2.6.20.

*24. The Federalist no. 17, 107; italics added. See Elliot II, 354–55. Publius goes on to argue that this consideration is strengthened by the state's administration of ordinary criminal and civil justice, thus involving itself in the daily lives of the people.

*25. The Federalist no. 27, 172; italics added. Added to this consideration is the increased mingling of federal authority in the ordinary life of the people. Ibid. 173–74; no. 16, 102–3; cf. Plebeian 6.11.2.

Some of the Anti-Federalists saw the implication for the states of this line of argument. John Smilie thought that, for just such reasons as Publius gave, the people would become unwilling to support the state governments at all. "For, Sir, the attachment of citizens to their government and its laws is founded upon the benefits which they derive from them, and it will last no longer than the duration of the power to confer those benefits. When, therefore, the people of the respective States shall find their governments grown torpid, and divested of the means to promote their welfare and interests, they will not, Sir, vainly idolize a shadow, nor disburse their hard earned wealth without the prospect of a compensation. The constitution of the States having become weak and useless to every beneficial purpose, will be suffered to dwindle and decay, and thus if the governors of the Union are not too impatient for the accomplishment of unrivalled and absolute dominion, the destruction of State jurisdiction will be produced by its own insignificance." McMaster and Stone 270–71.

*26. Elliot II, 254. See Wilson, ibid. 474; Philadelphiensis X, 3.9.80: "The allegiance of freemen to government will ever be a consequence of protection."

27. Jasper Yeates, McMaster and Stone 298; cf. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, John Marshall, Elliot III, 231; Tench Coxe, Ford, Pamphlets 147; John Dickinson, ibid. 174.

28. Elliot IV, 261, 260–61.

29. Edward Carrington to Thomas Jefferson, 9 June 1787, Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society 2d series, XVII, 463.

30. Hamilton, Elliot II, 353; see Randolph, Elliot III, 84–85.

*31. The Federalist no. 63; cf. Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6. Some Federalists did describe representation as a new idea. Thus Noah Webster asserted that "the moderns have invented the doctrine of representation, which seems to be the perfection of human government." Ford, Pamphlets 30, 42–43. See also Gorham, Elliot II, 68–69; Wilson, ibid. 423ff and McMaster and Stone 221ff.

32. State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 19 March 1788; cf. Ames, Elliot II, 8; The Federalist no. 10.

33. Henry 5.16.27; Smith 6.12.17.

*34. McMaster and Stone 335. The Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776 provided (II, sec. 7): "the house of representatives of the freemen of this commonwealth shall consist of persons most noted for wisdom and virtue, to be chosen by the freemen of every city and county of this commonwealth respectively." John Adams in his influential Thoughts on Government wrote of deputing power "from the many to a few of the most wise and good." Works IV, 194.

35. Livingston, Elliot II, 293; replied to by Smith, ibid. 310–11.

36. The Federalist no. 10, 62. Cassius (a Federalist reply to R. H. Lee), Virginia Independent Chronicle 2 April 1788; see Gouverneur Morris, Farrand II, 30–31 (17 July).

37. McMaster and Stone 336.

*38. Charles Cotesworth Pinckney, Elliot IV, 302. Consider, however, Hamilton's reflection that demagogues are not always petty men. Farrand I, 147 (6 June). Publius concedes that the the case is equivocal. If the large republic has a larger proportion of fit characters, it also has a larger proportion of bad ones; if corruption is more difficult, so is popular supervision of representatives. The Federalist no. 10, 63.

*39. The Federalist no. 57, 384. Nevertheless, it goes too far to say, as Gordon Wood does, that putting "good men into the administration" is "the crux of the Federalist argument," as indeed Wood's summary chapter sufficiently shows. Creation 508, 602–6. See this volume 53, 54, on limited government.

40. Ford, Pamphlets 40.

*41. Elliot II, 8. Wood sees behind such views the old notion of virtual representation based on an "organic" and homogeneous society, together with the clever rhetoric of a social elite seeking to maintain its position. The more plausible foundation is the ostensible one, the belief that even in a civil society devoted to the preservation of individual liberty, there is an objective collective interest which does not necessarily coincide with popular inclinations. Cf. Wood, Creation chs. 5, 12; The Federalist no. 71, 482–83.

42. Brutus I, 2.9.16; cf. Impartial Examiner 5.14.6.

43. A Defence of the Constitutions of Government of the United States of America I, letter 3 (John Adams, Works IV, 309–10). On citations to the Defence, see Martin 2.4.38 n. 9.

*44. Hamilton, Farrand II, 288 (18 June). See the very interesting discussion in [Carter Braxton] An Address to the Convention of . . . Virginia . . . By a Native of that Colony (Philadelphia 1776). Braxton describes the severe limits that a democratic regime based on public virtue requires. "Schemes like these may be practicable in countries so sterile by nature as to afford a scanty supply of the necessaries and none of the conveniences of life," but in a more bountiful country men "will always claim a right of using and enjoying the fruits of their honest industry, unrestrained by any ideal principles of government. . . . These are rights which freemen will never consent to relinquish, and after fighting for deliverance from one species of tyranny, it would be unreasonable to expect they should tamely acquiesce under another" (p. 17).

45. Centinel VIII, 2.7.126; see also [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.8.

46. See Harry V. Jaffa, "Agrarian Virtue and Republican Freedom: An Historical Perspective," Equality and Liberty: Theory and Practice in American Politics (New York 1965).

*47. Ford, Essays 140. A Landholder explains to his readers that he is a merchant, now retired to the country—the best of both worlds, as it were. See also The Federalist no. 12, and cf. Charles Pinckney's different view, Elliot IV, 321–22.

48. Noah Webster, Ford, Pamphlets 59.

*49. See "Vices of the Political System of the U. States," April 1787, Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) II, 366–69; Farrand I, 134–36 (6 June); The Federalist no. 10; letter to Thomas Jefferson, 24 October 1787, Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) V, 17–41, esp. 32. Douglass Adair has shown that Charles Beard was largely responsible for initiating the present-day prominence of The Federalist no. 10 and for giving it a peculiar interpretation. Adair shows without difficulty that Beard's description of Madison's theory as a form of economic determinism is wrong. He also shows that Madison had carefully worked out his defense of the extended republic and that it had played a prominent role in Madison's argument in the Constitutional Convention. The influence of Madison's arguments or the role played, more broadly, by various versions of the notion of the extended republic are questions that have yet to receive satisfactory examination. Adair, "The Tenth Federalist Revisited," William and Mary Quarterly January 1951; " 'That Politics May Be Reduced to a Science': David Hume, James Madison and the Tenth Federalist," Huntington Library Quarterly August 1957; both articles reprinted in Adair, Fame and the Founding Fathers chs. 3, 4.

50. Farrand I, 136 (6 June).

51. Brutus I, 2.9.16; see Federal Farmer VIII, 2.8.110.

52. See Charles Pinckney, Elliot IV, 326–27; G. Morris, Farrand II, 54 (19 July).

53. Elisha Douglass, Rebels and Democrats (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1955) 148, quoting American Archives 4th series, III, 1514.

*54. See A Citizen of America [Noah Webster], Ford, Pamphlets 55–56. Nevertheless, the Federalists preached too, though relying on it less. See, for example, James Wilson's Fourth of July Address, Boston Gazette and Country Journal 28 July 1788; Ralph Lerner, "The Supreme Court as Republican Schoolmaster," Supreme Court Review 1967.

55. Letter from Thomas B. Wait to George Thatcher, 22 November 1787, "Thatcher Papers," Historical Magazine November 1869, 258.

CHAPTER SIX

1. Lincoln, Elliot IV, 313. See the characteristic argument made by John Dewitt 4.3.10–14; Centinel I, 2.7.5–24.

*2. See Wood, Creation 488–92 and 503. Wood, however, underestimates the extent to which what he describes as the Old Whig concern with a dichotomy between rulers and people is still an important part of the Anti-Federal concern with aristocracy.

*3. See Mason 2.2.3–4; Brutus XVI, 2.9.202–4; "The Congress" (see above, ch. 3 n. 35); Cincinnatus IV, 6.1.26–34; V, 6.1.36. See Madison on the debate on executive departments in the first Congress, Annals of Congress I, 380 (1 May): "Perhaps there was no argument urged with more success or more plausibly grounded against the Constitution, under which we are deliberating, than that found in the mingling of the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government in one body." James Wilson confessed that the powers of the Senate were not favorite provisions of his but were generally desired. McMaster and Stone 326ff.

4. Cincinnatus V, 6.1.35; Centinel I, 2.7.23. See A Citizen, Carlisle Gazette 24 October 1787 (reply to Centinel).

5. Monroe 5.21.27; Federal Farmer XIV, 2.8.177; [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.30–31; "The Congress" (see above, ch. 3 n. 35); cf. Mason 2.2.6.

*6. Federal Farmer XIV, 2.8.178. Here again the Federal Farmer took the more traditional view, similar to Adams but different from Madison and from Publius. "In every large collection of people there must be a visible point serving as a common centre in the government, towards which to draw their eyes and attachments. The constitution must fix a man, or a congress of men, superior in the opinion of the people to the most popular man in the different parts of the community, else the people will be apt to divide and follow their respective leaders." Ibid. Cf. John Adams, Defence I, preface, letter 55 (Works IV, 285–92, 585). While A [Maryland] Farmer argued for the need in a representative system for an executive for life (V, 5.1.74), The Federal Farmer would have the executive limited to one several-year term. Both sought to avoid the convulsions invited by short-range terms and re-eligibility; rather than that, The Federal Farmer said, it would be "almost as well" to establish a hereditary executive (XIV, 2.8.180). Cf. Cornelius 4.10.12–15; Williamson, Farrand II, 101 (24 July); Franklin, Farrand I, 83 (2 June), 103 (4 June).

*7. Farrand I, 101–2, 113–14 (4 June). Randolph expressed himself as opposing "a unity in the Executive magistracy" which would be "the foetus of monarchy," a form of government altogether inconsistent with the fixed genius of the American people. Farrand I, 66 (1 June). See Centinel II, 2.7.51; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.45; Federal Republican 3.6.39; Maryland Convention Minority 5.4.7.

8. Mason, Elliot III, 496–97; Philadelphiensis IX, 3.9.61 (see also 3.9.57, 58, 60); Clinton 6.13.32; Cato IV, 2.6.25–26; Old Whig V, 3.3.31; Sidney 6.8.1; Officer of the Late Continental Army 3.8.3; Cornelius 4.10.12, 20–21; Lowndes 5.12.4; Impartial Examiner 5.14.38–40; Henry 5.16.7.

9. Symmes 4.5.2.

10. Henry 5.16.11.

11. Federal Republican 3.6.23–24; see Wilson, McMaster and Stone 359.

*12. On the Federalist side Charles Pinckney of South Carolina predicted that the national judiciary "might be made the keystone of the arch, the means of connecting and binding the whole together, of preserving uniformity in all the judicial proceedings of the Union. . . . [I]n republics, much more (in time of peace) would always depend upon the energy and integrity of the judicial than on any other part of the government—that, to insure these, extensive authorities were necessary. . . ." Elliot IV, 258.

13. Brutus XV, 2.9.186, 193. On judicial review, see also Centinel XVI, 2.7.168; Countryman from Dutchess County 6.6.27, 28; Martin 2.4.89; James Wilson, Elliot II, 489, 446, and McMaster and Stone 304–5; Ellsworth, Elliot II, 196.

*14. Federal Farmer XV, 2.8.185. Publius contended that "the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the constitution. . . . [T]hough individual oppression may now and then proceed from the courts of justice, the general liberty of the people can never be endangered from that quarter. . . ." The Federalist no. 78, 522–23.

15. Centinel V, 2.7.101.

*16. McMaster and Stone 280. Publius rejected this "political heresy," yet concluded that "the true test of a good government is its aptitude and tendency to produce a good administration." The Federalist no. 68, 461.

17. The Federalist no. 51, 349; R. R. Livingston, Elliot II, 345.

18. Demosthenes Minor, Gazette of the State of Georgia 15 November 1787 (see also his essay on 22 November 1787); Cassius, Virginia Independent Chronicle 2 April 1788.

19. Randolph, Elliot III, 70.

20. Iredell, Elliot IV, 221; see also ibid., 195: "There is a degree of jealousy which it is impossible to satisfy." See McKean, McMaster and Stone 274–75; One of the Middle Interest, Massachusetts Centinel 28 November 1787.

21. Alfredus, New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 18 January 1788.

22. The Federalist no. 76, 513–14.

*23. Agrippa XV, 4.6.71; Farrand II, 285 (14 August); see also Old Whig III, 3.3.17; Republican Federalist 4.13.18. See Thomas Jefferson, the Kentucky Resolutions: ". . . confidence is everywhere the parent of despotism—free government is founded in jealousy and not in confidence; it is jealousy, and not confidence which prescribes limited constitutions, to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power. . . ." The Complete Jefferson, ed. Saul K. Padover (New York 1943) 133. Samuel Adams: "[T]here is a Degree of Watchfulness over all Men possessed of Power or Influence upon which the Liberties of Mankind much depend." Letter to Elbridge Gerry, 23 April 1784, The Writings of Samuel Adams, ed. H. A. Cushing (New York 1904–8) IV, 302.

*24. Brutus IV, 2.9.54; Elliot II, 295–96; Smith 6.12.34. Cf. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.25; The Federalist no. 51, 349. The Anti-Federalists were impressed with Burgh's caution: "To take the character of man from history, he is a creature capable of any thing the most infernally cruel and horrid, when actuated by interest, or what is more powerful than interest, passion, and not in immediate fear of punishment from his fellow-creatures; for damnation lies out of sight. Who would trust such a mischievous monkey with superfluous power?" Burgh, Political Disquisitions I, 106. See N. Barrell in Elliot II, 159, and in letter to George Thatcher, 15 January 1788, Historical Magazine November 1869, 264–65; Columbian Patriot 4.28 passim; Luther Martin, Ford, Essays 378. And see Georgian 5.9.2: ". . . mankind, upon the whole, is so depraved as, with pleasure, to trample upon the sacred rights and privileges of their fellow creatures."

25. Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.58.

26. Centinel I, 2.7.9.

27. [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.30.

*28. Henry 5.16.14. "The executive branch of the government was eternally in action; it was ever awake; it never slept; its action was continuous and unceasing, like the tides of some mighty river, which continued flowing and flowing on, swelling, and deepening, and widening, in its onward progress, till it swept away every impediment, and broke down and removed every frail obstacle which might be set up to impede its course." Henry Clay, Speech on the Amendment of the Constitution Respecting the Veto Power, 24 January 1842, Life and Speeches of The Hon. Henry Clay, ed. Daniel Mallory, 4th ed. (New York 1844) II, 519. See Jefferson to Edward Carrington, 27 May 1788: "The natural progress of things is for liberty to yeild [sic] and government to gain ground." The Papers of Thomas Jefferson, ed. Julian P. Boyd (Princeton 1950–) XIII, 208–9.

CHAPTER SEVEN

1. See the very good statement by The Federal Farmer I, 2.8.13, and VI, 2.8.70.

2. Plebeian 6.11.12, 2.

3. Old Whig I, 3.3.3.

4. See this volume, ch. 6.

5. Elliot II, 348.

6. Henry, Elliot III, 579; see Cato III, 2.6.14.

7. Denatus 5.18.5.

8. Centinel IV, 2.7.89; G. Livingston, Elliot II, 388; Selected Committee for Cumberland County, Carlisle Gazette 5 March 1788; Columbian Patriot 4.28.4.

9. Henry 5.16.2.

10. Columbian Patriot 4.28.4. See Henry 5.16.11: "This Government is so new it wants a name."

11. Martin 2.4.38.

*12. Part of the limited character of the new government was the very division of power between the general government and the states, which has been discussed above (ch. 4). "Separation of powers" and "checks and balances" often took on an additional meaning for the Anti-Federalists, and even "mixed government" was sometimes used to refer to the "mixture" of general and state governments. Henry 5.16.22; Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.78. A major difficulty with the notion of a federal balance, however, is the absence of any third, "balancing" power. See Dickinson's excellent brief statement of the relation between traditional checks and balances and the American federal-state balance in the Constitutional Convention. Farrand I, 86–87 (2 June), 152–53 (7 June).

13. Kenyon, The Antifederalists lxxx.

14. See also Lowndes 5.12.3.

*15. The evidence bearing on the question of the influence on the Constitutional Convention of John Adams' book, the first volume of which reached Philadelphia in the spring of 1787, is slender. According to Charles Francis Adams, it "was much circulated in the convention, and undoubtedly contributed somewhat to give a direction to the opinions of the members." Benjamin Rush suggested to Richard Price that Adams' book was having a valuable effect on the constitutional deliberations. The influence has probably been exaggerated. As the text makes clear and as Gordon Wood has recently shown, the Constitutional scheme of complex government was quite different from Adams'. Yet they were both schemes of complex government. It is quite clear in any case that many Anti-Federalists took Adams' ideas to have been influential; and the Defence figured significantly in their discussions of the Constitution. John Adams, Works IV, 276; letter of Benjamin Rush to Richard Price, 2 June 1787, Letters of Benjamin Rush (ed. Butterfield) I, 418; Page Smith, John Adams (Garden City, N.Y., 1962) 698–701; Wood, Creation ch. 14; Centinel I, 2.7.7–9; Humble 3.7.1.

16. Centinel I, 2.7.7.

17. See Defence, preface (John Adams, Works IV, 284).

18. See Defence, letters 23, 25, 55 (John Adams, Works IV, 380–82, 397–98, 579–80.

*19. The American Founding generation found access to this tradition mainly, though by no means exclusively, through Montesquieu's The Spirit of Laws and William Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England, each in its way a modern adaptation of old ideas of the mixed regime. An important early American statement is to be found in The Essex Result (Newbury-Port 1778), printed in Theophilus Parsons, Jr., Memoir of Theophilus Parsons (Boston 1859) 359 ff. Most secondary work on mixed government and the separation of powers has now been superseded by M. J. C. Vile, Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers (Oxford 1967), and W. B. Gwyn, The Meaning of the Separation of Powers (New Orleans 1965).

20. Centinel I, 2.7.8–9. For a fuller and better argument in favor of simple government, see [anon.] Four Letters on Interesting Subjects (Pennsylvania 1776) (Evans, Early American Imprints no. 14759).

21. [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.34.

22. See this volume, ch. 6.

23. [Maryland] Farmer V, 5.1.69; see ibid. 80–82; Warren 6.14.168. See Adams' somewhat different account in his Defence, preface (Works IV, 289–90), and Monroe's in his Some Observations 5.21.21. On the obsolescence of pure democracy, see Alexis de Tocqueville, "Report Given before the Academy of Moral and Political Sciences on January 15, 1848 . . .," in Democracy in America, ed. Mayer (Garden City, N.Y., 1969), Appendix II, 740.

24. Defence, letter 25 (John Adams, Works IV, 397).

25. [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.29, 31.

26. Ibid. 5.1.18–49; V, 5.1.68–83.

*27. Henry 5.16.14. "There being nothing to prevent his [the President's] corruption but his virtue, which is but precarious, we have not sufficient security." Monroe, Elliot III, 489; see ibid. 218–19.

28. Henry 5.16.7, 14.

*29. Federal Farmer XI, 2.8.146, 145. It should be noted that The Federal Farmer's proposal was to increase the number in the Senate and to connect it with the states for stability and stature, so that his concern with a stronger place for the states in the new general government would also be served. See also ibid. VII, 2.8.97: "We talk of balance in the legislature, and among the departments of government; we ought to carry them to the body of the people."

*30. The same question arises in connection with the executive. Madison stated this in the convention on 6 June when he referred to the difficulty of rendering the executive competent to its own defense in a republic, "which could not give to an individual citizen that settled pre-eminence in the eyes of the rest, that weight of property, that personal interest against betraying the National Interest, which appertains to an hereditary magistrate." Farrand I, 138. See The Federalist nos. 76–77.

*31. Noah Webster, defending the need for a senate, even though there was no American nobility, said that "in most of our American constitutions, we have all the advantages of checks and balances, without the danger which may arise from a superior and independent order of men." Ford, Pamphlets 35ff.

*32. Elliot III, 218–19. See also the similar observation of A Citizen in the Carlisle Gazette for 24 October 1787, who contended that the branches were not intended to balance one another (at least, it may be added, not in the Adams sense) as Centinel claimed: "The sole intention of it is to produce wise and mature deliberations."

33. Officer of the Late Continental Army 3.8.3.

34. Centinel II, 2.7.50; Brutus XVI, 2.9.197.

*35. Federal Farmer X, 2.8.135. The writer went on to say, "and all be conformable to the condition of the several orders of the people," which is an additional part of the argument considered above. See also ibid. XIV, 2.8.173–78; Adams, Defence, letter 55 (Works IV, 581–84); Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England I, 48–52. Cf. the scheme in Tussman and tenBrock, "The Equal Protection of the Laws," California Law Review September 1949; and Vile, Constitutionalism and the Separation of Powers ch. 1.

*36. This is fundamentally the same argument made for an independent national executive as a result of experience under the Articles of Confederation. See Charles Thach, The Creation of the Presidency, 1775–1789: A Study in Constitutional History (Baltimore 1922) ch. 3. The position is compatible with legislative supremacy; and it was held by the civil service reformers of the late nineteenth century, who argued in favor of the independence of the civil service, even against the legislature, precisely on the ground that this was the only way the civil service could efficiently serve the legislature.

37. The Federalist no. 48, 332.

*38. See the very interesting discussion by Brutus of this question in his last essay (XVI, 2.9.197ff). It is perhaps significant that the Brutus essays broke off before reaching the promised discussion of the senatorial power of impeachment—the critical case of a mixture of powers in behalf of popular responsibility.

39. This is what Publius explained in The Federalist nos. 47 and 48.

*40. ". . . it is impracticable, perhaps, to maintain a perfect distinction between these several departments—for it is difficult, if not impossible, to call to account the several officers in government, without in some degree mixing the legislative and judicial." Brutus XVI, 2.9.197; see also ibid. 202–3.

*41. This is the traditional view of balanced government; cf. this volume, 55–56.

*42. A Citizen, Carlisle Gazette 24 October 1787. See Pelatiah Webster's defense of the division of the legislature into three branches, to promote both safety and mature deliberation. The veto of the President "will furnish all the new light which a most serious discussion in a third House can give, and will make a new discussion necessary in each of the other two, where every member will have an opportunity to revise his opinion, to correct his arguments, and bring his judgment to the greatest maturity possible." "Remarks on the Address of the Sixteen Members . . . ," McMaster and Stone 96. See Jean Louis DeLolme, Constitution of England (London 1853) II, ch. 3, 156–62.

*43. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England I, 48–52; see this volume 55–56 and ch. 7 n. 17. The movement from Adams to Madison is, among other things, a movement from legislative sovereignty to constitutional balance.

*44. The three-part division of functions, legislative, executive, and judiciary, seems a natural basis for a three-part balance of power arrangement. We need not here inquire into the deeper implications of the question whether a balance of power system necessarily reduces itself in principle to a three-part system. A three-part balance of power, however fluid and complex, seems the obvious foundation for the constitution-maker and was so viewed by the men of the Founding generation. (A major difficulty of the "federal" system as a balance of power system is its lack of a third, "balancing," power.) Neither do our present purposes require a consideration of the important question of the status of the particular threefold division of functions that finds expression in the American constitution. The chief alternatives to this scheme are the legislative-federative-executive division of Locke and the simpler legislative-executive scheme occasionally favored in the late eighteenth century and later adopted by civil service reformers and students of public administration.

*45. Elliot II, 434; cf. McMaster and Stone 230–31. Later Wilson explained: ". . . all authority of every kind is derived by REPRESENTATION from the PEOPLE and the DEMOCRATIC principle is carried into every part of the government." James Wilson, ibid. 344. The Constitution "unites in its different parts all the advantages, without any of the disadvantages, of three well-known forms of government and yet it preserves the attributes of a republic." One of the Four Thousand, ibid., 116. If Europe has the merit of discovering representation, Publius said, "America can claim the merit of making the discovery the basis of unmixed and extensive republics." The Federalist no. 14, 84. See Wood, Creation 584.

*46. Some of the Federalists also had doubts, most notably Alexander Hamilton, who expressed in the Philadelphia Convention his doubts about the scheme in which "a democratic assembly is to be checked by a democratic senate, and both these by a democratic chief magistrate." Farrand I, 310 (18 June).

CHAPTER EIGHT

1. See this volume 22–23 for a discussion of the Anti-Federalists' view of religion.

*2. Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.13. Many Anti-Federalists, especially in Pennsylvania, deplored the absence of any constitutional exemption from military service for conscientious objectors, such as the Quakers had enjoyed in Pennsylvania. Philadelphiensis II, 3.9.11.

*3. Cincinnatus I, 6.1.19. Others, on the other hand, were concerned that the officeholding could not be confined to Protestants or even Christians. Philadelphiensis II, 3.9.13.

4. Old Whig V, 3.3.27.

*5. The Anti-Federalists were especially warm in their defense of a free press, because of their own attempts to use the press to mobilize opinion in opposition to the Constitution and their belief that, in one way or another, attempts were being made to muzzle them. See below, Centinel II, 2.7.28–38. But they were also concerned, more deeply, that the Federalist lack of protection for a vigorous free press signaled a basic hostility to popular enlightenment, based on a dogma that government is too important a business for the people to be involved in. See Aristocrotis 3.16.3; Old Whig I, 3.3.3.

*6. Centinel I, 2.7.25; A Confederationist, Pennsylvania Herald and General Advertiser 27 October 1787. The precise meaning of freedom of the press was seldom discussed. James Wilson made the then-standard argument that it does not preclude the punishment of libel, including seditious libel: "what is meant by the liberty of the press is, that there should be no antecedent restraint upon it; but that every author is responsible when he attacks the security or welfare of the government or the safety, character and property of the individual." McMaster and Stone 308–9. See One of the Middle Interest (above, ch. 6 n. 20). Most of the Anti-Federalists would probably have accepted this understanding (see [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.3), but a few denied it, adopting the more modern view. A Confederationist went on to say, "When this declaration [of the liberty of the press] be made, let the attorney general of the United States, file an information against me for libel; I will carry that declaration in my hand, as my shield and my constitutional defence."

7. New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 18 January 1788; Luther Martin, Ford, Essays 364–65; cf. James Wilson's federal liberty argument, this volume 11. See Remarker, Boston Independent Chronicle 22 December 1787.

8. McMaster and Stone 143–44; see Charles Pinckney, Elliot IV, 259–60; Agrippa XIII, 4.6.60.

9. McMaster and Stone 144, 354; see ibid. 304–5.

10. See Leonard Levy, A Legacy of Suppression (Cambridge, Mass., 1960).

11. Brutus II, 2.9.26; see ibid. 2.9.31.

12. Aristocrotis 3.16.15. Cf. Symmes 4.5.2 on the laconic character of the Constitution.

13. Old Whig II, 3.3.12. See [Maryland] Farmer I, 5.1.15.

14. Randolph, Elliot III, 464–65. See also Yeates in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, McMaster and Stone 296.

15. Agrippa VI, 4.6.22; see Brutus II, 2.9.31; Henry 5.16.34–37; [Maryland] Farmer I, 5.1.12; Friend to the Rights of the People 4.23.6. For Federalist arguments being rebutted here, see Alfredus (above, ch. 6 n. 21); One of the Middle Interest (above, ch. 6 n. 20); A Citizen (above, ch. 2 n. 25); Civis Rusticus, Virginia Independent Chronicle 30 January 1788; Sherman, Farrand II, 588 (12 September).

16. Henry 5.16.37. Wilson, McMaster and Stone 254. See above, n. 12. See letter from S. Lee to George Thatcher, 19 January 1788, Historical Magazine November 1869, 266–67.

17. Federal Republican 3.6.50.

18. Samuel Chase, letter to John Lamb, 13 June 1788, in Leake, Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb 310; see Philadelphiensis 3.9.43.

19. Impartial Examiner 5.14.4.

20. Brutus II, 2.9.24.

21. McMaster and Stone 252; see Wilson, ibid. 253–54.

22. Elliot III, 191.

23. A Native of Virginia [Burwell Starkes?], Observations upon the Proposed Plan of Government (Petersburg, Va., 1788); this pamphlet was at one time erroneously attributed to James Monroe and is printed in The Writings of James Monroe, ed. S. M. Hamilton (New York 1898–1903) I, 349–55. See Wilson, McMaster and Stone 252–54; One of the Middle Interest (above, ch. 6. n. 20).

24. McMaster and Stone 295. See also Cassius, Ford, Essays 28; Plain Truth, McMaster and Stone 190–91.

25. Remarker, Boston Independent Chronicle 27 December 1787.

26. Agrippa XVI, 4.6.73; see this volume 40.

27. Hamilton, Elliot II, 239; see Smith 6.12.20 n. 21, and Elliot II, 354–55.

*28. Federal Farmer IX, 2.8.121. Agrippa XV, 4.6.71: "But for want of a bill of rights the resistance is always by the principles of their government, a rebellion which nothing but success can justify."

*29. Brutus X, 2.9.128; see VI, 2.9.69. Luther Martin contended that a man might find himself compelled to be guilty of treason against the general government or against his state, when the latter is resisting the arbitrary encroachments of the former. Martin 2.4.96.

*30. The Federalist no. 28, 179. It is striking that Publius' reference to checks by the states on the general government are usually connected with some reference to the ultimate defense by the people of their rights. See The Federalist no. 26, 169; no. 46, 321–22; no. 60, 404.

*31. "The public good, in which the private is necessarily involved, might be hurt by too particular an enumeration; and the private good could suffer no injury from a deficient enumeration, because Congress could not injure the rights of private citizens without injuring their own. . . ." Bowdoin, Elliot II, 87–88.

32. Delegate Who Has Catched Cold 5.19.16; Old Whig IV, 3.3.22. See Impartial Examiner 5.14.10.

33. Federal Farmer XVI, 2.8.196.

34. Sec. 15. In Thorpe, Federal and State Constitutions 3814.

CHAPTER NINE

1. Pendleton, Elliot III, 37; cf. Nicholas, ibid. 98; State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 12 March 1788.

*2. Hamilton, Elliot II, 301. Similarly, cheap government is not necessarily good government. See Noah Webster, Ford, Pamphlets 47; also Oliver Ellsworth's formulation: "The cheapest form of government is not always the best, for parsimony, though it spends little, generally gains nothing. Neither is that the best government which imposes the least restraint on its subjects; for the benefit of having others restrained may be greater than the disadvantage of being restrained ourselves. That is the best form of government which returns the greatest number of advantages in proportion to the disadvantages with which it is attended." The Landholder, Ford, Essays 192. See A Native of Virginia (above, ch. 8 n. 23), in The Writings of James Monroe 352; Impartial Examiner 5.14.2.

3. John Jay, Ford, Pamphlets 71.

4. The Federalist no. 51, 349.

5. McMaster and Stone 351.

*6. Maecenas, State Gazette of South Carolina 6 December 1787. "What the government may terminate in depends on the people. . . . " Civis Rusticus, Virginia Independent Chronicle 30 January 1788, reply to Mason: ". . . the liberties of the people never can be lost, until they are lost to themselves, in a vicious disregard of their dearest interests, a sottish indolence, a wild licentiousness, a dissoluteness of morals, and a contempt of all virtue." Ibid. See Governor Huntington, Elliot II, 199–200.

7. Elliot III, 536–37.

8. The Federalist no. 55, 378; cf. no. 76, 513–14.

*9. For a revealing picture of Federalist government to contrast with Federalist principles of government, see Leonard D. White, The Federalists (New York 1948) chs. 2, 3, 8, 9, and 40, and The Jeffersonians (New York 1951) chs. 3–5 and 35.

*10. Cato V, 2.6.34. "Where then is our republicanism to be found? Not in our constitution but merely in the spirit of our people. That would oblige even a despot to govern us republicanly." Memoirs, Correspondence and Miscellanies from the Papers of Thomas Jefferson, ed. Thomas Jefferson Randolph, 2d ed. (Boston 1830) IV, 287.

11. The Spirit of Laws IV, ch. 5.

12. Federal Republican 3.6.21.

13. 1 Cranch 137, 176–78 (1803).

*14. The Federalist no. 49, 340–41. Cf. Madison to Jefferson, 4 February 1798, Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) V, 438–39. John Marshall described the adoption of the Constitution as "a very great exertion." Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 137, 176 (1803).

15. The Federalist no. 37, 238.

16. [John Dickinson] "Letter from a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies" (1767), in Empire and Nation, ed. Forrest McDonald (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1962) 69. See The Federalist no. 37; A Citizen of New York [John Jay], "An Address to the People of the State of New York," Ford, Pamphlets 69–86.

*17. Impartial Examiner 5.14.15. See Mercy Warren, this volume 76. After the Revolution, Federalist John Jay wrote, "the spirit of private gain expelled the spirit of public good, and men became more intent on the means of enriching and aggrandizing themselves than of enriching and aggrandizing their country." Ford, Pamphlets 70–71; see Jay in New York convention, Elliot II, 284. Columbian Patriot 4.28.3:

"But there are certain seasons in the course of human affairs, when Genius, Virtue, and Patriotism, seems to nod over the vices of the times, and perhaps never more remarkably, than at the present period."

18. Lincoln, Collected Works I, 108–15. See Harry V. Jaffa, Crisis of the House Divided (Garden City, N.Y., 1959) ch. 9.

19. Columbian Patriot 4.28.12; see Mercy Warren on Washington, 6.14.54–77.

*20. The Federalists were not, generally speaking, less antislavery than the Anti-Federalists (indeed, one of the very few attempts to provide any kind of moral justification of slavery was made by Anti-Federalist Rawlins Lowndes); but their commitment to a policy of interest made it relatively easy to say, as did Oliver Ellsworth of the participation by the Southern states in the slave trade, that "their consciences are their own, tho' their wealth and strength are blended with ours." The Landholder, Ford, Essays 164; see also William Heath, Elliot II, 115. See Ford, Pamphlets 146; Martin 2.4.45, 68–70. The Anti-Federalists were less easily persuaded that questions of politics can be freed from questions of conscience.

21. Warren 6.14.67.

The Articles of Confederation

Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions
(see volumes 2–6 below)

To all to whom these Presents shall come, we the under signed Delegates of the States affixed to our Names, send greeting.

Whereas the Delegates of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, did, on the 15th day of November, in the Year of Our Lord One thousand Seven Hundred and Seventy seven, and in the Second Year of the Independence of America, agree to certain articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the States of Newhampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhodeisland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina, and Georgia in the words following, viz. "Articles of Confederation and perpetual Union between the states of Newhampshire, Massachusetts-bay, Rhodeisland and Providence Plantations, Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia. [3.11.30; 4.13.16; 5.16.1–2]

Article I. The Stile of this confederacy shall be "The United States of America." [5.21.6]

Article II. Each state retains its sovereignty, freedom, and independence, and every Power, Jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States, in Congress assembled. [2.5.9; 2.6.3; 2.7.37–38; 2.7.98; 2.8.81; 3.3.8; 3.5.2; 3.6.51; 3.11.27; 5.12.2; 5.14.5; 5.21.6; 5.21.8; 5.21.12]

Article III. The said states hereby severally enter into a firm league of friendship with each other, for their common defence, the security of their Liberties, and their mutual and general welfare, binding themselves to assist each other, against all force offered to, or attacks made upon them, or any of them, on account of religion, sovereignty, trade, or any other pretence whatever. [3.6.2; 5.14.44–45; 5.21.6]

Article IV. The better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different states in this union, the free inhabitants of each of these states, paupers, vagabonds and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several states; and the people of each state shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other state, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively, provided that such restriction shall not extend so far as to prevent the removal of property imported into any state, to any other state, of which the Owner is an inhabitant; provided also that no imposition, duties or restrictions shall be laid by any state, on the property of the united states, or either of them. [2.8.85; 5.21.6]

If any Person guilty of, or charged with treason, felony, or other high misdemeanor in any state, shall flee from Justice, and be found in any of the united states, he shall, upon demand of the Governor or executive power, of the state from which he fled, be delivered up and removed to the state having jurisdiction of his offence.

Full faith and credit shall be given in each of these states to the records, acts and judicial proceedings of the courts and magistrates of every other state.

Article V. For the more convenient management of the general interests of the united states, delegates shall be annually appointed in such manner as the legislature of each state shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November, in every year, with a power reserved to each state, to recal its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead, for the remainder of the Year. [2.8.147; 5.21.6; 5.21.8]

No state shall be represented in Congress by less than two, nor by more than seven Members; and no person shall be capable of being a delegate for more than three years in any term of six years; nor shall any person, being a delegate, be capable of holding any office under the united states, for which he, or another for his benefit receives any salary, fees or emolument of any kind.

Each state shall maintain its own delegates in a meeting of the states, and while they act as members of the committee of the states.

In determining questions in the united states in Congress assembled, each state shall have one vote. [2.4.28; 2.4.32–33; 2.4.35; 2.4.45; 3.6.12]

Freedom of speech and debate in Congress shall not be impeached or questioned in any Court, or place out of Congress, and the members of congress shall be protected in their persons from arrests and imprisonments, during the time of their going to and from, and attendance on congress, except for treason, felony, or breach of the peace.

Article VI. No state, without the Consent of the united states in congress assembled, shall send any embassy to, or receive any embassy from, or enter into any conference, agreement, alliance or treaty with any King prince or state; nor shall any person holding any office of profit or trust under the united states, or any of them, accept of any present, emolument, office or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince or foreign state; nor shall the united states in congress assembled, or any of them, grant any title of nobility. [2.8.84; 5.16.2; 5.21.5]

No two or more states shall enter into any treaty, confederation or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the united states in congress assembled, specifying accurately the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue.

No state shall lay any imposts or duties, which may interfere with any stipulations in treaties, entered into by the united states in congress assembled, with any king, prince or state, in pursuance of any treaties already proposed by congress, to the courts of France and Spain.

No vessels of war shall be kept up in time of peace by any state, except such number only, as shall be deemed necessary by the united states in congress assembled, for the defence of such state, or its trade; nor shall any body of forces be kept up by any state, in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgment of the united states, in congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such state; but every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred, and shall provide and constantly have ready for use, in public stores, a due number of field pieces and tents, and a proper quantity of arms, ammunition and camp equipage. [2.9.112]

No state shall engage in any war without the consent of the united states in congress assembled, unless such state be actually invaded by enemies, or shall have received certain advice of a resolution being formed by some nation of Indians to invade such state, and the danger is so imminent as not to admit of a delay till the united states in congress assembled can be consulted: nor shall any state grant commisssions to any ships or vessels of war, nor letters of marque or reprisal, except it be after a declaration of war by the united states in congress assembled, and then only against the kingdom or state and the subjects thereof, against which war has been so declared, and under such regulations as shall be established by the united states in congress assembled, unless such state be infested by pirates, in which case vessels of war may be fitted out for that occasion, and kept so long as the danger shall continue, or until the united states in congress assembled, shall determine otherwise.

Article VII. When land-forces are raised by any state for the common defence, all officers of or under the rank of colonel, shall be appointed by the legislature of each state respectively, by whom such forces shall be raised, or in such manner as such state shall direct, and all vacancies shall be filled up by the State which first made the appointment. [5.21.6]

Article VIII. All charges of war, and all other expences that shall be incurred for the common defence or general welfare, and allowed by the united states in congress assembled, shall be defrayed out of a common treasury, which shall be supplied by the several states in proportion to the value of all land within each state, granted to or surveyed for any Person, as such land and the buildings and improvements thereon shall be estimated according to such mode as the united states in congress assembled, shall from time to time direct and appoint. [2.8.123; 3.6.43; 5.21.6]

The taxes for paying that proportion shall be laid and levied by the authority and direction of the legislatures of the several states within the time agreed upon by the united states in congress assembled.

Article IX. The united states in congress assembled, shall have the sole and exclusive right and power of determining on peace and war, except in the cases mentioned in the sixth article—of sending and receiving ambassadors—entering into treaties and alliances, provided that no treaty of commerce shall be made whereby the legislative power of the respective states shall be restrained from imposing such imposts and duties on foreigners as their own people are subjected to, or from prohibiting the exportation or importation of any species of goods or commodities, whatsoever—of establishing rules for deciding in all cases, what captures on land or water shall be legal, and in what manner prizes taken by land or naval forces in the service of the united states shall be divided or appropriated—of granting letters of marque and reprisal in times of peace—appointing courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas and establishing courts for receiving and determining finally appeals in all cases of captures, provided that no member of congress shall be appointed a judge of any of the said courts. [2.8.82–83; 4.2.8; 5.21.5]

The united states in congress assembled shall also be the last resort on appeal in all disputes and differences now subsisting or that hereafter may arise between two or more states concerning boundary, jurisdiction or any other cause whatever; which authority shall always be exercised in the manner following. Whenever the legislative or executive authority or lawful agent of any state in controversy with another shall present a petition to congress stating the matter in question and praying for a hearing, notice thereof shall be given by order of congress to the legislative or executive authority of the other state in controversy, and a day assigned for the appearance of the parties by their lawful agents, who shall then be directed to appoint by joint consent, commissioners or judges to constitute a court for hearing and determining the matter in question: but if they cannot agree, congress shall name three persons out of each of the united states, and from the list of such persons each party shall alternately strike out one, the petitioners beginning, until the number shall be reduced to thirteen; and from that number not less than seven, nor more than nine names as congress shall direct, shall in the presence of congress be drawn out by lot, and the persons whose names shall be so drawn or any five of them, shall be commissioners or judges, to hear and finally determine the controversy, so always as a major part of the judges who shall hear the cause shall agree in the determination: and if either party shall neglect to attend at the day appointed, without showing reasons, which congress shall judge sufficient, or being present shall refuse to strike, the congress shall proceed to nominate three persons out of each state, and the secretary of congress shall strike in behalf of such party absent or refusing; and the judgment and sentence of the court to be appointed, in the manner before prescribed, shall be final and conclusive; and if any of the parties shall refuse to submit to the authority of such court, or to appear or defend their claim or cause, the court shall nevertheless proceed to pronounce sentence, or judgment, which shall in like manner be final and decisive, the judgment or sentence and other proceedings being in either case transmitted to congress, and lodged among the acts of congress for the security of the parties concerned: provided that every commissioner, before he sits in judgment, shall take an oath to be administered by one of the judges of the supreme or superior court of the state, where the cause shall be tried, "well and truly to hear and determine the matter in question, according to the best of his judgment, without favour, affection or hope of reward:" provided also, that no state shall be deprived of territory for the benefit of the united states.

All controversies concerning the private right of soil claimed under different grants of two or more states, whose jurisdictions as they may respect such lands, and the states which passed such grants are adjusted, the said grants or either of them being at the same time claimed to have originated antecedent to such settlement of jurisdiction, shall on the petition of either party to the congress of the united states, be finally determined as near as may be in the same manner as is before prescribed for deciding disputes respecting territorial jurisdiction between different states.

The united states in congress assembled shall also have the sole and exclusive right and power of regulating the alloy and value of coin struck by their own authority, or by that of the respective states—fixing the standard of weights and measures throughout the united states—regulating the trade and managing all affairs with the Indians, not members of any of the states, provided that the legislative right of any state within its own limits be not infringed or violated—establishing or regulating post-offices from one state to another, thoughout all the united states, and exacting such postage on the papers passing thro' the same as may be requisite to defray the expences of the said office—appointing all officers of the land forces, in the service of the united states, excepting regimental officers—appointing all the officers of the naval forces, and commissioning all officers whatever in the service of the united states—making rules for the government and regulation of the said land and naval forces, and directing their operations.

The united states in congress assembled shall have authority to appoint a committee, to sit in the recess of congress, to be denominated "A Committee of the States," and to consist of one delegate from each state; and to appoint such other committees and civil officers as may be necessary for managing the general affairs of the united states under their direction—to appoint one of the number to preside, provided that no person be allowed to serve in the office of president more than one year in any term of three years; to ascertain the necessary sums of money to be raised for the service of the united states, and to appropriate and apply the same for defraying the public expences—to borrow money, or emit bills on the credit of the united states, transmitting every half year to the respective states an account of the sums of money so borrowed or emitted,—to build and equip a navy—to agree upon the number of land forces, and to make requisitions from each state for its quota, in proportion to the number of white inhabitants in such state; which requisition shall be binding, and thereupon the legislature of each state shall appoint the regimental officers, raise the men and cloath, arm and equip them in a soldier like manner, at the expence of the united states; and the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the united states in congress assembled: But if the united states in congress assembled shall, on consideration of circumstances judge proper that any state should not raise men, or should raise a smaller number than its quota, and that any other state should raise a greater number of men than the quota thereof, such extra number shall be raised, officered, cloathed, armed and equipped in the same manner as the quota of such state, unless the legislature of such state shall judge that such extra number cannot be safely spared out of the same, in which case they shall raise officer, cloath, arm and equip as many of such extra number as they judge can be safely spared. And the officers and men so cloathed, armed and equipped, shall march to the place appointed, and within the time agreed on by the united states in congress assembled.

The united states in congress assembled shall never engage in a war, nor grant letters of marque and reprisal in time of peace, nor enter into any treaties or alliances, nor coin money, nor regulate the value thereof, nor ascertain the sums and expences necessary for the defence and welfare of the united states, or any of them, nor emit bills, nor borrow money on the credit of the united states, nor appropriate money, nor agree upon the number of vessels of war, to be built or purchased, or the number of land or sea forces to be raised, nor appoint a commander in chief of the army or navy, unless nine states assent to the same: nor shall a question on any other point, except for adjourning from day to day be determined, unless by the votes of a majority of the united states in congress assembled. [2.9.114]

The congress of the united states shall have power to adjourn to any time within the year, and to any place within the united states, so that no period of adjournment be for a longer duration than the space of six Months, and shall publish the Journal of their proceedings monthly, except such parts thereof relating to treaties, alliances or military operations, as in their judgment require secrecy; and the yeas and nays of the delegates of each state on any question shall be entered on the Journal, when it is desired by any delegate; and the delegates of a state, or any of them, at his or their request shall be furnished with a transcript of the said Journal, except such parts as are above excepted, to lay before the legislatures of the several states.

Article X. The committee of the states, or any nine of them, shall be authorized to execute, in the recess of congress, such of the powers of congress as the united states in congress assembled, by the consent of nine states, shall from time to time think expedient to vest them with; provided that no power be delegated to the said committee, for the exercise of which, by the articles of confederation, the voice of nine states in the congress of the united states assembled is requisite. [5.21.6]

Article XI. Canada acceding to this confederation, and joining in the measures of the united states, shall be admitted into, and entitled to all the advantages of this union: but no other colony shall be admitted into the same, unless such admission be agreed to by nine states. [2.8.85; 5.21.6]

Article XII. All bills of credit emitted, monies borrowed and debts contracted by, or under the authority of congress, before the assembling of the united states, in pursuance of the present confederation, shall be deemed and considered as a charge against the united states, for payment and satisfaction whereof the said united states, and the public faith are hereby solemnly pledged. [2.7.167; 5.21.6]

Article XIII. Every state shall abide by the determinations of the united states in congress assembled, on all questions which by this confederation are submitted to them. And the Articles of this confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them; unless such alteration be agreed to in a congress of the united states, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state. [2.1.3; 2.3.4–5; 2.4.36; 2.4.110–14; 2.6.3; 2.6.9; 2.8.85; 2.8.229; 3.3.42; 3.11.9; 4.2.11; 4.3.26; 4.4.13; 4.6.43; 4.10.4; 4.13.6–7; 4.13.10; 4.13.16; 4.14.10; 5.3.1; 5.21.4; 5.21.6; 6.5.4; 6.6.20; 6.7.4; 6.11.8]

And Whereas it hath pleased the Great Governor of the World to incline the hearts of the legislatures we respectively represent in congress, to approve of, and to authorize us to ratify the said articles of confederation and perpetual union. Know Ye that we the undersigned delegates, by virtue of the power and authority to us given for that purpose, do by these presents, in the name and in behalf of our respective constituents, fully and entirely ratify and confirm each and every of the said articles of confederation and perpetual union, and all and singular the matters and things therein contained: And we do further solemnly plight and engage the faith of our respective constituents, that they shall abide by the determinations of the united states in congress assembled, on all questions, which by the said confederation are submitted to them. And that the articles thereof shall be inviolably observed by the states we respectively represent, and that the union shall be perpetual. In Witness whereof we have hereunto set our hands in Congress. Done at Philadelphia in the state of Pennsylvania the ninth day of July, in the Year of our Lord one Thousand seven Hundred and Seventy-eight, and in the third year of the independence of America.

Josiah Bartlett,
John Wentworth, junr.
August 8th, 1778,
— On the part & behalf of the State of New Hampshire.

John Hancock,
Samuel Adams,
Elbridge Gerry,
Francis Dana,
James Lovell,
Samuel Holten,
— On the part and behalf of the State of Massachusetts Bay.

William Ellery,
Henry Marchant,
John Collins,
— On the part and behalf of the State of Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations.

Roger Sherman,
Samuel Huntington,
Oliver Wolcott,
Titus Hosmer,
Andrew Adams,
— On the part and behalf of the State of Connecticut.

Jas. Duane,
Fra. Lewis,
Wm. Duer,
Gouvr. Morris,
— On the part and behalf of the State of New York.

Jno. Witherspoon,
Nathl. Scudder,
— On the Part and in Behalf of the State of New Jersey, November 26th, 1778.

Robert Morris,
Daniel Roberdeau,
Jon. Bayard Smith,
William Clingar,
Joseph Reed,
22d July, 1778,
— On the part and behalf of the State of Pennsylvania.

Thos. McKean,
Feby. 22d, 1779,
John Dickinson,
May 5th, 1779,
Nicholas Van Dyke,
— On the part & behalf of the State of Delaware.

John Hanson,
March 1, 1781,
Daniel Carroll, do
— On the part and behalf of the State of Maryland.

Richard Henry Lee,
John Banister,
Thomas Adams,
Jno. Harvie,
Francis Lightfoot Lee,
— On the Part and Behalf of the State of Virginia.

John Penn,
July 21st, 1778,
Corns. Harnett,
Jno. Williams,
— On the part and behalf of the State of North Carolina.

Henry Laurens,
William Henry Drayton,
Jno. Mathews,
Richd. Hutson,
Thos. Heyward, junr.
} On the part and on behalf of the State of South Carolina.

Jno. Walton,
24th July, 1778,
Edwd. Telfair,
Edwd. Langworthy,
} On the part and behalf of the State of Georgia.

The Constitution of the United States

Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions
(see volumes 2–6 below)

We the People of the United States, in Order to form a more perfect Union, establish Justice, insure domestic Tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general Welfare, and secure the Blessings of Liberty to ourselves and our Posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America. [2.9.57; 3.11.30; 4.13.21; 5.16.1; 6.9.2; 6.13.25]

Article. I.

Section. 1. All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives.

Section. 2. The House of Representatives shall be composed of Members chosen every second Year by the People of the several States, and the Electors in each State shall have the Qualifications requisite for Electors of the most numerous Branch of the State Legislature. [2.6.35; 2.6.37; 2.7.22; 4.6.60]

No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the Age of twenty five Years, and been seven Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State in which he shall be chosen. [2.8.150; 4.13.26]

Representatives and direct Taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective Numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole Number of free Persons, including those bound to Service for a Term of Years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other Persons. [2.6.39; 2.8.44; 3.6.43–44; 4.14.1–2; 4.13.22; 4.26.4; 6.12.8] The actual Enumeration shall be made within three Years after the first Meeting of the Congress of the United States, and within every subsequent Term of ten Years, in such Manner as they shall by law direct. The Number of Representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty Thousand, but each State shall have at Least one Representative; and until such enumeration shall be made the State of New Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North Carolina five, South Carolina five, and Georgia three. [2.8.15; 2.8.25; 3.6.12; 3.11.34–35; 4.13.25; 6.1.29; 6.12.8–10]

When vacancies happen in the Representation from any State, the Executive Authority thereof shall issue Writs of Election to fill such Vacancies.

The House of Representatives shall chuse their Speaker and other Officers; and shall have the sole Power of Impeachment. [2.4.87; 3.16.15; 6.1.29]

Section. 3. The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six Years; and each Senator shall have one Vote. [2.6.37; 2.8.147, 164, 214; 2.9.198–201; 3.14.14; 5.3.7; 5.21.32–33; 6.1.26–36; 6.12.25–35]

Immediately after they shall be assembled in Consequence of the first Election, they shall be divided as equally as may be into three Classes. The Seats of the Senators of the first Class shall be vacated at the Expiration of the second Year, of the second Class at the Expiration of the fourth Year, and of the third Class at the Expiration of the sixth Year, so that one third may be chosen every second Year; and if Vacancies happen by Resignation, or otherwise, during the Recess of the Legislature of any State, the Executive thereof may make temporary Appointments until the next Meeting of the Legislature, which shall then fill such Vacancies. [3.6.15; 3.6.42]

No Person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty Years, and been nine Years a Citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an Inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen.

The Vice President of the United States shall be President of the Senate, but shall have no Vote, unless they be equally divided. [2.4.84; 6.1.27]

The Senate shall chuse their other Officers, and also a President pro tempore, in the Absence of the Vice President, or when he shall exercise the Office of President of the United States.

The Senate shall have the sole Power to try all Impeachments. When sitting for that Purpose, they shall be on Oath or Affirmation. When the President of the United States is tried, the Chief Justice shall preside: And no Person shall be convicted without the Concurrence of two thirds of the Members present. [2.4.88; 2.6.45; 5.21.33]

Judgment in Cases of Impeachment shall not extend further than to removal from Office, and disqualification to hold and enjoy any Office of honor, Trust or Profit under the United States: but the Party convicted shall nevertheless be liable and subject to Indictment, Trial, Judgment and Punishment, according to Law.

Section. 4. The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing Senators. [2.6.46–47; 2.7.73–74; 2.7.100; 2.8.181; 3.11.25; 3.16.5; 4.4.2–3; 4.4.6; 4.10.10; 6.1.53–55; 6.7.4]

The Congress shall assemble at least once in every Year, and such Meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by Law appoint a different Day.

Section. 5. Each House shall be the Judge of the Elections, Returns and Qualifications of its own Members, and a Majority of each shall constitute a Quorum to do Business; but a small Number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the Attendance of absent Members, in such Manner, and under such Penalties as each House may provide. [2.8.28; 4.10.10]

Each House may determine the Rules of its Proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly Behaviour, and, with the Concurrence of two thirds, expel a Member.

Each House shall keep a Journal of its Proceedings, and from time to time publish the same, excepting such Parts as may in their Judgment require Secrecy; and the Yeas and Nays of the Members of either House on any question shall, at the Desire of one fifth of those Present, be entered on the Journal. [4.5.2; 5.16.20]

Neither House, during the Session of Congress, shall, without the Consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other Place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting.

Section. 6. The Senators and Representatives shall receive a Compensation for their Services, to be ascertained by Law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. [3.14.15; 4.10.8–9; 4.14.1; 4.23.3(3); 5.12.2] They shall in all Cases, except Treason, Felony and Breach of the Peace, be privileged from Arrest during their Attendance at the Session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any Speech or Debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other Place. [3.4.3]

No Senator or Representative shall, during the Time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil Office under the Authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the Emoluments whereof shall have been encreased during such time; and no Person holding any Office under the United States, shall be a Member of either House during his Continuance in Office. [2.4.46–48; 4.13.5]

Section. 7. All Bills for raising Revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with Amendments as on other Bills. [2.2.3; 2.4.51–52; 3.6.41; 4.2.6; 6.1.27]

Every Bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate, shall, before it become a Law, be presented to the President of the United States; If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his Objections to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the Objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it. If after such Reconsideration two thirds of that House shall agree to pass the Bill, it shall be sent, together with the Objections, to the other House, by which it shall likewise be reconsidered, and if approved by two thirds of that House, it shall become a Law. But in all such Cases the Votes of both Houses shall be determined by yeas and Nays, and the Names of the Persons voting for and against the Bill shall be entered on the Journal of each House respectively. If any Bill shall not be returned by the President within ten days (Sundays excepted) after it shall have been presented to him, the Same shall be a Law, in like Manner as if he had signed it, unless the Congress by their Adjournment prevent its Return in which Case it shall not be a Law. [2.4.53–54; 3.9.65; 3.12.15–17; 5.14.38]

Every Order, Resolution, or Vote to which the Concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of Adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the Same shall take Effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the Rules and Limitations prescribed in the Case of a Bill.

Section. 8. The Congress shall have Power To lay and collect Taxes, Duties, Imposts and Excises, to pay the Debts and provide for the common Defence and general Welfare of the United States; but all Duties, Imposts and Excises shall be uniform throughout the United States; [2.4.55–56; 4.5.8–16; 5.14.6; 6.12.36–38]

To borrow Money on the credit of the United States; [3.14.12; 4.22.4; 6.8.28]

To regulate Commerce with foreign Nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian Tribes; [4.6.53]

To establish an uniform Rule of Naturalization, and uniform Laws on the subject of Bankruptcies throughout the United States; [2.8.10; 2.8.35; 2.8.214; 2.8.224; 3.13.5]

To coin Money, regulate the Value thereof, and of foreign Coin, and fix the Standard of Weights and Measures;

To provide for the Punishment of counterfeiting the Securities and current Coin of the United States;

To establish Post Offices and post Roads;

To promote the Progress of Science and useful Arts, by securing for limited Times to Authors and Inventors the exclusive Right to their respective Writings and Discoveries;

To constitute Tribunals inferior to the supreme Court;

To define and punish Piracies and Felonies committed on the high Seas, and Offences against the Law of Nations; [2.8.185; 2.9.86; 4.6.42; 4.9.22]

To declare War, grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal, and make Rules concerning Captures on Land and Water; [3.6.20; 5.16.23; 5.21.5]

To raise and support Armies, but no Appropriation of Money to that Use shall be for a longer Term than two Years; [2.4.59; 2.8.39; 4.5.2; 4.23.3(4)]

To provide and maintain a Navy;

To make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces;

To provide for calling forth the Militia to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions; [2.4.60–61; 2.8.217; 3.3.29; 3.11.58; 5.16.2]

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress;

To exercise exclusive Legislation in all cases whatsoever, over such District (not exceeding ten Miles square) as may, by Cession of particular States, and the Acceptance of Congress, become the Seat of the Government of the United States, [2.8.222–23; 2.9.200; 4.8.1; 4.9.32; 4.12.10; 5.7.7] and to exercise like Authority over all Places purchased by the Consent of the Legislature of the State in which the Same shall be, for the Erection of Forts, Magazines, Arsenals, dock-Yards, and other needful Buildings; [2.8.223–24; 5.16.12]—And

To make all Laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into Execution the foregoing Powers, and all other Powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any Department or Officer thereof. [2.9.5; 2.9.8–9; 2.9.57; 2.9.60; 2.9.153; 3.3.12; 6.1.24; 6.9.13; 6.9.23]

Section. 9. The Migration or Importation of such Persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the Year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a Tax or duty may be imposed on such Importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each Person. [2.2.14; 2.4.63–71; 2.6.35; 2.9.39; 5.12.1]

The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public Safety may require it. [2.9.30; 5.9.8; 5.16.38]

No Bill of Attainder or ex post facto Law shall be passed. [2.9.103; 3.16.18; 5.16.39; 6.7.13]

No Capitation, or other direct, Tax shall be laid, unless in Proportion to the Census or Enumeration herein before directed to be taken. [2.8.44]

No Tax or Duty shall be laid on Articles exported from any State.

No Preference shall be given by any Regulation of Commerce or Revenue to the Ports of one State over those of another: nor shall Vessels bound to, or from, one State, be obliged to enter, clear, or pay Duties in another. [2.4.73–74]

No Money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in Consequence of Appropriations made by Law; and a regular Statement and Account of the Receipts and Expenditures of all public Money shall be published from time to time. [4.22.4; 5.16.8]

No Title of Nobility shall be granted by the United States: And no Person holding any Office of Profit or Trust under them, shall, without the Consent of the Congress, accept of any present, Emolument, Office, or Title, of any kind whatever, from any King, Prince, or foreign State. [2.8.198; 4.2.10; 6.7.8]

Section. 10. No State shall enter into any Treaty, Alliance, or Confederation; grant Letters of Marque and Reprisal; coin Money; emit Bills of Credit; make any Thing but gold and silver Coin a Tender in Payment of Debts; pass any Bill of Attainder, ex post facto Law, or Law impairing the Obligation of Contracts, or grant any Title of Nobility. [2.4.76–77; 2.9.182; 3.13.5; 4.5.2]

No State shall, without the Consent of the Congress, lay any Imposts or Duties on Imports or Exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing it's inspection Laws: and the net Produce of all Duties and Imposts, laid by any State on Imports or Exports, shall be for the Use of the Treasury of the United States; and all such Laws shall be subject to the Revision and Controul of the Congress. [2.4.79; 3.14.11; 5.12.2; 6.1.43]

No State shall, without the Consent of Congress, lay any Duty of Tonnage, keep Troops, or Ships of War in time of Peace, enter into any Agreement or Compact with another State, or with a foreign Power, or engage in War, unless actually invaded, or in such imminent Danger as will not admit of delay. [2.8.200]

Article. II.

Section. 1. The executive Power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America. [2.4.81; 2.6.25; 5.2.3] He shall hold his Office during the Term of four Years, and, together with the Vice President, chosen for the same Term, be elected as follows

Each State shall appoint, in such Manner as the Legislature thereof may direct, a Number of Electors, equal to the whole Number of Senators and Representatives to which the State may be entitled in the Congress: but no Senator or Representative, or Person holding an Office of Trust or Profit under the United States, shall be appointed an Elector. [2.4.83; 2.6.30; 2.6.47; 2.7.100; 2.8.177; 2.8.214; 3.9.63; 4.6.75; 4.9.11; 4.13.13; 4.28.4; 5.9.9; 5.13.13]

The Electors shall meet in their respective States, and vote by Ballot for two Persons, of whom one at least shall not be an Inhabitant of the same

State with themselves. And they shall make a List of all the Persons voted for, and of the Number of Votes for each; which List they shall sign and certify, and transmit sealed to the Seat of the Government of the United States, directed to the President of the Senate. The President of the Senate shall, in the Presence of the Senate and House of Representatives, open all the Certificates, and Votes shall then be counted. The Person having the greatest Number of Votes shall be the President, if such Number be a Majority of the whole Number of Electors appointed; and if there be more than one who have such Majority, and have an equal Number of Votes, then the House of Representatives shall immediately chuse by Ballot one of them for President; and if no Person have a Majority, then from the five highest on the List the said House shall in like Manner chuse the President. But in chusing the President, the Votes shall be taken by States, the Representation from each State having one Vote; A quorum for this Purpose shall consist of a Member or Members from two thirds of the States, and a Majority of all the States shall be necessary to a Choice. In every Case, after the Choice of the President, the Person having the greatest Number of Votes of the Electors shall be the Vice President. [2.4.84] But if there should remain two or more who have equal Votes, the Senate shall chuse from them by Ballot the Vice President.

The Congress may determine the Time of chusing the Electors, and the Day on which they shall give their Votes; which Day shall be the same throughout the United States.

No Person except a natural born Citizen, or a Citizen of the United States, at the time of the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the Office of President; neither shall any Person be eligible to that Office who shall not have attained to the Age of thirty five Years, and been fourteen Years a Resident within the United States.

In Case of the Removal of the President from Office, or of his Death, Resignation, or Inability to discharge the Powers and Duties of the said Office, the Same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may by Law provide for the Case of Removal, Death, Resignation or Inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what Officer shall then act as President, and such Officer shall act accordingly, until the Disability be removed, or a President shall be elected. [2.8.181; 3.13.3]

The President shall, at stated Times, receive for his Services, a Compensation, which shall neither be encreased nor diminished during the Period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that Period any other Emolument from the United States, or any of them. [4.10.12; 4.12.5; 5.9.9]

Before he enter on the Execution of his Office, he shall take the following Oath or Affirmation:—"I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my Ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States."

Section. 2. The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual Service of the United States; [2.4.85; 2.6.31; 3.3.31] he may require the Opinion, in writing, of the principal Officer in each of the executive Departments, upon any Subject relating to the Duties of their respective Offices, and he shall have Power to grant Reprieves and Pardons for Offences against the United States, except in Cases of Impeachment. [2.2.9; 2.4.85; 2.5.41; 2.7.23; 2.7.51; 3.11.45]

He shall have Power, by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two thirds of the Senators present concur; [2.9.33; 3.3.14] and he shall nominate, and by and with the Advice and Consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the supreme Court, and all other Officers of the United States, whose Appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by Law; [2.4.86; 4.23.3(6)] but the Congress may by Law vest the Appointment of such inferior Officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the Courts of Law, or in the Heads of Departments. [2.8.45]

The President shall have Power to fill up all Vacancies that may happen during the Recess of the Senate, by granting Commissions which shall expire at the End of their next Session. [2.5.41; 2.6.37]

Section. 3. He shall from time to time give to the Congress Information of the State of the Union, and recommend to their Consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient; he may, on extraordinary Occasions, convene both Houses, or either of them, and in Case of Disagreement between them, with Respect to the Time of Adjournment, he may adjourn them to such Time as he shall think proper; [2.6.45; 5.10.2; 5.12.4] he shall receive Ambassadors and other public Ministers; [2.6.31] he shall take Care that the Laws be faithfully executed, and shall Commission all the Officers of the United States.

Section. 4. The President, Vice President and all civil Officers of the United States, shall be removed from Office on Impeachment for, and Conviction of, Treason, Bribery, or other high Crimes and Misdemeanors. [2.4.87–88; 5.21.34]

Article. III.

Section. 1. The judicial Power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme Court, and in such inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. The Judges, both of the supreme and inferior

Courts, shall hold their Offices during good Behaviour, and shall, at stated Times, receive for their Services, a Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office. [2.8.147; 2.8.186; 2.8.188; 2.9.191–92]

Section. 2. The judicial Power shall extend to all Cases, in Law and Equity, arising under this Constitution, the Laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their Authority; [2.8.195; 2.9.134–40; 2.9.160; 3.4.4–5; 5.3.13]—to all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls; [2.9.168; 4.6.42; 4.9.22]—to all Cases of admiralty and maritime Jurisdiction;—to Controversies to which the United States shall be a Party;—to Controversies between two or more States; [2.8.43; 2.9.160–61; 4.6.52]—between a State and Citizens of another State;—between Citizens of different States,—between Citizens of the same State claiming Lands under Grants of different States, and between a State, or the Citizens thereof, and foreign States, Citizens or Subjects.

In all Cases affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be Party, the supreme Court shall have original Jurisdiction. [2.7.25; 2.8.186; 2.9.168–77; 3.3.51; 4.8.4; 5.7.7] In all the other Cases before mentioned, the supreme Court shall have appellate Jurisdiction, both as to Law and Fact, with such Exceptions, and under such Regulations as the Congress shall make. [2.8.189; 6.1.7]

The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury; and such Trial shall be held in the State where the said Crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the Trial shall be at such Place or Places as the Congress may by Law have directed. [2.4.92–93; 2.7.43–44; 2.8.186–93; 2.9.173; 2.9.179; 3.3.16; 3.5.5–9; 3.11.41; 4.6.21; 6.1.7; 6.1.13–15]

Section. 3. Treason against the United States, shall consist only in levying War against them, or in adhering to their Enemies, giving them Aid and Comfort. No Person shall be convicted of Treason unless on the Testimony of two Witnesses to the same overt Act, or on Confession in open Court.

The Congress shall have Power to declare the Punishment of Treason, but no Attainder of Treason shall work Corruption of Blood, or Forfeiture except during the Life of the Person attainted.

Article. IV.

Section. I. Full Faith and Credit shall be given in each State to the public Acts, Records, and judical Proceedings of every other State. And the Congress may by general Laws prescribe the Manner in which such Acts, Records and Proceedings shall be proved, and the Effect thereof.

Section. 2. The Citizens of each State shall be entitled to all Privileges and Immunities of Citizens in the several States. [6.9.30]

A Person charged in any State with Treason, Felony, or other Crime, who shall flee from Justice, and be found in another State, shall on Demand of the executive Authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having Jurisdiction of the Crime.

No Person held to Service or Labour in one State, under the Laws thereof, escaping into another, shall, in Consequence of any Law or Regulation therein, be discharged from such Service or Labour, but shall be delivered up on Claim of the Party to whom such Service or Labour may be due.

Section. 3. New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union; but no new State shall be formed or erected within the Jurisdiction of any other State; nor any State be formed by the Junction of two or more States, or Parts of States, without the Consent of the Legislatures of the States concerned as well as of the Congress. [2.4.16(14); 2.4.34; 2.4.99–107; 4.23.3(8); 5.20.6]

The Congress, shall have Power to dispose of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory or other Property belonging to the United States; and nothing in this Constitution shall be so construed as to Prejudice any Claims of the United States, or of any particular State.

Section. 4. The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government, and shall protect each of them against Invasion; and on Application of the Legislature, or of the Executive (when the Legislature cannot be convened) against domestic Violence. [3.6.25; 4.5.2; 6.7.10; 6.9.14–15; 6.9.23; 6.10.10; 6.13.26]

Article. V.

The Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as Part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; [2.5.37; 2.7.56; 2.8.58; 3.3.50; 3.3.55] Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year One thousand eight hundred and eight shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; [4.26.14–15] and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of it's equal Suffrage in the Senate. [2.8.143; 5.13.12]

Article. VI.

All Debts contracted and Engagements entered into, before the Adoption of this Constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this Constitution, as under the Confederation.

This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; [2.7.97; 2.8.46; 2.9.5; 2.9.31; 3.3.13; 3.11.22; 6.6.25–29; 6.9.12–13; 6.9.21] and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding. [3.11.13; 5.4.7]

The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the Members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial Officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States. [4.14.3; 6.1.19]

Article. VII.

The Ratification of the Conventions of nine States, shall be sufficient for the Establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the Same. [4.2.11; 4.4.14; 4.4.20]

Done in Convention by the Unanimous Consent of the States present the Seventeenth Day of September in the Year of our Lord one thousand seven hundred and Eighty seven and of the Independance of the United States of America the Twelfth. In witness whereof We have hereunto subscribed our Names, Go. Washington—Presidt. and deputy from Virginia

New Hampshire	John Langdon Nicholas Gilman
Massachusetts	Nathaniel Gorham Rufus King
Connecticut	Wm. Saml. Johnson Roger Sherman
New York	Alexander Hamilton
New Jersey	Wil: Livingston David Brearley. Wm. Paterson. Jona: Dayton
Pennsylvania	B Franklin Thomas Mifflin Robt. Morris Geo. Clymer

Pennsylvania	Thos. FitzSimons Jared Ingersoll James Wilson Gouv Morris
Delaware	Geo: Read Gunning Bedford jun John Dickinson Richard Bassett Jaco: Broom
Maryland	James McHenry Dan of St. Thos. Jenifer Danl. Carroll
Virginia	John Blair— James Madison Jr.
North Carolina	Wm. Blount Richd. Dobbs Spaight. Hu Williamson
South Carolina	J. Rutledge Charles Cotesworth Pinckney Charles Pinckney Pierce Butler.
Georgia	William Few Abr Baldwin

The First Ten Amendments to the Constitution

Article I

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. [2.7.55; 2.8.53; 2.8.86; 3.11.13; 4.17.3; 5.4.6; 5.6.5; 6.1.5–12]

Article II

A well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed. [3.11.13]

Article III

No Soldier shall, in time of peace be quartered in any house, without the consent of the Owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law. [2.8.86; 2.8.202; 5.4.6]

Article IV

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized. [2.7.55; 5.2.2; 6.2.2]

Article V

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger; [2.8.200; 4.15.2; 4.15.4] nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; [2.9.27] nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Article VI

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence. [2.8.43; 2.9.27; 3.5.6; 3.13.5; 4.6.21; 4.15.4; 5.6.5; 5.14.10; 6.1.19; 6.6.31]

Article VII

In Suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, [2.8.51; 3.5.5–9; 3.8.3; 4.8.2] and no fact tried by a jury, shall be otherwise re-examined in any Court of the United States, than according to the rules of the common law. [2.9.175–76; 3.11.38–39]

Article VIII

Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted. [2.7.55; 2.9.28; 5.16.36–37]

Article IX

The enumeration in the Constitution, of certain rights, shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people. [2.8.198; 4.6.69–70]

Article X

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people. [2.8.198; 5.5.8]

The Complete Anti-Federalist

The Complete Anti-Federalist

Edited, with Commentary and Notes, by

Herbert J. Storing

With the Assistance of Murray Dry

VOLUME 2

Objections of Non-Signers of the Constitution and Major Series of Essays at the Outset

The University of Chicago Press
Chicago and London

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637
The University of Chicago Press, Ltd., London

© 1981 by The University of Chicago
All rights reserved. Published 1981
Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Main entry under title:

The Complete Anti-Federalist

Includes bibliographical references.
Contents: v. 1. What the Anti-Federalists were for—v. 2. Objections of non-signers of the Constitution and Major series of essays at the outset—v. 3. Pennsylvania—[etc.]
1. United States—Constitutional law—Collected works.
I. Storing, Herbert J., 1928–77. II. Dry, Murray.
KF4515.C65 342.73'029 81-10287
ISBN 0-226-77573-9 (set) 347.30229 AACR2

Contents

VOLUME TWO

Contents of Other Volumes vi
A Note on Cross References x
Works Frequently Cited xi

PART I

Objections of Non-Signers of the Constitution

Introduction 3
2.1 Elbridge Gerry's Objections to Signing the National Constitution (Massachusetts Centinel 3 November 1787) 4
2.2 George Mason's Objections to the Constitution of Government Formed by the Convention (1787) 9
2.3 Robert Yates and John Lansing, Reasons of Dissent (New York Journal 14 January 1788) 15
2.4 Luther Martin, The Genuine Information Delivered to the Legislature of the State of Maryland (1788) 19
2.5 Letter from Edmund Randolph Giving His Reasons for Refusing His Signature to the Proposed Federal Constitution (10 October 1787) 83

PART 2

Major Series of Essays at the Outset

2.6 Letters of Cato (New York Journal September 1787–January 1788) 101
2.7 Letters of Centinel (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer and Philadelphia Freeman's Journal October 1787–April 1788) 130
2.8 Observations Leading to a Fair Examination of the System of Government Proposed by the Late Convention, Letters from The Federal Farmer (1787 and 1788) 214
2.9 Essays of Brutus (New York Journal October 1787–April 1788) 358

Contents of Other Volumes

VOLUME ONE

Foreword by Joseph Cropsey
Preface by Murray Dry
Prefatory Notes by Herbert J. Storing

What the Anti-Federalists Were For

1 Introduction
2 Conservatives
3 The Small Republic
4 Union
5 The Federalist Reply
6 The Aristocratic Tendency of the Constitution
7 Complex Government
8 Bill of Rights
9 Conclusion

The Articles of Confederation, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions
The Constitution of the United States, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions

VOLUME THREE
Pennsylvania

3.1 William Findley (28 September 1787)
3.2 Minority of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives (4 October 1787)
3.3 An Old Whig (October 1787–February 1788)
3.4 Montezuma (17 October 1787)
3.5 A Democratic Federalist (17 October 1787)
3.6 A Federal Republican (1787)
3.7 John Humble (29 October 1787)
3.8 An Officer of the Late Continental Army (6 November 1787)
3.9 Philadelphiensis (November 1787–April 1788)

3.10 Alfred (13 December 1787)
3.11 Minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania (18 December 1787)
3.12 William Penn (January 1788)
3.13 Deliberator (20 February 1788)
3.14 A Farmer (April 1788)
3.15 None of the Well-Born Conspirators (23 April 1788)
3.16 Aristocrotis (1788)

Volume Four
Massachusetts and New England

4.1 Anon., "A confederation" (9 October 1787)
4.2 A Gentleman in a Neighbouring State (October 1787)
4.3 John DeWitt (October–December 1787)
4.4 Vox Populi (October–November 1787)
4.5 William Symmes (15 November 1787)
4.6 Agrippa (November 1787–February 1788)
4.7 A Federalist (26 November 1787)
4.8 One of the Common People (3 December 1787)
4.9 Candidus (December 1787–January 1788)
4.10 Cornelius (December 1787)
4.11 Poplicola (24 December 1787)
4.12 Helvidius Priscus (December 1787–February 1788)
4.13 A Republican Federalist (December 1787–February 1788)
4.14 Samuel (10 January 1788)
4.15 Hampden (January–February 1788)
4.16 A Customer (March 1788)
4.17 A Farmer (January–June 1788)
4.18 Charles Turner (17 January and 6 February 1788)
4.19 The Yeomanry of Massachusetts (25 January 1788)
4.20 An American (28 January 1788)
4.21 A Bostonian (4 February 1788)
4.22 A Watchman (February 1788)
4.23 A Friend to the Rights of the People, A Friend to the Republic (February 1788)
4.24 David (7 March 1788)
4.25 A Newport Man (March 1788)
4.26 Consider Arms, Malichi Maynard, and Samuel Field (April 1788)
4.27 Phileleutheros (May 1788)
4.28 A Columbian Patriot (1788)

Volume Five

PART 1
Maryland

5.1 A Farmer (February–April 1788)
5.2 A Farmer and Planter (April 1788)
5.3 Samuel Chase (April 1788)
5.4 Minority of the Maryland Ratifying Convention (May 1788)
5.5 John Francis Mercer (April or May 1788)

PART 2
Virginia and the South

5.6 Richard Henry Lee (16 October 1787)
5.7 Cato Uticensis (17 October 1787)
5.8 A Proposal for Reviving Christian Conviction (October 1787)
5.9 A Georgian (15 November 1787)
5.10 Cato (November–December 1787)
5.11 Tamony (9 January 1788)
5.12 Rawlins Lowndes (January 1788)
5.13 Republicus (February and March 1788)
5.14 The Impartial Examiner (February–June 1788)
5.15 Brutus (14 May 1788)
5.16 Patrick Henry (June 1788)
5.17 George Mason (4 June 1788)
5.18 Denatus (11 June 1788)
5.19 A Delegate Who Has Catched Cold (June 1788)
5.20 Sentiments of Many (18 June 1788)
5.21 James Monroe (1788)

Volume Six

PART 1
New York

6.1 Cincinnatus (November–December 1787)
6.2 A Son of Liberty (8 November 1787)
6.3 Brutus, Jr. (8 November 1787)
6.4 An Observor (19 November 1787)
6.5 A Citizen (24 November 1787)
6.6 A Countryman from Dutchess County (November 1787–February 1788)

6.7 A Countryman (December 1787–January 1788)
6.8 Sidney (February–March 1788)
6.9 Sydney (June 1788)
6.10 Albany Antifederal Committee (26 April 1788)
6.11 A Plebeian (1788)
6.12 Melancton Smith (June 1788)
6.13 George Clinton (June–July 1788)

PART 2

Conclusion

6.14 Mercy Warren (1805)

VOLUME SEVEN

Index

A Note on Cross References

For convenient cross reference, and without any other editorial purpose, a three-part number has been assigned to each paragraph (or group of paragraphs where they are brief) of the writings assembled in The Complete Anti-Federalist. The first number denotes the volume, the second the position of the essay or series within that volume, and the third the paragraph. A reference to, for example, Federal Republican 3.16.13 locates a passage in the Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican, which can be found in volume 3 of this edition. These numbers are distinct from any numbering by the authors themselves or any of their publishers; Centinel III, 2.7.73 refers to the third letter of Centinel, in volume 2 below. The abbreviation "intro." is used for Storing's introductions to volumes or parts of volumes as well as the introductions to individual texts. A reference to, say, 2.8.intro. denotes the introductory sketch and outline of the Federal Farmer, located in volume 2. Cross references to volume 1 are by page number. A cross reference from one note to another uses a three-part number plus a note number, so that the reader may refer to the text as well as the note if necessary.

Murray Dry

Works Frequently Cited

John Adams, Works	The Works of John Adams, ed. Charles Francis Adams (Boston 1851)
Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution	William W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (Chicago 1953)
Curtis, Constitutional History	George Ticknor Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States: From Their Declaration of Independence to the Close of the Civil War (New York 1889)
Dall.	Dallas' Pennsylvania and United States Reports, 1790–1800
Documentary History of the Constitution	A Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States of America, 1786–1870; Derived from the Records, Manuscripts, and Rolls Deposited in the Bureau of Rolls and Library of the Department of State (Washington, D.C., 1894–1905)
Elliot	The Debates of the State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, as Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787, 2d ed., ed. Jonathan Elliot (Philadelphia 1866)
Evans, Early American Imprints	Charles Evans, Early American Imprints, 1639–1800 (Worcester, Mass., 1955–)
Farrand	The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, ed. Max Farrand (New Haven 1911–37)
The Federalist	The Federalist, ed. Jacob E. Cooke (Middletown, Conn., 1961)
Ford, Essays	Essays on the Constitution of the United States, Published during Its Discussion by the People, 1787–1788, ed. Paul Leicester Ford (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1892)

Ford, Pamphlets	Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States, Published during Its Discussion by the People, 1787–1788, ed. Paul Leicester Ford (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1888)
Jensen, New Nation	Merrill Jensen, The New Nation (New York 1950)
Lee, Letters	The Letters of Richard Henry Lee, ed. James Curtis Ballagh (New York 1911–14)
Lincoln, Collected Works	Abraham Lincoln, Collected Works, ed. Roy P. Basler (New Brunswick, N.J., 1953)
Lincoln, Speeches and Writings	Abraham Lincoln: His Speeches and Writings, ed. Roy P. Basler (Cleveland and New York 1946)
Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt)	The Writings of James Madison, ed. Gaillard Hunt (New York 1900–1910)
Main, Antifederalists	Jackson Turner Main, The Antifederalists: Critics of the Constitution (Chapel Hill, N.C., 1960)
McMaster and Stone	Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution, 1787–1788, ed. John Bach McMaster and Frederick D. Stone (Published for the Subscribers by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, 1888)
Thorpe, Federal and State Constitutions	The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the States, Territories, and Colonies Now or Heretofore Forming the United States of America, comp. Francis Newton Thorpe (Washington, D.C., 1931–44)
Washington, Writings	The Writings of George Washington from the Original Manuscript Sources, 1745–1799, ed. John C. Fitzpatrick (Washington, D.C., 1931–44)
Wheat.	Wheaton's United States Supreme Court Reports, 1816–27

PART 1

Objections of Non-Signers of the Constitution

Introduction

The Anti-Federalist argument opens with the statements of those members of the Constitutional Convention who refused to sign the document. Abraham Yates and Robert Lansing left the Convention on 10 July; Luther Martin left on 10 September; Edmund Randolph, Elbridge Gerry, and George Mason remained to the end, and their explanations of their refusal to sign occupied a major part of the last two days of the Convention. In the view of these men, the public good was to be served, not by following Franklin and silently sacrificing their doubts, but by going to the country with public declarations of the reasons for their opposition. Not surprisingly, their statements, made as they were by distinguished figures who had participated in the secret business at Philadelphia, played a prominent part in the debate over the Constitution.

Elbridge Gerry's Objections to Signing the National Constitution

MASSACHUSETTS CENTINEL
3 November 1787

An active revolutionary and faithful member of the Continental Congress, Elbridge Gerry was a signer of the Declaration of Independence and the Articles of Confederation. He was a member of the Philadelphia Convention, taking an active part in its deliberation but refusing to sign the Constitution. His fundamental concerns were in many ways similar to those of Edmund Randolph, another non-signer, although Randolph finally joined the Federalist ranks and gave the Constitution powerful support in the Virginia convention.[1] One of the old Republicans, described by Samuel Eliot Morison as ever faithful to the Spartan ideals of 1776,[2] Gerry, like Randolph, thought that "the evils we experience flow from the excess of democracy." "He had," he confessed at the Constitutional Convention, "been too republican heretofore: he was still however republican, but had been taught by experience the danger of the levilling spirit."[3] Gerry was the chairman of the committee that worked out the basis for the compromise on the representation in the two branches of the legislature. "We were neither the same Nation nor different Nations. We ought not therefore to pursue the one or the other of these ideas too closely."[4] He thought that the plan finally adopted was almost entirely a national government, but it is not clear how far this was an important objection to him.[5]

There are two lists of Gerry's objections to the Constitution, one given near the conclusion of the Philadelphia Convention,[6] the other in Gerry's Letter to the Massachusetts Legislature, which he is said to have written with the assistance of Richard Henry Lee[7] and which is printed below. The letter is brief and contains little argument to support the objections; but attention should be called to its manifest and deliberate moderation, quite properly emphasized by Gerry's biographer.[8] On the last day of the Convention, Gerry said that he feared that the proposed Constitution might trigger a civil war, particularly in Massachusetts. "In that State there are two parties, one devoted to Democracy, the worst he thought of all political evils, the other as violent in the opposite extreme. From the collision of these in opposing and resisting the Constitution, confusion was greatly to be feared. He had thought it necessary for this and other reasons that the plan should have been proposed in a more mediating shape, in order to abate the heat and opposition of parties—As it had been passed by the Convention he was persuaded it would have a contrary effect."[9] Gerry's public objections were written with a view to these circumstances.

Gerry's Letter was first published in the Massachusetts Centinel, 3 November 1787, from which it is taken here. It seems to have had considerable effect[10] and was widely reprinted throughout the country. The chief reply was made by Oliver Ellsworth in the fourth and fifth numbers of his letters of The Landholder. In later letters Ellsworth accused Gerry of opposing the Constitution only because the Convention rejected a selfishly motivated proposal by Gerry regarding the redemption of the old Continental money, of which he was a large holder. A series of warm exchanges ensued between Ellsworth, on the one side, and Luther Martin and Gerry on the other, which reveals the dubious character of the charges.[11] Rufus King gave a point-by-point refutation of Gerry's objections in a speech in the Massachusetts convention.[12]

1. See below, Randolph 2.5.

2. Dictionary of American Biography VII, 223. Gerry's republicanism is the theme of the thoughtful recent biography by George A. Billias, Elbridge Gerry: Founding Father and Republican Statesman (New York 1976); see xvi, 30, 36, 68, 70, 72, 144, 153–56, 331–36. It may be questioned whether a man for whom the signing of the radically individualistic and libertarian Declaration of Independence was "the most important single act of his entire life" (p. 70) can consistently have viewed political society, as Billias says Gerry did, as an organic entity that ought to be guided by those entitled by nature to rule and devoted to the pursuit of virtue. While Billias reasonably warns against making excessive theoretical demands of secondary, mainly practical men like Gerry, my own reading of Billias' evidence suggests that the bedrock of Gerry's republicanism was after all the equality and individual rights of the Declaration of Independence. Doubtless a rather vague residual classical republicanism played, for Gerry as well as many of the other Anti-Federalists, a significant psychological as well as rhetorical role.

3. Farrand I, 48 (31 May).

4. Farrand I, 532 (5 July); see 467 (29 June), 522 (3 July).

5. See Farrand I, 80 (2 June).

6. Farrand II, 632–33 (15 September): "Mr. Gerry, stated the objections which determined him to withhold his name from the Constitution. 1. the duration and re-eligibility of the Senate. 2. the power of the House of Representatives to conceal their journals. 3—the power of Congress over the places of election. 4 the unlimited power of Congress over their own compensations. 5 Massachusetts has not a due share of Representatives allotted to her. 6. 3/5 of the Blacks are to be represented as if they were freemen. 7. Under the power over commerce, monopolies may be established. 8. The vice president being made head of the Senate. He could however he said get over all these, if the rights of the Citizens were not rendered insecure 1. by the general power of the Legislature to make what laws they may please to call necessary and proper. 2. raise armies and money without limit. 3. to establish a tribunal without juries, which will be a Star-chamber as to Civil cases. Under such a view of the Constitution, the best that could be done he conceived was to provide for a second general Convention."

On the different lists of Gerry's objections, see Billias, Elbridge Gerry 199–208.

7. The letter was written in New York on 18 October. George Bancroft says the letter was written with the assistance of Richard Henry Lee, apparently relying on a somewhat ambiguous remark by the unfriendly Oliver Ellsworth. See Bancroft, History of the Formation of the Constitution of the United States of America II, 230; The Landholder VI, Ford, Essays 161.

8. James T. Austin, The Life of Elbridge Gerry (Boston 1829) 45–46.

9. Farrand II, 646–47 (17 September).

10. See Main, Antifederalists 201; Rutland, The Ordeal of the Constitution 24, 74–75; Billias, Elbridge Gerry 209.

11. See Farrand II, 326, 356, 377, 412ff. See Ford, Essays 125–33, 150–60, 172–77, 182–88, 337–83; Gerry's second letter in this series, taken by Ford from a reprint in the New York Journal, was first published in the Boston American Herald 18 April 1788. See also McDonald, We the People 105–6; Beard, An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution of the United States 98, n. 1; Billias, Elbridge Gerry 189–90.

12. The Life and Correspondence of Rufus King, ed. Charles R. King (New York 1894) I, 303–8. Other replies to Gerry include those by A Federalist, Boston Gazette 5 November 1787; One of the People, Massachusetts Centinel 17 November 1787; and Atticus, Boston Independent Chronicle 22 November 1787.

Hon. Mr. Gerry's objections to signing the National Constitution.

(The following Letter, on the subject of the American Constitution, from the Hon ELBRIDGE GERRY, Esq. one of the Delegates representing this Commonwealth in the late Federal Convention, to the Legislature, was on Wednesday last read in the Senate and sent down to the House of Representatives, where it was yesterday read and sent up. As it contains opinions on a subject of the first importance to our country at this day, we have obtained a copy of it for insertion—and are happy to have it in our power thus early to communicate it to the publick.)

New-York, 18th October, 1787.

Gentlemen,

2.1.1 I have the honour to inclose, pursuant to my commission, the constitution proposed by the federal Convention.

To this system I gave my dissent, and shall submit my objections to the honourable Legislature.

It was painful for me, on a subject of such national importance, to differ from the respectable members who signed the constitution: But conceiving as I did, that the liberties of America were not secured by the system, it was my duty to oppose it.—

2.1.2 My principal objections to the plan, are, that there is no adequate provision for a representation of the people—that they have no security for the right of election—that some of the powers of the Legislature are ambiguous, and others indefinite and dangerous—that the Executive is blended with and will have an undue influence over the Legislature—that the judicial department will be oppressive—that treaties of the highest importance may be formed by the President with the advice of two thirds of a quorum of the Senate—and that the system is without the security of a bill of rights. These are objections which are not local, but apply equally to all the States.

2.1.3 As the Convention was called for "the sole and express purpose of revising the Articles of Confederation, and reporting to Congress and the several Legislatures such alterations and provisions as shall render the Federal Constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the union," I did not conceive that these powers extended to the formation of the plan proposed, but the Convention being of a different opinion, I acquiesced in it, being fully convinced that to preserve the union, an efficient government was indispensibly necessary; and that it would be difficult to make proper amendments to the articles of Confederation.

2.1.4 The Constitution proposed has few, if any federal features, but is rather a system of national government: Nevertheless, in many respects I think it has great merit, and by proper amendments, may be adapted to the "exigencies of government," and preservation of liberty.

2.1.5 The question on this plan involves others of the highest importance—1st. Whether there shall be a dissolution of the federal government? 2dly. Whether the several State Governments shall be so altered, as in effect to be dissolved? and 3dly, Whether in lieu of the federal and State Governments, the national Constitution now proposed shall be substituted without amendment? Never perhaps were a people called on to decide a question of greater magnitude—Should the citizens of America adopt the plan as it now stands, their liberties may be lost: Or should they reject it altogether Anarchy may ensue. It is evident therefore, that they should not be precipitate in their decisions; that the subject should be well understood, lest they should refuse to support the government, after having hastily accepted it.

2.1.6 If those who are in favour of the Constitution, as well as those who are against it, should preserve moderation, their discussions may afford much information and finally direct to an happy issue.

2.1.7 It may be urged by some, that an implicit confidence should be placed in the Convention: But, however respectable the members may be who signed the Constitution, it must be admitted, that a free people are the proper guardians of their rights and liberties—that the greatest men may err—and that their errours are sometimes, of the greatest magnitude.

Others may suppose, that the Constitution may be safely adopted, because therein provision is made to amend it: But cannot this object be better attained before a ratification, than after it? And should a free people adopt a form of Government, under conviction that it wants amendment?

And some may conceive, that if the plan is not accepted by the people, they will not unite in another: But surely whilst they have the power to amend, they are not under the necessity of rejecting it.

2.1.8 I have been detained here longer than I expected, but shall leave this place in a day or two for Massachusetts, and on my arrival shall submit the reasons (if required by the Legislature) on which my objections are grounded.[1]

I shall only add, that as the welfare of the union requires a better Constitution than the Confederation, I shall think it my duty as a citizen of Massachusetts, to support that which shall be finally adopted, sincerely hoping it will secure the liberty and happiness of America.

I have the honour to be, Gentlemen, with the highest respect for the honourable Legislature and yourselves, your most obedient, and very humble servant,

E. Gerry.

The Hon. Samuel Adams, Esq.
President of the Senate; and
The Hon. James Warren, Esq.
Speaker of the House of Representatives, of Massachusetts.

1. While Gerry played no major role in the ratification debates and was not a member of the ratifying convention, he was invited to sit with the convention to answer questions of fact that might be put to him. Gerry accepted but caused a flurry of controversy when he attempted to correct what he thought were misstatements of fact regarding his part in the compromise resulting in an equal representation of the states in the Senate. Gerry wrote a letter to the vice-president of the Convention explaining his view of the altercation, enclosing a "State of Facts" regarding the pertinent deliberations. These, together with the exchanges with A Landholder (Ford, Essays 161), are of value to the historian of the formation of the Constitution but contribute little or nothing to the Anti-Federalist argument. The letter to the convention and "State of Facts" are printed in Debates and Proceedings in the Convention of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts Held in the Year 1788 and Which Finally Ratified the Constitution of the United States (Boston 1856) 65–71. See Billias, Elbridge Gerry 211–13.

George Mason's Objections to the Constitution of Government Formed by the Convention

1787

George Mason was described by George Ticknor Curtis as "one of the most profound and able of all the American statesmen opposed to the Constitution, while . . . inferior in general powers and resources to not more than two or three of those who framed or advocated it,"[1] a judgment shared by his contemporaries. He was distinguished by the genuineness of his preference for private life and for the significance of his contributions when called to public duty. Active in the revolutionary agitation in Virginia, Mason participated in the framing of the Virginia constitution and wrote the widely copied Virginia Declaration of Rights. Although fearful of augmentation of power in the general government, Mason accepted an appointment to the Philadelphia Convention, where he took an active part. Toward the end of the Philadelphia deliberations, however, he became increasingly critical, objecting especially to the compromise dealing with navigation acts and the slave trade, and finally refused to sign the Constitution. Mason framed his objections during the last few days of the Philadelphia Convention.[2] They were circulated in manuscript among Mason's friends before being published in newspapers and as a broadside in November 1787. They were supposed by Washington to have provided a guide for the Sixteen Seceding Members of the Pennsylvania Assembly; but the similarities are not very great, and it is scarcely accurate to say, as Washington does, that Mason's objections were "detailed" in the Pennsylvanians' address.[3]

The publication history of the Objections is complex and somewhat obscure. Robert Rutland, the editor of Mason's papers, speculates that they were printed in the Philadelphia press about 4 October. No such printing has been found, but Rutland thinks that it must have existed, since James Wilson's "Statehouse speech" of 6 October was a "frank refutation" of Mason's remarks.[4] It is true that George Washington praised the Wilson speech as placing "the most of Col. Mason's objections in their true point of light . . . ,"[5] but again Washington's reading seems to have been rather casual. Although Mason and Wilson both begin with the question of a bill of rights, they follow quite different lines and treat different issues. The evidence for an early October publication does not seem to be very persuasive.

The Objections were accurately printed by a Federalist writer, Brutus, who followed with a detailed reply, in the Alexandria Virginia Journal of 22 November and 6 December 1787. Brutus objected to what he called the clandestine circulation of the objections of so influential a man, and he defended his unauthorized publication as necessary to permit a general examination and as the foundation for his own reply. The day before, on 21 November, the Objections were printed in the Massachusetts Centinel, which appears to have been the first publication. They were subsequently printed in other New England papers. Thus, manuscript copies of the Objections made their way north and south from Philadelphia at about the same time. The New England versions, however, omitted the paragraph in which Mason complained of the power of Congress to pass commercial regulations by a simple majority,[6] and it was presumably to this that Mason referred when he told Jefferson that his objections "were first printed very incorrectly, without my Approbation or Privity; which laid me under some kind of Necessity of publishing them afterwards, myself."[7] Unfortunately, the printing that Mason had done has now been lost. It was presumably the basis for Paul Leicester Ford's reprint, which was taken from a broadside said to be printed by Thomas Nicholas (probably Thomas Nicholson, a Richmond printer).[8] Nothing of substance hinges on the question since all versions of the Objections (save the New England ones, with their omitted paragraph) are substantially the same. Printed here is the manuscript version sent by Mason to George Washington and dated 7 October 1787.[9]

Mason's Objections are sufficiently brief as to require no summary. Partly for that reason, together with their early appearance and the fame and position of their author, the Objections gave rise to a number of thoughtful replies. Madison wrote a reply to the manuscript version in a letter to Washington, 18 October 1787.[10] James Iredell presented a learned refutation in detail in his Marcus letters.[11] Other replies include a sharp and often personal criticism in the letters of A Landholder, by Oliver Ellsworth,[12] and sober point-by-point refutations by two unknown Virginians, Brutus, mentioned above, and Civis Rusticus.[13] The Objections were widely republished in various parts of the country, with the omission in the Middle and Eastern states of the paragraph regarding the damage to the South from commercial regulations.

Another contribution by George Mason, his speech to the Virginia ratifying convention, appears in volume 5 (5.17).

1. Curtis, Constitutional History I, 633. See generally Rowland, The Life of George Mason, and Helen Hill Miller, George Mason, Constitutionalist (Cambridge, Mass., 1938).

2. Rowland, The Life of George Mason II, 182–83, 387–90.

3. See Letter to Madison, 10 October 1787, quoted by Rowland, George Mason II, 187. See Pennsylvania House Minority 3.2, intro.

4. The Papers of George Mason, 1725–1792, ed. Robert Rutland (Chapel Hill 1970) III, 993 n; the Wilson speech is printed in McMaster and Stone 142–49.

5. Letter to David Stuart, 17 October 1787, Washington, Writings XXIX, 290.
6. See A Landholder, Ford, Essays 162, 172–73. See, e.g., the Massachusetts Centinel 21 November 1787; the Boston Independent Chronicle 22 November 1787; the Connecticut Courant 26 November 1787; the Pennsylvania Freeman's Journal 5 December 1787. At least one Southern paper reprinted the Objections from the Boston Independent Chronicle, thus omitting this paragraph directed specifically to the interests of the Southern states. See State Gazette of South Carolina 7 January 1788.
7. Papers of George Mason (ed. Rutland) III, 1045.
8. Ford, Pamphlets, 327.
9. This copy is among the Washington Papers in the Library of Congress.
10. Farrand III, 129–31; Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 334–36.
11. Ford, Pamphlets 333–70.
12. Connecticut Courant 10 December 1787; Ford, Essays 161–66.
13. Virginia Journal and Alexandria Advertiser 22 November, 6 December 1787 (see also Philanthropos' defense of Mason in the latter number); Virginia Independent Chronicle 30 January 1788.

Objections to the Constitution of Government formed by the Convention.—(1787)

There is no Declaration of Rights; and the Laws of the general Government being paramount to the Laws and Constitutions of the several States, the Declaration of Rights in the separate States are no Security.[1] Nor are the people secured even in the Enjoyment of the Benefits of the common-Law: which stands here upon no other Foundation than it's having been adopted by the respective Acts forming the Constitutions of the several States. 2.2.1

In the House of Representatives there is not the Substance, but the Shadow only of Representation; which can never produce proper Information in the Legislature, or inspire Confidence in the People: the Laws will therefore be generally made by Men little concern'd in, and unacquainted with their Effects and Consequences.* 2.2.2

The Senate have the Power of altering all Money-Bills, and of originating Appropriations of Money and the Sallerys of the Officers of their own Appointment in Conjunction with the President of the United States; altho' they are not the Representatives of the People, or amenable to them. 2.2.3

These with their other great Powers (vizt. their Power in the Appointment of Ambassadors and all public Officers, in making Treaties, and in trying all Impeachments) their Influence upon and Connection with the supreme Executive from these Causes, their Duration of Office, and their being a constant existing Body almost continually sitting, joined with their being one compleat Branch of the Legislature, will destroy any Balance in the Government, and enable them to accomplish what Usurpations they please upon the Rights and Libertys of the People. 2.2.4

*This Objection has been in some Degree lessened by an Amendment, often before refused, and at last made by an Erasure, after the Engrossment upon Parchment, of the word forty, and inserting thirty, in the 3d Clause of the 2d Section of the 1st Article.[2]

2.2.5 The Judiciary of the United States is so constructed and extended, as to absorb and destroy the Judiciarys of the several States; thereby rendering Law as tedious[,] intricate and expensive, and Justice as unattainable, by a great part of the Community, as in England, and enabling the Rich to oppress and ruin the Poor.[3]

2.2.6 The President of the United States has no constitutional Council (a thing unknown in any safe and regular Government) he will therefore be unsupported by proper Information and Advice; and will generally be directed by Minions and Favourites—or He will become a Tool to the Senate—or a Council of State will grow out of the principal Officers of the great Departments; the worst and most dangerous of all Ingredients for such a Council, in a free Country; for they may be induced to join in any dangerous or oppressive Measures, to shelter themselves, and prevent an Inquiry into their own Misconduct in Office;[4] whereas had a constitutional Council been formed (as was proposed) of six Members; vizt. two from the Eastern, two from the Middle, and two from the Southern States, to be appointed by Vote of the States in the House of Representatives, with the same Duration and Rotation of Office as the Senate, the Executive wou'd always have had safe and proper Information and Advice, the President of such a Council might have acted as Vice President of the United States, pro tempore, upon any Vacancy or Disability of the chief Magistrate; and long continued Sessions of the Senate wou'd in a great Measure have been prevented.[5]

2.2.7 From this fatal Defect of a constitutional Council has arisen the improper Power of the Senate, in the Appointment of public Officers, and the alarming Dependence and Connection between that Branch of the Legislature, and the supreme Executive.

2.2.8 Hence also sprung that unnecessary and dangerous Officer, the Vice President; who for want of other Employment, is made President of the Senate; thereby dangerously blending the executive and legislative Powers; besides always giving to some one of the States an unnecessary and unjust Pre-eminence over the others.

2.2.9 The President of the United States has the unrestrained Power of granting Pardon for Treason; which may be sometimes exercised to screen from Punishment those whom he had secretly instigated to commit the Crime, and thereby prevent a Discovery of his own Guilt.

2.2.10 By declaring all Treaties supreme Laws of the Land, the Executive and the Senate have in many Cases, an exclusive Power of Legislation; which might have been avoided by proper Distinctions with Respect to Treaties, and requiring the Assent of the House of Representatives, where it cou'd be done with Safety.

2.2.11 By requiring only a Majority to make all commercial and navigation Laws,[6] the five Southern States (whose Produce and Circumstances are totally different from that of the eight Northern and Eastern States) will be ruined; for such rigid and premature Regulations may be made, as will enable the Merchants of the Northern and Eastern States not only to demand an exorbitant Freight, but to monopolize the Purchase of the Commodities at their own Price, for many years: to the great Injury of the landed Interest, and Impoverishment of the People: and the Danger is the greater, as the Gain on one Side will be in Proportion to the Loss on the other. Whereas requiring two thirds of the Members present in both Houses wou'd have produced mutual moderation, promoted the general Interest, and removed an insuperable Objection to the Adoption of the Government.

Under their own Construction of the general Clause at the End of the enumerated powers the Congress may grant Monopolies in Trade and Commerce, constitute new Crimes, inflict unusual and severe Punishments, and extend their Power as far as they shall think proper; so that the State Legislatures have no Security for the Powers now presumed to remain to them; or the People for their Rights. 2.2.12

There is no Declaration of any kind for preserving the Liberty of the Press, the Tryal by Jury in civil Causes; nor against the Danger of standing Armys in time of Peace.[7] 2.2.13

The State Legislatures are restrained from laying Export Duties on their own Produce. 2.2.14

The general Legislature is restrained from prohibiting the further Importation of Slaves for twenty odd Years; tho' such Importations render the United States weaker, more vulnerable, and less capable of Defence.

Both the general Legislature and the State Legislatures are expressly prohibited making ex post facto Laws; tho' there never was, or can be a Legislature but must and will make such Laws, when necessity and the public Safety require them; which will hereafter be a Breach of all the Constitutions in the Union, and afford precedents for other Innovations.

This Government will commence in a moderate Aristocracy; it is at present impossible to foresee whether it will, in it's Operation, produce a Monarchy, or a corrupt oppressive Aristocracy; it will most probably vibrate some Years between the two, and then terminate in the one or the other. 2.2.15

(By George Mason)

1. The Federalist replies generally denied the need of a Bill of Rights: Ellsworth contended that bills of rights were introduced in England as grants by the king to the people and have no place in a government that is considered as originating from the people. Ford, Essays 163. Iredell added that in England there was no constitution granting specific authority to the government. Ford, Pamphlets 335–36. Civis Rusticus argued that "the proposed government is thoroughly popular" and that "a government thus constituted stands in need of no bill or rights; the liberties of the people never can be lost, until they are lost to themselves, in a vicious disregard of their dearest interests, a sottish indolence, a wild licentiousness, a dissoluteness of morals, and a contempt of all virtue." Virginia Independent Chronicle 30 January 1788. For other Federalist claims that a bill of rights is not necessary, see Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.50 and nn. 38–40. The deepest and most comprehensive argument against the need for a bill of rights was presented by James Madison in his post-Convention letters to Jefferson of 24 October 1787, 15 March 1788, and 17 October 1788. Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt) V, 17–41, 269–75. (For Jefferson's response, see his letter to Madison of 15 March 1789, The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, ed. H. A.

Washington [Washington, D.C., 1853] III, 3–5.) Not all the Anti-Federalists thought the absence of a bill of rights was a major defect. Thus Samuel Chase wrote to John Lamb, "A declaration of rights alone will be of no essential service. Some of the powers must be abridged, or public liberty will be endangered, and, in time, destroyed." Samuel Chase to John Lamb, 13 June 1788, Leake, Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb 310. See also Philadelphiensis 3.9.18 and DeWitt 4.3.7.

2. Farrand II, 643–44 (17 September). On the general subject of representation, see Federal Farmer VII–IX, 2.8.97–118; X, 2.8.133–37; Brutus III–IV, 2.9.42–48.

3. Iredell contended that the only alternative to an ineffective coercive authority over States was coercive authority over individuals. Some dependence must be placed on future legislatures. He gave this example of the ridiculous implications of Mason's fears: "Suppose an objection should be made that the future legislature should not ascertain salaries, because they might divide among themselves and their officers all the revenue of the Union. Will not every man see how irrational it is to expect that any government can exist which is to be fettered in its most necessary operations for fear of abuse?" Ford, Pamphlets 343–44. However, Iredell's ironical objection was in fact made by several Anti-Federalists. See DeWitt 4.3.23; [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.6; Albany Antifederal Committee 6.10.6.

4. See Iredell's extended discussion of the councils to the King of England and their implications for the matters at issue here. Ford, Pamphlets 344–50.

5. Mason had made such a proposal in the Philadelphia Convention, 7 September; Farrand II, 537–38, 541–42.

6. This is the paragraph omitted in the Northern newspapers.

7. Iredell: ". . . the Convention surely can be only answerable for the propriety of the powers given, not for the future virtues of all with whom those powers may be intrusted." "Men may be sure to suggest dangers from any thing, but it may truly be said that those who can seriously suggest the danger of a premeditated attack on the liberties of people from such a government as this, could with ease assign reasons equally plausible for mistrusting the integrity of any government formed in any manner whatever; and really it does seem to me, that all their reasons may be fairly carried to this position, that inasmuch as any confidence in any men would be unwise, as we can give no power but what may be grossly abused, we had better give none at all, but continue as we are, or resolve into total anarchy at once, of which indeed our present condition falls very little short." Ford, Pamphlets 357, 364.

Robert Yates and John Lansing
Reasons of Dissent

NEW YORK JOURNAL
14 January 1788

This letter was written by Robert Yates and John Lansing to the Anti-Federalist Governor of New York, George Clinton, explaining their reasons for dissenting from the Constitution and, indeed, leaving the Philadelphia Convention before its work was finished. Yates and Lansing were members of the Clinton party in New York, the former a justice of the New York Supreme Court, the latter a member and (in 1786 and 1788) Speaker of the New York Assembly. The letter is dated 21 December 1787 and was first published in the New York Journal, 14 January 1788, from which it is taken here; it was reprinted in newspapers in various parts of the country during the ratification controversy.

Yates and Lansing object on two grounds: (1) that the Convention exceeded its authority in forming a consolidated government, subversive of the states, and (2) that a general government extending its prohibitions and benefits equally over the extensive territory of the whole United States was impracticable. Both contentions are well, though briefly, argued. It may be noted that there is no objection to the absence of a bill of rights.

Late yesterday evening we were favored, by a correspondent, with the following COPY of a LETTER from the Hon. ROBERT YATES, jun. and JOHN LANSING, Esquires, members of the general convention, lately held in the city of Philadelphia, assigning their reasons for giving their dissent to the constitution, agreed upon by that body, and which was laid before the legislature by his excellency the Governor, at the opening of the session, on Friday last.—From a consideration of the very interesting nature of this LETTER to the public, notwithstanding the late hour of its receipt, the editor thus expeditiously presents it to the public view.

Reasons of Dissent.

Albany, Dec. 21, 1787.

Sir,

2.3.1 We do ourselves the honor to advise your excellency, that in pursuance of concurrent resolutions of the honorable senate and assembly, we have, together with Mr. Hamilton, attended the convention, appointed for revising the articles of confederation, and reporting amendments to the same.

2.3.2 It is with the sincerest concern we observe, that in the prosecution of the important objects of our mission, we have been reduced to the disagreeable alternative, of either exceeding the powers delegated to us, and giving our assent to measures which we conceived distructive of the political happiness of the citizens of the United States, or opposing our opinion to that of a body of respectable men, to whom those citizens had given the most unequivocal proofs of confidence.—Thus circumstanced, under these impressions, to have hesitated, would have been to be culpable: we therefore, gave the principles of the constitution, which has received the sanction of a majority of the convention, our decided and unreserved dissent: but we must candidly confess, that we should have been equally opposed to any system, however modified, which had in object the consolidation of the United States into one government.

2.3.3 We beg leave briefly to state some cogent reasons, which, among others, influenced us to decide against a consolidation of the states. These are reducible into two heads.

1st. The limited and well-defined powers under which we acted, and which could not, on any posible construction, embrace an idea of such magnitude, as to assent to a general constitution, in subversion of that of the state.

2dly. A conviction of the impracticability of establishing a general government, pervading every part of the United States, and extending essential benefits to all.

2.3.4 Our powers were explicit, and confined to the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of confederation, and reporting such alterations and provisions therein, as should render the federal constitution adequate to the exigencies of government, and the preservation of the Union.

2.3.5 From these expressions we were led to believe, that a system of consolidated government could not, in the remotest degree, have been in contemplation of the legislature of this state; for that so important a trust as the adopting measures which tended to deprive the state government of its most essential rights of sovereignty, and to place it in a dependent situation, could not have been confided by implication; and the circumstance, that the acts of the convention were to receive a state approbation in the last resort, forcibly corroborated the opinion, that our powers could not involve the subversion of a constitution, which being immediately derived from the people, could only be abolished by their express consent, and not by a legislature, possessing authority vested in them for its preservation. Nor could we suppose, that if it had been the intention of the legislature, to abrogate the existing confederation, they would, in such pointed terms, have directed the attention of their delegates to the revision and amendment of it, in total exclusion of every other idea.

Reasoning in this manner, we were of opinion, that the leading feature of every amendment, ought to be the preservation of the individual states, in their uncontrouled constitutional rights, and that in reserving these, a mode might have been devised of granting to the confederacy, the monies arising from a general system of revenue; the power of regulating commerce, and enforcing the observance of foreign treaties, and other necessary matters of less moment. 2.3.6

Exclusive of our objections, originating from the want of power, we entertained an opinion, that a general government, however guarded by declarations of rights, or cautionary provisions, must unavoidably, in a short time, be productive of the destruction of the civil liberty of such citizens who could be effectually coerced by it; by reason of the extensive territory of the United States, the dispersed situation of its inhabitants, and the insuperable difficulty of controuling or counteracting the views of a set of men (however unconstitutional and oppressive their acts might be) possessed of all the powers of government; and who, from their remoteness from their constituents, and necessary permanency of office, could not be supposed to be uniformly actuated by an attention to their welfare and happiness; that however wise and energetic, the principles of the general government might be, the extremities of the United States could not be kept in due submission and obedience to its laws, at the distance of many hundred miles from the seat of government; that if the general legislature was composed of so numerous a body of men, as to represent the interests of all the inhabitants of the United States, in the usual and true ideas of representation, the expence of supporting it would become intolerably burthensome; and that, if a few only were vested with a power of legislation, the interests of a great majority of the inhabitants of the United States, must necessarily be unknown; or if known, even in the first stages of the operations of the new government, unattended to. 2.3.7

These reasons were, in our opinion, conclusive against any system of consolidated government: To that recommended by the convention, we suppose most of them very forcibly apply. 2.3.8

It is not our intention to pursue this subject farther than merely to explain our conduct in the discharge of the trust which the honorable the legislature reposed in us—Interested, however, as we are, in common with our fellow citizens, in the result, we cannot forbear to declare, that we have the strongest apprehensions, that a government so organized, as that recommended by the convention, cannot afford that security to equal and permanent liberty which we wished to make an invariable object of our pursuit.

2.3.9 We were not present at the completion of the new constitution; but before we left the convention, its principles were so well established as to convince us, that no alteration was to be expected to conform it to our ideas of expediency and safety. A persuasion, that our further attendance would be fruitless, and unavailing, rendered us less solicitous to return.

We have thus explained our motives for opposing the adoption of the national constitution, which we conceived it our duty to communicate to your Excellency, to be submitted to the consideration of the honorable legislature.

We have the honor to be,
With the greatest respect,
Your Excellency's
Most obedient, and Very humble servant,
Robert Yates,
John Lansing, jun.

His Excellency Governor Clinton.

The Genuine Information Delivered to the Legislature of the State of Maryland Relative to the Proceedings of the General Convention Lately Held at Philadelphia; By Luther Martin, Esquire

Together with a Letter to the Hon. Thomas C. Deye and An Address to the Citizens of the United States

1788

No student of the Anti-Federalists can fail to sympathize with William Pierce's characterization of Luther Martin as possessing "a good deal of information" (and, it may be added, argument), but at the same time "so extremely prolix, that he never speaks without tiring the patience of all who hear him."[1] Slovenly, often drunk and in debt, Martin had neither the personal characteristics nor the background that might seem necessary for success in aristocratic Maryland. Yet he became a lawyer, and long-term attorney general of Maryland, widely respected and feared.[2] Chief Justice Roger Taney regarded him as "a profound lawyer," whose defects "arise in some measure from the fulness of his legal knowledge"; he "never missed the strong points of his case; and although much might generally have been better omitted, everybody who listened to him would agree that nothing could be added. . . ."[3]

In addition to his Genuine Information, reproduced here, Martin wrote a number of letters during the early part of 1788 in reply to Oliver Ellsworth's The Landowner, in defense of his and Elbridge Gerry's activities in the Convention, and in criticism of the Constitution.[4] Although helpful to the student of the Convention, the letters add little or nothing to the argument of the Genuine Information and are not printed here except for two or three points included in the notes. The Genuine Information is an expanded version of remarks made by Martin to the Maryland legislature, to which he reported, by invitation, on 29 November 1787.[5] It was first printed in the Maryland Gazette and Baltimore Advertiser beginning 28 December 1787.[6] It was then published in 1788 as a pamphlet, from which it is reprinted here,[7] and was later included with Robert Yates' Secret Proceedings of the Convention Debates, first published in 1821. Widely read and commented on at the time, the Genuine Information is a major source of Anti-Federalist thought and of information about the Convention.

The first third of the Genuine Information (2.4.5–37) presents a description of the proceedings of the Philadelphia Convention from the introduction of the Virginia Resolutions to the adoption of the "Great Compromise" settling the mode of representation in the legislature. In the course of this description, Martin presents what is perhaps the most comprehensive and persuasive argument that exists in favor of equality of representation of the states (2.4.29–34).[8] In this section Martin presents his well-known analysis of the three major parties in the Convention—those who wished to annihilate all state governments and to establish a national monarchy, those who wished merely to establish a system that would give their own states predominance, and those whose objects were truly federal and republican—and the combination of the first two against the third to defeat the New Jersey resolutions (2.4.23–28).

Following this historical account, Martin turns to a systematic treatment of the Constitution. He is still largely concerned with the question of equal representation and the departure of the Constitution from the true principles of federalism. Indeed, Martin's Information is distinguished by its preoccupation with these themes. Many of the small states' representatives who made the arguments in Philadelphia that Martin emphasizes here became enthusiastic proponents of the Constitution once they had achieved the best representation they could get. The typical opposition to the Constitution was at least as much concerned with the powers and structure of the general government and the absence of a bill of rights as with the failure of the new Constitution to preserve the principles of true federalism.[9] Thus Martin was, in one sense, something of an anachronism among Anti-Federalists; but he was, in another sense, a truer Anti-Federalist, because a truer federalist, than many of his allies.

What follows is an extended table of contents of this part of Martin's argument.

Examination of the System Proposed (2.4.38–118)

I. Article I—Legislature (2.4.38–79)

A. Sec. 1—A Congress to consist of two branches (2.4.38–44).

1. Two branches of the legislature are proper in the case of a single state but unnecessary and improper in a federal government (2.4.38).

2. This system is not a federal but a national government (2.4.39–41).
3. Senate as constituted is no security for the states (2.4.42–43).
4. Republics, which are best calculated to preserve freedom and happiness of citizens, must be confined to a small territory, connected together, where necessary, by a strong federal government (2.4.44).

B. Sec. 2—Apportionment of representation and direct taxation (2.4.45).
1. Objections to counting slaves in apportioning representation.
2. The initial representation of large states is "artfully lessened" to conceal the undue influence they will have when the subsequent apportionment is made.
3. The natural weight and influence and the greater ease of combining of the large states give them an even stronger position than their proportion of representation would suggest, and the small states a relatively weaker position.
4. Since inhabitants of commercial states will pay most of the duty on imports, it is unjust that they should pay also same proportion of direct tax as others.

C. Sec. 6—The prohibition on members of Congress holding federal office should be extended (2.4.46–48).

D. Sec. 7
1. Revenue bills. It is wrong to confine origination of revenue bills to House of Representatives; House of Lords analogy does not apply; the Senate will be the most experienced, select body, but will be rendered almost useless (2.4.49–52).
2. Presidential negative is unnecessary and improper (2.4.53–54).

E. Sec. 8—Powers of Congress (2.4.55–62).
1. Power to tax. General government given power to drain country by all means, including stamp duties. Federal government ought not to have power to lay direct taxes except in cases of state delinquency (2.4.55–56).
2. Power to borrow money. Clause permitting emission of bills of credit eliminated, over opposition of Martin and friends, out of excessive fear of paper money (2.4.57).
3. Power to constitute inferior federal courts. There is no need for such bodies, which would increase federal influence and tend to undermine the state judiciaries (2.4.58).
4. Military power. Congressional powers to raise and support armies, call forth militia, are dangerous and unlimited, tend to introduce arbitrary power, and are aimed at the destruction of the states (2.4.59–62).

F. Sec. 9—Restrictions (2.4.63–74).
   1. "the importation of such persons." By avoiding the odious expression "slaves," the clause permits Congress to impose duties on every foreigner who comes here. Description of slave trade/navigation act compromise. Lengthy account of strong anti-slavery arguments (2.4.63–71).
   2. Suspension of writ of habeas corpus. Not necessary, as states have this power; federal government could use it to send advocates of freedom to distant states (2.4.72).
   3. No preference to be given to ports of one state, and vessels bound from one state not to be obliged to clear in another. Purpose of this destroyed by power of general government to establish whatever ports of entry it chooses (2.4.73–74).

G. Sec. 10—Restrictions on states (2.4.75–79).
   1. States prohibited from issuing bills of credit. Should not totally prohibit paper money, which may sometimes be necessary (2.4.75).
   2. States prohibited from making anything but gold and silver legal tender or passing laws impairing contracts. There may be times of great distress when these would be necessary (2.4.76–78).
   3. States prohibited from laying imposts without permission of general government. Should leave them at least duties on exports; also state duties on imports might sometimes be necessary (2.4.79).

II. Article II—Executive (2.4.80–88)

A. Election and tenure.
   1. Disagreement in Convention between those who favored limited duration and rotation and those who favored appointment during good behavior (2.4.81–82).
   2. After repeated failures, the latter party succeeded in making President reeligible and in instituting present mode of election which gives undue influence to large states (2.4.82–83).

B. Vice President will come from a large state which will thus have undue influence (2.4.84).

C. Presidential powers. Make President a king in all but name (2.4.85–86).

D. Impeachment (2.4.87–88).
   This provision gives only an appearance of responsibility—unlikely that President will ever be impeached or, if impeached, found guilty or, if found guilty, removed from office.

III. Article III—Judiciary (2.4.89–98)

A. Jurisdiction. Federal judiciary will have exclusive right to decide all questions within its jurisdiction (2.4.89–91).

B. Jury trial. Not provided for in civil cases; taken away even in criminal cases by provision for appeal to Supreme Court on questions of law and fact (2.4.92–94).

C. Treason against the United States. This provision may put the citizen in peril of committing treason against either the state or the federal government (2.4.95–98).

IV. Miscellaneous provisions (2.4.99–112)

A. Article IV, sec. 3—No creation of new states within the jurisdiction of existing state without the consent of that state (2.4.99–107).

1. This is contrary to every principle of justice and sound policy, which require dismemberment of large states and maintenance of states of moderate size (2.4.100–103).
2. The large states cannot use the argument that free and independent states ought not to be dismembered without their consent, having abandoned this ground in forcing the small states to give up their equality (2.4.104–5).
3. As the Constitution protects the large states from the natural disintegrative tendencies of their size, so it ought to permit Congress to divide them where appropriate (2.4.106).
4. Much of the land claimed by states was acquired by the common blood and treasure and ought to be part of the common stock (2.4.107).

B. Article VI—Absence of religious test (2.4.108). Some distinction at least should have been made between Christianity and infidelity or paganism.

C. Article VII—Ratification by nine states (2.4.109–12). While majority must rule in ordinary circumstances, unanimous consent is required for framing and dissolving a constitution. There can be no alteration of the Articles of Confederation without unanimous consent of state legislatures; only states are entitled to agree to alterations of a federal government.

V. Conclusion regarding Martin's own part in the Convention and his opposition to the Constitution (2.4.113–18)

1. Farrand III, 93.

2. See Henry P. Goddard, Luther Martin: The Federal Bull Dog (Baltimore 1887). Altogether appropriately, Martin was counsel for the state of Maryland in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316 (1819).

3. Samuel Tyler, Memoir of Roger Brooke Taney (Baltimore 1872) 66–67.

4. These are reprinted in Ford, Essays 341–83, and, in somewhat abridged form, in Farrand III, 276–95.

5. A reprint of the manuscript copy of the speech as taken down by the clerk of the Maryland House of Representatives can be found in Farrand III, 151–59.

6. This version is printed in Farrand III, 172–232.

7. The original pamphlet included a letter to the Speaker of the Maryland House of Delegates vindicating Martin's report of the conduct of Messrs. Yates and Lansing at Philadelphia, which adds nothing to their own account and is omitted here. For other material in the original pamphlet, see below, 2.4.115 n. 45.

8. See also Martin's discussion of ratification, 2.4.39–44.

9. Martin touches on these more usual Anti-Federalist concerns in his later letters. On the Bill of Rights, he wrote on 21 March 1788: "With respect to a bill of rights, had the government been formed upon principles truly federal, as I wished it, legislating over and acting upon the states only in their collective or political capacity, and not on individuals, there would have been no need of a bill of rights, as far as related to the rights of individuals, but only as to the rights of states. But the proposed constitution being intended and empowered to act not only on states, but also immediately on individuals, it renders a recognition and a stipulation in favour of the rights both of states and of men, not only proper, but in my opinion absolutely necessary." Ford, Essays 364–65. And on the extensive powers of the federal government, he wrote on 4 April 1788: "If those, my fellow citizens, to whom the administration of our government was about to be committed, had sufficient wisdom never to err, and sufficient goodness always to consult the true interest of the governed, and if we could have a proper security that their successors should to the end of time be possessed of the same qualifications, it would be impossible that power could be lavished upon them with too liberal a hand. Power absolute and unlimited, united with unerring wisdom and unbounded goodness, is the government of the Deity of the universe. But remember, my fellow citizens, that the persons to whom you are about to delegate authority are and will be weak, erring mortals, subject to the same passions, prejudices and infirmities with yourselves; and let it be deeply engraven on your hearts, that from the first history of government to the present time, if we begin with Nimrod and trace down the rulers of nations to those who are now invested with supreme power, we shall find few, very few, who have made the beneficent Governor of the universe the model of their conduct, while many are they who, on the contrary, have imitated the demons of the darkness. We have no right to expect that our rulers will be more wise, more virtuous, or more perfect than those of other nations have been, or that they will not be equally under the influence of ambition, avarice and all that train of baleful passions, which have so generally proved the curse of our unhappy race. We must consider mankind such as they really are,—such as experience has shown them to be heretofore, and bids us expect to find them hereafter,—and not suffer ourselves to be misled by interested deceivers or enthusiastick visionaries; and therefore in forming a system of government, to delegate no greater power than is clearly and certainly necessary, ought to be the first principle with every people who are influenced by reason and a regard for their safety, and in doing this, they ought most solicitously to endeavour so to qualify even that power, by such checks and restraints, as to produce a perfect responsibility in those who are to exercise it, and prevent them from its abuse with a chance of impunity;—since such is the nature of man, that he has a propensity to abuse authority and to tyrannize over the rights of his fellowmen; and to whomsoever power is given, not content with the actual deposit, they will ever strive to obtain an increase." Ford, Essays 378–79. Cf. volume 1 above, chapter 8.

To the Honorable Thomas Cockey Deye, Speaker of the House of Delegates of Maryland.

Sir,

2.4.1 I flatter myself the subject of this letter will be a sufficient apology for thus publicly addressing it to you, and through you to the other members of the house of delegates. It cannot have escaped your or their recollection, that when called upon as the servant of a free State, to render an account of those transactions in which I had had a share, in consequence of the trust reposed in me by that State, among other things, I informed them, "that some time in July, the Honorable Mr. Yates and Mr. Lansing of New-York, left the convention; that they had uniformly opposed the system, and that I believe, despairing of getting a proper one brought forward, or of rendering any real service, they returned no more." You cannot, Sir, have forgot, for the incident was too remarkable not to have made some impression, that upon my giving this information, the zeal of one of my honorable colleagues, in favour of a system which I thought it my duty to oppose, impelled him to interrupt me, and in a manner which I am confident his zeal alone, prevented him from being convinced was not the most delicate, to insinuate pretty strongly, that the statement which I had given of the conduct of those gentlemen, and their motives for not returning were not candid.

Those honorable members have officially given information on this subject, by a joint letter to his Excellency Governor Clinton—it is published.—Indulge me, Sir, in giving an extract from it, that it may stand contrasted in the same page with the information I gave, and may convict me of the want of candor of which I was charged, if the charge was just—if it will not do that, then let it silence my accusers. 2.4.2

"Thus circumstanced, under these impressions, to have hesitated would have been to be culpable;—we therefore gave the principles of the constitution, which has received the sanction of a majority of the convention, our decided and unreserved dissent. We were not present at the completion of the new constitution: but before we left the convention, its principles were so well established as to convince us, that no alteration was to be expected to conform it to our ideas of expediency and safety. A persuasion that our further attendance would be fruitless and unavailing rendered us less solicitous to return." 2.4.3

These, Sir, are their words; on this I shall make no comment; I wish not to wound the feelings of any person, I only wish to convince. 2.4.4

I have the honor to remain,
With the utmost respect,
Your very obedient servant,
Luther Martin.

Baltimore, January 27, 1788.

To the Citizens of the United States.

The following sheets contain the information given by me to the legislature of Maryland, when officially called before them for that purpose:—No 2.4.5

friend to his country will think that they require an apology; I should have been unworthy the trust reposed in me, and guilty of the blackest ingratitude to a State, which has given me the most distinguishing marks of its confidence, had I not been explicit.—No fact has been intentionally misstated by me, I aimed to be perfectly correct; and, though in some measure obliged to depend on my memory, I believe I have in no instance, given malice an opportunity to charge me with misrepresentation. No writer, with his name, has denied the information to be just—I think they never will—though we differ in politics, should it be necessary, there are men of honor who were in the convention, who are ready to decide in my favour; and I can, with confidence, appeal to a Washington, a Franklin, and other respectable members of the convention, for the veracity of my information. Few, very few, even of the anonymous publications have insinuated the information to be in any respect uncandid; and those few have confined themselves to generals, without daring to descend to particulars.—The lowest scurrility in the form of Extracts of letters, coined at the mint of meanness and falsehood, I have experienced; it is what I expected; I know myself, and I am known by others, to be infinitely above them, and have read them with a smile of contempt.—Me they cannot injure;—but they disgrace their authors, and the cause in which they are engaged.—This is a trifling sacrifice—In the cause of freedom, were it necessary, I am ready to make a much greater.[1]

2.4.6 As far as I have expressed my opinions of the views of the framers of the constitution, I have followed the fullest conviction of my mind, founded on my own observations made on their conduct while in convention, and confirmed by the conduct of the friends of the system since that time.—They were my sentiments while there; I at that time expressed them freely, and then found many who perfectly corresponded with me in sentiment, although some of them may not now choose to avow it, or, no doubt from a conviction of their error, may now advocate the system they there condemned and opposed. But as to myself, so far from having any reason to change the opinion I there formed, every circumstance which has since taken place has confirmed it.

2.4.7 The conduct adopted by the convention, rendered the dissemination of these sheets the more necessary: Could there possibly be a greater indignity and insult offered to the majesty of the free States, and the free citizens of America, than for the very men who were entrusted with powers for the preservation and security of their rights, and for the establishment of a permanent system to promote their happiness, to make use of that power to destroy both the one and the other?—For this purpose, in time of profound peace, to shut themselves up in mystery and darkness; to keep all their deliberations an absolute secret from their constituents, who were to be affected thereby; to prevent the publication of their journals; to deprive the free citizens of America of every means of information: to attempt to pass upon them, as meeting with their unanimous approbation, that which did not in reality meet with the perfect approbation of perhaps one individual in the convention; to give you no other alternative but to accept of it as proposed, without alteration, or to reject it entirely, while at the same time some of them were resounding, from one end of the continent to the other, the necessity of its acceptance, and that none but the enemies of their country would reject it—And to abuse your confidence in them, by endeavouring to hurry you into a hasty adoption, under that delusion, before you could obtain information, and be able to form a proper judgement for yourselves.

Such a conduct in any other country, or even in this, at any other time, 2.4.8 would have drawn down upon them the indignation and resentment of those who were thus attempted to be abused and enslaved.

To counteract the views of ambition and interest has been my aim—To 2.4.9
this I devoted every effort while in convention—The same motives have directed my conduct since—Should my exertions in the smallest degree assist in effecting the rejection of this detestable system of slavery, I shall enjoy the highest possible gratification, that of rendering my country an essential benefit.

But should the system be adopted, I shall even then enjoy the highest 2.4.10 possible consolation which a good citizen can enjoy in the public calamity, that of having conscientiously discharged my duty to my country, by endeavouring to avert it.

Luther Martin.

Baltimore, March 30, 1788.

Mr. Martin's Information to the General Assembly of the State of Maryland.

Mr. Martin, when called upon, addressed the House nearly as follows:

Since I was notified of the resolve of this Honourable House, that we should 2.4.11 attend this day, to give information with regard to the proceedings of the late convention, my time has necessarily been taken up with business, and I have also been obliged to make a journey to the Eastern Shore: These circumstances have prevented me from being as well prepared as I could wish, to give the information required—However, the few leisure moments I could spare, I have devoted to refreshing my memory, by looking over the papers and notes in my possession; and shall with pleasure, to the best of my abilities, render an account of my conduct.

It was not in my power to attend the convention immediately on my 2.4.12 appointment—I took my seat, I believe, about the 8th or 9th of June. I found that Governor Randolph, of Virginia, had laid before the convention certain propositions for their consideration, which have been read to this House by my honourable colleague,[2] and I believe, he has very faithfully detailed the substance of the speech with which the business of the convention was opened, for though I was not there at the time, I saw notes which had been taken of it.

2.4.13 The members of the convention from the States, came there under different powers; the greatest number, I believe, under powers nearly the same, as those of the delegates of this State—Some came to the convention under the former appointment, authorising the meeting of delegates merely to regulate trade.—Those of Delaware were expressly instructed to agree to no system which should take away from the States, that equality of suffrage secured by the original articles of confederation. Before I arrived, a number of rules had been adopted to regulate the proceedings of the convention, by one of which, seven States might proceed to business, and consequently four States the majority of that number, might eventually have agreed upon a system which was to affect the whole union. By another, the doors were to be shut, and the whole proceedings were to be kept secret; and so far did this rule extend, that we were thereby prevented from corresponding with gentlemen in the different States upon the subjects under our discussion—a circumstance, Sir, which I confess I greatly regretted—I had no idea, that all the wisdom, integrity, and virtue of this State, or of the others, were centered in the convention—I wished to have corresponded freely, and confidentially, with eminent political characters in my own, and other States, not implicitly to be dictated to by them, but to give their sentiments due weight and consideration. So extremely solicitous were they, that their proceedings should not transpire, that the members were prohibited even from taking copies of resolutions, on which the convention were deliberating, or extracts of any kind from the journals without formally moving for, and obtaining permission, by a vote of the convention for that purpose.

2.4.14 You have heard, Sir, the resolutions which were brought forward by the honourable member from Virginia; let me call the attention of this House to the conduct of Virginia, when our confederation was entered into—that State then proposed, and obstinately contended, contrary to the sense of, and unsupported by the other States, for an inequality of suffrage founded on numbers, or some such scale, which should give her, and certain other States, influence in the Union over the rest; pursuant to that spirit which then characterized her, and uniform in her conduct, the very second resolve, is calculated expressly for that purpose to give her a representation proportioned to her numbers, as if the want of that was the principle defect in our original system, and this alteration the great means of remedying the evils we had experienced under our present government.

2.4.15 The object of Virginia, and other large States, to encrease their power and influence over the others, did not escape observation: the subject, however, was discussed with great coolness in the committee of the whole

House (for the convention had resolved itself into a committee of the whole to deliberate upon the propositions delivered in by the honourable member from Virginia). Hopes were formed, that the farther we proceeded in the examination of the resolutions, the better the House might be satisfied of the impropriety of adopting them, and that they would finally be rejected by a majority of the committee; if on the contrary, a majority should report in their favour, it was considered, that it would not preclude the members from bringing forward and submitting any other system to the consideration of the convention; and accordingly, while those resolves were the subject of discussion in the committee of the whole House, a number of the members who disapproved them, were preparing another system, such as they thought more conducive to the happiness and welfare of the States—The propositions originally submitted to the convention having been debated, and undergone a variety of alterations in the course of our proceedings, the committee of the whole House by a small majority agreed to a report, which I am happy, Sir, to have in my power to lay before you; it was as follows:[3]

1. Resolved, That it is the opinion of this committee, that a national government ought to be established, consisting of a supreme, legislative, judiciary and executive. 2.4.16

2. That the legislative ought to consist of two branches.

3. That the members of the first branch of the national legislature ought to be elected by the people of the several States, for the term of three years, to receive fixed stipends, by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to public service, to be paid out of the national treasury, to be ineligible to any office established by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States, except those particularly belonging to the functions of the first branch, during the term of service, and under the national government, for the space of one year after its expiration.

4. That the members of the second branch of the legislature ought to be chosen by the individual legislatures, to be of the age of thirty years at least, to hold their offices for a term sufficient to ensure their independency, namely, seven years, one third to go out biennially, to receive fixed stipends, by which they may be compensated for the devotion of their time to public service, to be paid out of the national treasury, to be ineligible to any office by a particular State, or under the authority of the United States, except those peculiarly belonging to the functions of the second branch, during the term of service, and under the national government, for the space of one year after its expiration.

5. That each branch ought to possess the right of originating acts.

6. That the national legislature ought to be empowered to enjoy the legislative rights vested in Congress by the confederation, and moreover to legislate in all cases to which the separate States are incompetent, or in which the harmony of the United States may be interrupted, by the exercise of individual legislation; to negative all laws passed by the several States, contravening, in the opinion of the legislature of the United States, the articles of union, or any treaties subsisting under the authority of the Union.

7. That the right of suffrage in the first branch of the national legislature, ought not to be according to the rule established in the articles of confederation, but according to some equitable rate of representation, namely, in proportion to the whole number of white, and other free citizens and inhabitants of every age, sex and condition, including those bound to servitude for a term of years, and three-fifths of all other persons, not comprehended in the foregoing description, except Indians not paying taxes in each State.

8. That the right of suffrage in the second branch of the national legislature, ought to be according to the rule established in the first.

9. That a national executive be instituted to consist of a single person, to be chosen by the national legislature for the term of seven years, with power to carry into execution the national laws, to appoint to offices in cases not otherwise provided for, to be ineligible a second time, and to be removeable on impeachment and conviction of malpractice or neglect of duty, to receive a fixed stipend, by which he may be compensated for the devotion of his time to public service—to be paid out of the national treasury.

10. That the national executive shall have a right to negative any legislative act which shall not afterwards be passed, unless by two third parts of each branch of the national legislature.

11. That a national judiciary be established, to consist of one supreme tribunal, the Judges of which, to be appointed by the second branch of the national legislature, to hold their offices during good behaviour, and to receive punctually, at stated times, a fixed compensation for their services, in which no increase or diminution shall be made, so as to affect the persons actually in office at the time of such increase or diminution.

12. That the national legislature be empowered to appoint inferior tribunals.

13. That the jurisdiction of the national judiciary shall extend to cases which respect the collection of the national revenue; cases arising under the laws of the United States, impeachments of any national officer, and questions which involve the national peace and harmony.

14. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the admission of States lawfully arising within the limits of the United States, whether from a voluntary junction of government, territory, or otherwise, with the consent of a number of voices in the national legislature less than the whole.

15. Resolved, That provision ought to be made for the continuance of Congress, and their authority and privileges, until a given day after the reform of the articles of union shall be adopted, and for the completion of all their engagements.

16. That a republican constitution and its existing laws ought to be guaranteed to each State by the United States.

17. That provision ought to be made for the amendment of the articles of union, whensoever it shall seem necessary.

18. That the legislative, executive and judiciary powers, within the several States, ought to be bound by oath to support the articles of the union.

19. That the amendments which shall be offered to the confederation by this convention, ought, at a proper time or times, after the approbation of Congress, to be submitted to an assembly or assemblies, recommended by the legislatures, to be expressly chosen by the people to consider and decide thereon.

These propositions, Sir, were acceded to by a majority of the members of the committee—a system by which the large States were to have not only an inequality of suffrage in the first branch, but also the same inequality in the second branch, or senate; however, it was not designed the second branch should consist of the same number as the first. It was proposed that the senate should consist of twenty-eight members, formed on the following scale—Virginia to send five, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts each four, South-Carolina, North-Carolina, Maryland, New-York, and Connecticut two each, and the States of New-Hampshire, Rhode-Island, Jersey, Delaware, and Georgia each of them one; upon this plan, the three large States, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, would have thirteen senators out of twenty-eight, almost one half of the whole number—Fifteen senators were to be a quorum to proceed to business; those three States would, therefore, have thirteen out of that quorum. Having this inequality in each branch of the legislature, it must be evident, Sir, that they would make what laws they pleased, however injurious or disagreeable to the other States, and that they would always prevent the other States from making any laws, however necessary and proper, if not agreeable to the views of those three States—They were not only, Sir, by this system, to have such an undue superiority in making laws and regulations for the Union, but to have the same superiority in the appointment of the President, the Judges, and all other officers of government. Hence, these three States, would in reality have the appointment of the President, Judges, and all the other officers. This President, and these Judges, so appointed, we may be morally certain, would be citizens of one of those three States; and the President, as appointed by them, and a citizen of one of them, would espouse their interests and their views, when they came in competition with the views and interests of the other States. This President, so appointed by the three large States, and so unduly under their influence, was to have a negative upon every law that should be passed, which, if negatived by him, was not to take effect, unless assented to by two-thirds of each branch of the legislature, a provision which deprived ten States of even the faintest shadow of liberty; for if they, by a miraculous unanimity, having all their members present, should outvote the other three, and pass a law contrary to their wishes, those three large States need only procure the President to negative it, and thereby prevent a possibility of its ever taking effect, because the representatives of those three States would amount to much more than one third (almost one half) of the representatives in each branch. And, Sir, this government, so organized with all this undue superiority in those three large States, was as you see to have a power of negativing the laws passed by every state legislature in the Union. Whether, therefore, laws passed by the legislature of Maryland, New-York, Connecticut, Georgia, or of any other of the ten States, for the regulation of their internal police, should take effect, and be carried into execution, was to depend on the good pleasure of the representatives of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts.

2.4.17

2.4.18 This system of slavery, which bound hand and foot ten States in the Union, and placed them at the mercy of the other three, and under the most abject and servile subjection to them, was approved by a majority of the members of the convention, and reported by the committee.

2.4.19 On this occasion, the House will recollect, that the convention was resolved into a committee of the whole—of this committee Mr. Gorham was chairman—The honorable Mr. Washington was then on the floor, in the same situation with the other members of the convention, at large to oppose any system he thought injurious, or to propose any alterations or amendments he thought beneficial, to these propositions so reported by the committee, no opposition was given by that illustrious personage, or by the President of the State of Pennsylvania. They both appeared cordially to approve them, and to give them their hearty concurrence; yet this system, I am confident, Mr. Speaker, there is not a member in this House would advocate, or who would hesitate one moment in saying it ought to be rejected. I mention this circumstance in compliance with the duty I owe this honorable body, not with a view to lessen those exalted characters, but to shew how far the greatest and best of men may be led to adopt very improper measures, through error in judgment, state influence, or by other causes, and to shew that it is our duty not to suffer our eyes to be so far dazzled by the splendor of names, as to run blindfolded into what may be our destruction.

2.4.20 Mr. Speaker, I revere those illustrious personages as much as any man here. No man has a higher sense of the important services they have rendered this country. No member of the convention went there more disposed to pay a deference to their opinions: but I should little have deserved the trust this State reposed in me, if I could have sacrificed its dearest interests to my complaisance for their sentiments.

2.4.21 When contrary to our hopes it was found, that a majority of the members of the convention had in the committee agreed to the system, I have laid before you, we then thought it necessary to bring forward the propositions, which such of us who disapproved the plan before had prepared—The members who had prepared these resolutions were principally of the Connecticut, New-York, Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland delegations. The honorable Mr. Patterson, of the Jerseys, laid them before the convention; of these propositions I am in possession of a copy, which I shall beg leave to read to you.

These propositions were referred to a committee of the whole House: unfortunately the New-Hampshire delegation had not yet arrived, and the sickness of a relation of the honorable Mr. M'Henry, obliged him still to be absent, a circumstance, Sir, which I considered much to be regretted, as Maryland thereby was represented by only two delegates, and they unhappily differed very widely in their sentiments. 2.4.22

The result of the reference of these last propositions to a committee, was a speedy and hasty determination to reject them—I doubt not, Sir, to those who consider them with attention, so sudden a rejection will appear surprising; but it may be proper to inform you, that on our meeting in convention, it was soon found there was among us three parties of very different sentiments and views. 2.4.23

One party, whose object and wish it was to abolish and annihilate all State governments, and to bring forward one general government over this extensive continent, of a monarchical nature, under certain restrictions and limitations: Those who openly avowed this sentiment were, it is true, but few, yet it is equally true, Sir, that there was a considerable number who did not openly avow it, who were by myself, and many others of the convention, considered as being in reality favourers of that sentiment, and acting upon those principles, covertly endeavouring to carry into effect what they well knew openly and avowedly could not be accomplished. 2.4.24

The second party was not for the abolition of the State governments, nor for the introduction of a monarchical government under any form; but they wished to establish such a system as could give their own States undue power and influence in the government over the other States. 2.4.25

A third party was what I considered truly federal and republican; this party was nearly equal in number with the other two, and were composed of the delegations from Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Delaware, and in part from Maryland; also of some individuals from other representations.—This party, Sir, were for proceeding upon terms of federal equality; they were for taking our present federal system as the basis of their proceedings, and as far as experience had shewn us that there were defects, to remedy those defects, as far as experience had shewn that other powers were necessary to the federal government, to give those powers—They considered this the object for which they were sent by their States, and what their States expected from them; they urged, that if after doing this, experience should shew that there still were defects in the system (as no doubt there would be) the same good sense that induced this convention to be 2.4.26 called, would cause the States when they found it necessary to call another; and if that convention should act with the same moderation, the members of it would proceed to correct such errors and defects as experience should have brought to light—That by proceeding in this train, we should have a prospect at length of obtaining as perfect a system of federal government, as the nature of things would admit. On the other hand, if we, contrary to the purpose for which we were entrusted, considering ourselves as master-builders, too proud to amend our original government, should demolish it entirely, and erect a new system of our own, a short time might shew the new system as defective as the old, perhaps more so: should a convention be found necessary again, if the members thereof acting upon the same principles, instead of amending and correcting its defects, should demolish that entirely, and bring forward a third system that also might soon be found no better than either of the former, and thus we might always remain young in government, and always suffering the inconveniencies of an incorrect, imperfect system.

2.4.27 But, Sir, the favourers of monarchy, and those who wished the total abolition of State governments, well knowing that a government founded on truly federal principles, the basis of which were the Thirteen State governments, preserved in full force and energy, would be destructive of their views; and knowing they were too weak in numbers, openly to bring forward their system, conscious also that the people of America would reject it if proposed to them, joined their interest with that party, who wished a system, giving particular States the power and influence over the others, procuring in return mutual sacrifices from them, in giving the government great and undefined powers as to its legislative and executive, well knowing that by departing from a federal system, they paved the way for their favourite object, the destruction of the State governments, and the introduction of monarchy—And hence, Mr. Speaker, I apprehend, in a great measure, arose the objections of those honorable members, Mr. Mason and Mr. Gerry. In every thing that tended to give the large States power over the smaller, the first of those gentlemen could not forget he belonged to the ancient dominion, nor could the latter forget that he represented Old Massachusetts; that part of the system which tended to give those States power over the others met with their perfect approbation; but when they viewed it charged with such powers as would destroy all State Governments, their own as well as the rest—when they saw a President so constituted as to differ from a monarch, scarcely but in name, and having it in his power to become such in reality when he pleased; they being republicans and federalists as far as an attachment to their own States would permit them, they warmly and zealously opposed those parts of the system. From these different sentiments, and from this combination of interest, I apprehend, Sir, proceeded the fate of what was called the Jersey resolutions, and the report made by the committee of the whole House.

The Jersey propositions being thus rejected, the convention took up those reported by the committee, and proceeded to debate them by paragraphs; it was now that they who disapproved the report found it necessary to make a warm and decided opposition, which took place upon the discussion of the seventh resolution, which related to the inequality of representation in the first branch.[4] Those who advocated this inequality, urged, that when the articles of confederation were formed, it was only from necessity and expediency that the States were admitted each to have an equal vote; but that our situation was now altered, and therefore those States who considered it contrary to their interest, would no longer abide by it. They said no State ought to wish to have influence in government, except in proportion to what it contributes to it; that if it contributes but little, it ought to have but a small vote; that taxation and representation ought always to go together; that if one State had sixteen times as many inhabitants as another, or was sixteen times as wealthy, it ought to have sixteen times as many votes; that an inhabitant of Pennsylvania ought to have as much weight and consequence as an inhabitant of Jersey or Delaware; that it was contrary to the feelings of the human mind; what the large States would never submit to; that the large States would have great objects in view, in which they would never permit the smaller States to thwart them; that equality of suffrage was the rotten part of the constitution, and that this was a happy time to get clear of it. In fine, that it was the poison which contaminated our whole system, and the source of all the evils we experienced. 2.4.28

This, Sir, is the substance of the arguments, if arguments they may be called, which were used in favour of inequality of suffrage.—Those who advocated the equality of suffrage, took the matter up on the original principles of government; they urged, that all men considered in a state of nature, before any government formed, are equally free and independent, no one having any right or authority to exercise power over another, and this without any regard to difference in personal strength, understanding, or wealth—That when such individuals enter into government, they have each a right to an equal voice in its first formation, and afterwards have each a right to an equal vote in every matter which relates to their government—That if it could be done conveniently, they have a right to exercise it in person—Where it cannot be done in person but for convenience, representatives are appointed to act for them, every person has a right to an equal vote, in choosing that representative who is entrusted to do for the whole, that which the whole, if they could assemble, might do in person, and in the transacting of which each would have an equal voice—That if we were to admit, because a man was more wise, more strong, or more wealthy, he should be entitled to more votes than another, it would be inconsistent with the freedom and liberty of that other, and would reduce him to slavery—Suppose, for instance, ten individuals in a state of nature, about to enter into government, nine of whom are equally wise, equally strong, and equally 2.4.29 wealthy, the tenth is ten times as wise, ten times as strong, or ten times as rich; if for this reason he is to have ten votes for each vote of either of the others, the nine might as well have no vote at all, since though the whole nine might assent to a measure, yet the vote of the tenth would countervail, and set aside all their votes—If this tenth approved of what they wished to adopt, it would be well, but if he disapproved, he could prevent it, and in the same manner he could carry into execution any measure he wished, contrary to the opinion of all the others, he having ten votes, and the other altogether but nine—It is evident that on these principles, the nine would have no will nor discretion of their own, but must be totally dependent on the will and discretion of the tenth, to him they would be as absolutely slaves as any negro is to his master—If he did not attempt to carry into execution any measures injurious to the other nine, it could only be said that they had a good master, they would not be the less slaves, because they would be totally dependent on the will of another, and not on their own will—They might not feel their chains, but they would notwithstanding wear them, and whenever their master pleased he might draw them so tight as to gall them to the bone. Hence it was urged the inequality of representation, or giving to one man more votes than another on account of his wealth, etc. was altogether inconsistent with the principles of liberty, and in the same proportion as it should be adopted, in favour of one or more, in that proportion are the others inslaved—It was urged, that though every individual should have an equal voice in the government, yet, even the superior wealth, strength, or understanding, would give great and undue advantages to those who possessed them. That wealth attracts respect and attention; superior strength would cause the weaker and more feeble to be cautious how they offended, and to put up with small injuries rather than to engage in an unequal contest—In like manner superior understanding would give its possessor many opportunities of profiting at the expence of the more ignorant. Having thus established these principles with respect to the rights of individuals in a state of nature, and what is due to each on entering into government, principles established by every writer on liberty, they proceeded to shew that States, when once formed, are considered with respect to each other as individuals in a state of nature; that, like individuals, each State is considered equally free and equally independent, the one having no right to exercise authority over the other, though more strong, more wealthy, or abounding with more inhabitants—That when a number of States unite themselves under a federal government, the same principles apply to them as when a number of individual men unite themselves under a State government[5]—That every argument which shews one man ought not to have more votes than another, because he is wiser, stronger or wealthier, proves that one State ought not to have more votes than another, because it is stronger, richer, or more populous—And that by giving one State, or one or two States more votes than the others, the others thereby are enslaved to such State or States, having the greater number of votes, in the same manner as in the case before put of individuals where one has more votes than the others—That the reason why each individual man in forming a State government should have an equal vote is, because each individual before he enters into government is equally free and independent—So each State, when States enter into a federal government, are entitled to an equal vote, because before they entered into such federal government, each State was equally free and equally independent—That adequate representation of men formed into a State government, consists in each man having an equal voice, either personally, or if by representatives, that he should have an equal voice in choosing the representative—So adequate representation of States in a federal government, consists in each State having an equal voice either in person or by its representative in every thing which relates to the federal government—That this adequacy of representation is more important in a federal, than in a State government, because the members of a State government, the district of which is not very large, have generally such a common interest, that laws can scarcely be made by one part oppressive to the others, without their suffering in common; but the different States composing an extensive federal empire, widely distant one from the other, may have interests so totally distinct, that the one part might be be greatly benefited by what would be destructive to the other.

They were not satisfied by resting it on principles; they also appealed to history—They shewed that in the Amphyctionic confederation of the Grecian cities, each city however different in wealth, strength, and other circumstances, sent the same number of deputies, and had each an equal voice in every thing that related to the common concerns of Greece. It was shewn that in the seven Provinces of the United Netherlands, and the confederated Cantons of Switzerland, each Canton and each province have an equal vote, although there are as great distinctions of wealth, strength, population, and extent of territory among those provinces and those Cantons, as among these States. It was said, that the maxim that taxation and representation ought to go together, was true so far, that no person ought to be taxed who is not represented, but not in the extent insisted upon, to wit, that the quantum of taxation and representation ought to be the same; on the contrary, the quantum of representation depends upon the quantum of freedom, and therefore all, whether individual States, or individual men, who are equally free, have a right to equal representation—That to those who insist that he who pays the greatest share of taxes, ought to have the greatest number of votes; it is a sufficient answer to say, that this rule would be destructive of the liberty of the others, and would render them slaves to the more rich and wealthy—That if one man pays more taxes than another, it is because he has more wealth to be protected by government, and he receives greater benefits from the government—So if one State pays more to the federal government, it is because as a State, she enjoys greater blessings from it; she has more wealth protected by it, or a greater number of inhabitants, whose rights are secured, and who share its advantages.

2.4.30

2.4.31 It was urged, that upon these principles the Pennsylvanian, or inhabitant of a large State, was of as much consequence as the inhabitant of Jersey, Delaware, Maryland, or any other State—That his consequence was to be decided by his situation in his own State; that if he was there as free, if he had as great share in the forming of his own government, and in the making and executing its laws, as the inhabitants of those other States, then was he equally important and of equal consequence—Suppose a confederation of States had never been adopted, but every State had remained absolutely in its independent situation, no person could with propriety, say that the citizen of the large State was not as important as the citizen of the smaller, the confederation of the States cannot alter the case. It was said, that in all transactions between State and State, the freedom, independence, importance and consequence, even the individuality of each citizen of the different States, might with propriety be said to be swallowed up, or concentrated in the independence, the freedom and the individuality of the State of which they are citizens—That the Thirteen States are thirteen distinct political individual existences as to each other; that the federal government is or ought to be a government over these thirteen political individual existences, which form the members of that government; and that as the largest State is only a single individual of this government, it ought to have only one vote; the smallest State also being one individual member of this government, ought also to have one vote—To those who urged that the States have equal suffrage, was contrary to the feelings of the human heart, it was answered, that it was admitted to be contrary to the feelings of pride and ambition; but those were feelings which ought not to be gratified at the expence of freedom.

2.4.32 It was urged, that the position that great States would have great objects in view, in which they would not suffer the less states to thwart them, was one of the strongest reasons why inequality of representation ought not to be admitted. If those great objects were not inconsistent with the interest of the less States, they would readily concur in them, but if they were inconsistent with the interest of a majority of the States composing the government, in that case two or three States ought not to have it in their power to aggrandize themselves at the expence of all the rest—To those who alledged that equality of suffrage in our federal government, was the poisonous source from which all our misfortunes flowed, it was answered, that the allegation was not founded in fact—That equality of suffrage had never been complained of by the States as a defect in our federal system—That among the eminent writers, foreigners and others, who had treated of the defects of our confederation, and proposed alterations, none had proposed an alteration in this part of the system: And members of the convention both in and out of Congress, who advocated the equality of suffrage, called upon their opponents both in and out of Congress, and challenged them to produce one single instance where a bad measure had been adopted, or a good measure had failed of adoption in consequence of the States having an equal vote; on the contrary, they urged, that all our evils flowed from the want of power in the federal head, and that let the right of suffrage in the States be altered in any manner whatever, if no greater powers were given to the government, the same inconveniences would continue.

It was denied that the equality of suffrage was originally agreed to on principles of necessity or expediency, on the contrary, that it was adopted on the principles of the rights of men and the rights of States which were then well known, and which then influenced our conduct although now they seem to be forgotten—For this the journals of Congress were appealed to; it was from them shewn, that when the Committee of Congress reported to that body the articles of confederation, the very first article which became the subject of discussion, was that respecting equality of suffrage—That Virginia proposed divers modes of suffrage, all on the principle of inequality, which were almost unanimously rejected; that on the question for adopting the article, it passed, Virginia being the only State which voted in the negative—That after the articles of confederation were submitted to the States by them to be ratified, almost every State proposed certain amendment, which they instructed their delegates to endeavour to obtain before ratification, and that among all the amendments proposed, not one State, not even Virginia, proposed an amendment of that article, securing the equality of suffrage—the most convincing proof it was agreed to and adopted, not from necessity, but upon a full conviction, that according to the principles of free government, the States had a right to that equality of suffrage. 2.4.33

But, Sir, it was to no purpose that the futility of their objections were shewn—when driven from the pretence that the equality of suffrage had been originally agreed to on principles of expediency and necessity, the representatives of the large States persisting in a declaration, that they would never agree to admit the smaller States to an equality of suffrage—In answer to this, they were informed, and informed in terms the most strong and energetic that could possibly be used, that we never would agree to a system giving them the undue influence and superiority they proposed—That we would risque every possible consequence—That from anarchy and confusion order might arise—That slavery was the worst that could ensue, and we considered the system proposed to be the most complete, most abject system of slavery that the wit of man ever devised, under the pretence of forming a government for free States—That we never would submit tamely and servilely to a present certain evil in dread of a future, which might be imaginary; that we were sensible the eyes of our country and the world were upon us—That we would not labour under the imputation of 2.4.34 being unwilling to form a strong and energetic federal government; but we would publish the system which we approved, and also that which we opposed, and leave it to our country and the world at large to judge between us, who best understood the rights of free men and free States, and who best advocated them; and to the same tribunal we would submit, who ought to be answerable for all the consequences which might arise to the union from the convention breaking up, without proposing any system to their constituents.—During this debate we were threatened, that if we did not agree to the system proposed, we never should have an opportunity of meeting in convention to deliberate on another, and this was frequently urged—In answer, we called upon them to shew what was to prevent it, and from what quarter was our danger to proceed; was it from a foreign enemy? Our distance from Europe, and the political situation of that country, left us but little to fear: Was there any ambitious State or States, who in violation of every sacred obligation was preparing to enslave the other States, and raise itself to consequence on the ruin of the others? Or was there any such ambitious individual? We did not apprehend it to be the case: but suppose it to be true, it rendered it the more necessary that we should sacredly guard against a system which might enable all those ambitious views to be carried into effect, even under the sanction of the constitution and government: In fine, Sir, all these threats were treated with contempt, and they were told that we apprehended but one reason to prevent the States meeting again in convention; that when they discovered the part this convention had acted, and how much its members were abusing the trust reposed in them, the States would never trust another convention. At length, Sir, after every argument had been exhausted by the advocates of equality of representation, the question was called, when a majority decided in favour of the inequality—Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North-Carolina, South-Carolina and Georgia voting for it—Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, and Delaware against it; Maryland divided.[6] It may be thought surprising, Sir, that Georgia, a State now small and comparatively trifling in the union, should advocate this system of unequal representation, giving up her present equality in the federal government, and sinking herself almost to total insignificance in the scale; but, Sir, it must be considered that Georgia has the most extensive territory in the union, being larger than the whole island of Great-Britain, and thirty times as large as Connecticut. This system being designed to preserve to the States their whole territory unbroken, and to prevent the erection of new States within the territory of any of them: Georgia looked forward when her population, being increased in some measure proportioned to her territory, she should rise in the scale and give law to the other States, and hence we found the delegation of Georgia warmly advocating the proposition of giving the States unequal representation. Next day the question came on with respect to the inequality of representation in the second branch, but little debate took place; the subject had been exhausted on the former question. On the votes being taken, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North-Carolina, and South-Carolina, voted for the inequality. Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, Delaware and Maryland* were in the negative. Georgia had only two representatives on the floor, one of whom (not I believe because he was against the measure, but from a conviction that we would go home, and thereby dissolve the convention before we would give up the question) voted also in the negative, by which that State was divided.[7]—Thus, Sir, on this great and important part of the system, the convention being equally divided, five States for the measure, five against, and one divided, there was a total stand, and we did not seem very likely to proceed any further. At length it was proposed, that a select committee should be balloted for, composed of a member from each State, which committee should endeavour to devise some mode of conciliation or compromise; I had the honor to be on that committee; we met and discussed the subject of difference; the one side insisted on the inequality of suffrage in both branches, the other insisted on the equality in both; each party was tenacious of their sentiments, when it was found that nothing could induce us to yield the inequality in both branches; they at length proposed by way of compromise, if we would accede to their wishes as to the first branch, they would agree to the equal representation in the second. To this it was answered, that there was no merit in the proposal, it was only consenting, after they had struggled to put both their feet on our necks, to take one of them off, provided we would consent to let them keep the other on, when they knew at the same time, that they could not put one foot on our necks, unless we would consent to it, and that by being permitted to keep on that one foot, they should afterwards be able to place the other foot on whenever they pleased.

They were also called on to inform us what security they could give us 2.4.35 should we agree to this compromise, that they would abide by the plan of government formed upon it, any longer than it suited their interest, or they found it expedient.—"The States have a right to an equality of representation. This is secured to us by our present articles of confederation, we are in possession of this right; it is now to be torn from us. What security can you give us, that, when you get the power the proposed system will give you, when you have men and money, that you will not force from the States that equality of suffrage in the second branch, which you now deny to be their right, and only give up from absolute necessity? Will you tell us we ought to trust you because you now enter into a solemn compact with us? This you have done before, and now treat it with the utmost contempt. Will you now make an appeal to the Supreme Being, and call on him to guarantee your observance of this compact? The same you have formerly done for your observance of the articles of confederation, which you are now violating in the most wanton manner!

*On this question, Mr. Martin was the only delegate for Maryland present, which circumstance secured the State a negative. Immediately after the question had been taken, and the President had declared the votes, Mr. Jenifer came into the convention, when Mr. King, from Massachusetts, valuing himself on Mr. Jenifer to divide the State of Maryland on this question, as he had on the former, requested of the President that the question might be put again—however, the motion was too extraordinary in its nature to meet with success!

2.4.36 The same reasons which you now urge for destroying our present federal government, may be urged for abolishing the system which you now propose to adopt; and as the method prescribed by the articles of confederation is now totally disregarded by you, as little regard may be shewn by you to the rules prescribed for the amendment of the new system, whenever having obtained power by the government, you shall hereafter be pleased either to discard it entirely, or so to alter it as to give yourselves all that superiority which you have now contended for, and to obtain which you have shewn yourselves disposed to hazard the union."—Such, Sir, was the language used on that occasion, and they were told that as we could not possibly have a stronger tie on them for their observance of the new system than we had for their observance of the articles of confederation, which had proved totally insufficient, it would be wrong and imprudent to confide in them. It was further observed, that the inequality of the representation would be daily increasing—That many of the States whose territory was confined, and whose population was at this time large in proportion to their territory, would probably twenty, thirty, or forty years hence, have no more representatives than at the introduction of the government, whereas the States having extensive territory, where lands are to be procured cheap, would be daily encreasing in the number of their inhabitants, not only from propagation, but from the emigration of the inhabitants of the other States, and would have soon double, or perhaps treble the number of representatives that they are to have at first, and thereby enormously increase their influence in the national councils. However, the majority of the select committee at length agreed to a series of propositions by way of compromise, part of which related to the representation in the first branch nearly as the system is now published: and part of them to the second branch securing in that equal representation, and reported them as a compromise upon the express terms that they were wholly to be adopted or wholly to be rejected; upon this compromise, a great number of the members so far engaged themselves, that if the system was progressed upon agreeable to the terms of compromise, they would lend it their names, by signing it, and would not actively oppose it, if their States should appear inclined to adopt it—Some, however, in which number was myself, who joined in the report, and agreed to proceed upon those principles, and see what kind of a system would ultimately be formed upon it, yet reserved to themselves in the most explicit manner the right of finally giving a solemn dissent to the system, if it was thought by them inconsistent with the freedom and happiness of their country—This, Sir, will account why the members of the convention so generally signed their names to the system; not because they thought it a proper one; not because they thoroughly approved, or were unanimous for it; but because they thought it better than the system attempted to be forced upon them. This report of the select committee was after long dissention adopted by a majority of the convention, and the system was proceeded in accordingly—I believe near a fortnight, perhaps more, was spent in the discussion of this business, during which, we were on the verge of dissolution, scarce held together by the strength of an hair, though the public papers were announcing our extreme unanimity.

Mr. Speaker, I think it my duty to observe, that during this struggle to 2.4.37 prevent the large States from having all power in their hands, which had nearly terminated in a dissolution of the convention: it did not appear to me, that either of those illustrious characters the Honorable Mr. Washington, or the President of the State of Pennsylvania, were disposed to favour the claims of the smaller States, against the undue superiority attempted by the large States; on the contrary, the Honorable President of Pennsylvania, was a member of the committee of compromise, and there advocated the right of the large States to an inequality in both branches, and only ultimately conceded it in the second branch on the principle of conciliation; when it was found no other terms would be accepted. This, Sir, I think it my duty to mention, for the consideration of those who endeavour to prop up a dangerous and defective system by great names; soon after this period, the Honourable Mr. Yates and Mr. Lansing of New-York, left us; they had uniformly opposed the system, and I believe, despairing of getting a proper one brought forward, or of rendering any real service, they returned no more. The propositions reported by the committee of the whole house, having been fully discussed by the convention, and with many alterations having been agreed to by a majority, a committee of five, were appointed to detail the system according to the principles contained in what had been agreed to by that majority; this was likely to require some time, and the convention adjourned for eight or ten days. Before the adjournment, I moved for liberty to be given to the different members to take correct copies of the propositions, to which the convention had then agreed, in order that during the recess of the convention, we might have an opportunity of considering them, and if it should be thought that any alterations or amendments were necessary, that we might be prepared against the convention met to bring them forward for discussion, But, Sir, the same spirit which caused our doors to be shut—our proceedings to be kept secret—our journals to be locked up—and every avenue, as far as possible, to be shut to public information, prevailed also in this case, and the proposal so reasonable and necessary was rejected by a majority of the convention; thereby precluding even the members themselves, from the necessary means of information and deliberation on the important business in which they were engaged.[8]

2.4.38 It has been observed, Mr. Speaker, by my honorable colleagues, that the debate respecting the mode of representation, was productive of considerable warmth, this observation is true; but, Sir, it is equally true, that if we could have tamely and servilely consented to be bound in chains, and meanly condescended to assist in rivetting them fast, we might have avoided all that warmth, and have proceeded with as much calmness and coolness as any stoick could have wished. Having thus, Sir, given the honorable members of this house, a short history of some interesting parts of our proceedings, I shall beg leave to take up the system published by the convention, and shall request your indulgence, while I make some observations on different parts of it, and give you such further information as may be in my power. [Here Mr. Martin read the first section of the first article, and then proceeded.] With respect to this part of the system, Mr. Speaker, there was a diversity of sentiment; those who were for two branches in the legislature, a house of representatives and a senate, urged the necessity of a second branch, to serve as a check upon the first, and used all those trite and common place arguments which may be proper and just, when applied to the formation of a State government over individuals variously distinguished in their habits and manners, fortune and rank; where a body chosen in a select manner, respectable for their wealth and dignity, may be necessary, frequently to prevent the hasty and rash measures of a representation more popular; but on the other side it was urged, that none of those arguments could with propriety be applied to the formation of a federal government over a number of independent States—That it is the State governments which are to watch over and protect the rights of the individual, whether rich or poor, or of moderate circumstances, and in which the democratic and aristocratic influence or principles are to be so blended, modified, and checked, as to prevent oppression and injury—That the federal government is to guard and protect the States and their rights, and to regulate their common concerns—That a federal government is formed by the States, as States that is in their sovereign capacities, in the same manner as treaties and alliances are formed—That a sovereignty considered as such, cannot be said to have jarring interests or principles, the one aristocratic, and the other democratic; but that the principles of a sovereignty considered as a sovereignty, are the same, whether that sovereignty is monarchical, aristocratical, democratical, or mixed—That the history of mankind doth not furnish an instance from its earliest period to the present time, of a federal government constituted of two distinct branches—That the members of the federal government, if appointed by the States in their State capacities, that is by their legislatures, as they ought, would be select in their choice, and coming from different States, having different interests and views; this difference of interests and views, would always be a sufficient check over the whole; and it was shewn, that even Adams, who the reviewers have justly observed, appears to be fond of checks and balances as Lord Chesterfield of the graces, even he declares that a council consisting of one branch has always been found sufficient in a federal government.[9]

It was urged, that the government we were forming was not in reality a federal but a national government, not founded on the principles of the preservation, but the abolition or consolidation of all State governments—That we appeared totally to have forgot the business for which we were sent, and the situation of the country for which we were preparing our system—That we had not been sent to form a government over the inhabitants of America, considered as individuals, that as individuals they were all subject to their respective State governments, which governments would still remain, tho' the federal government should be dissolved—That the system of government we were entrusted to prepare, was a government over these thirteen States; but that in our proceedings, we adopted principles which would be right and proper, only on the supposition that there were no State governments at all, but that all the inhabitants of this extensive continent were in their individual capacity, without government, and in a state of nature—That accordingly the system proposes the legislature to consist of two branches, the one to be drawn from the people at large, immediately in their individual capacity; the other to be chose in a more select manner, as a check upon the first—It is in its very introduction declared to be a compact between the people of the United States as individuals, and it is to be ratified by the people at large in their capacity as individuals; all which it was said, would be quite right and proper, if there were no State governments, if all the people of this continent were in a state of nature, and we were forming one national government for them as individuals, and is nearly the same as was done in most of the States, when they formed their governments over the people who compose them. 2.4.39

Whereas it was urged, that the principles on which a federal government over States ought to be constructed and ratified are the reverse; that instead of the legislature consisting of two branches, one branch was sufficient, whether examined by the dictates of reason, or the experience of ages—That the representation instead of being drawn from the people at large as individuals, ought to be drawn from the States as States in their sovereign capacity—That in a federal government, the parties to the compact are not the people as individuals, but the States as States, and that it is by the States as States in their sovereign capacity, that the system of government ought to be ratified, and not by the people as individuals. 2.4.40

It was further said, that in a federal government over States equally free, sovereign, and independent, every State ought to have an equal share in making the federal laws or regulations; in deciding upon them, and in carrying them into execution, neither of which was the case in this system, but the reverse, the States not having an equal voice in the legislature, nor in the appointment of the executive, the judges, and the other officers of govern- 2.4.41

ment: it was insisted, that in the whole system there was but one federal feature, the appointment of the senators by the States in their sovereign capacity, that is by their legislatures, and the equality of suffrage in that branch; but it was said that this feature was only federal in appearance.

2.4.42 To prove this, and that the senate as constituted could not be a security for the protection and preservation of the State governments, and that the senators could not be justly considered the representatives of the States as States, it was observed, that upon just principles of representation, the representative ought to speak the sentiments of his constitutents, and ought to vote in the same manner that his constituents would do (as far as he can judge) provided his constituents were acting in person, and had the same knowledge and information with himself; and therefore that the representative ought to be dependant on his constituents, and answerable to them; that the connexion between the representative and the represented, ought to be as near and as close as possible; according to these principles, Mr. Speaker, in this State it is provided by its constitution, that the representatives in Congress, shall be chosen annually, shall be paid by the State, and shall be subject to recall even within the year; so cautiously has our constitution guarded against an abuse of the trust reposed in our representatives in the federal government; whereas by the third and sixth sections of the first article of this new system, the senators are to be chosen for six years instead of being chosen annually; instead of being paid by their States who send them, they in conjunction with the other branch, are to pay themselves out of the treasury of the United States; and are not liable to be recalled during the period for which they are chosen: Thus, Sir, for six years the senators are rendered totally and absolutely independent of their States, of whom they ought to be the representatives, without any bond or tie between them: During that time they may join in measures ruinous and destructive to their States, even such as should totally annihilate their State governments, and their States cannot recall them, nor exercise any controul over them. another consideration, Mr. Speaker, it was thought ought to have great weight to prove that the smaller States cannot depend on the senate for the preservation of their rights, either against large and ambitious States, or against an ambitious, aspiring President. The senate, Sir, is so constituted, that they are not only to compose one branch of the legislature, but by the second section of the second article, they are to compose a privy council for the President; hence, it will be necessary, that they should be, in a great measure, a permanent body, constantly residing at the seat of government. Seven years is esteemed for the life of a man;[10] it can hardly be supposed, that a senator, especially from the States remote from the seat of empire, will accept of an appointment which must estrange him for six years from his State, without giving up to a great degree his prospects in his own State. If he has a family, he will take his family with him to the place where the government shall be fixed, that will become his home, and there is every reason to expect, that his future views and prospects will centre in the favours and emoluments either of the general government, or of the government of that State where the seat of empire is established:—In either case, he is lost to his own State. If he places his future prospects in the favours and emoluments of the general government, he will become the dependant and creature of the President, as the system enables a senator to be appointed to offices, and without the nomination of the President, no appointment can take place; as such, he will favour the wishes of the President, and concur in his measures, who, if he has no ambitious views of his own to gratify, may be too favourable to the ambitious views of the large States, who will have an undue share in his original appointment, and on whom he will be more dependant afterwards than on the States which are smaller. If the senator places his future prospects in that State where the seat of empire is fixed; from that time he will be in every question wherein its particular interest may be concerned the representative of that State, not of his own.

But even this provision apparently for the security of the State governments, inadequate as it is, is entirely left at the mercy of the general government, for by the fourth section of the first article, it is expressly provided, that the Congress shall have a power to make and alter all regulations concerning the time and manner of holding elections for senators; a provision, expressly looking forward to, and I have no doubt designed for the utter extinction and abolition of all State governments; nor will this, I believe, be doubted by any person, when I inform you that some of the warm advocates and patrons of the system in convention, strenuously opposed the choice of the senators by the State legislatures, insisting that the State governments ought not to be introduced in any manner so as to be component parts of, or instruments for carrying into execution, the general government: Nay, so far were the friends of the system from pretending that they meant it, or considered it as a federal system, that on the question being proposed, "that a union of the States, merely federal, ought to be the sole object of the exercise of the powers vested in the convention;" it was negatived by a majority of the members, and it was resolved, "that a national government ought to be formed"—afterwards the word "national" was struck out by them, because they thought the word might tend to alarm:[11] and although now, they who advocate the system, pretend to call themselves federalists, in convention the distinction was quite the reverse; those who opposed the system, were there considered and styled the federal party, those who advocated it, the antifederal.[12] 2.4.43

Viewing it as a national, not a federal government, as calculated and designed not to protect and preserve, but to abolish and annihilate the State governments, it was opposed for the following reasons, it was said, that this continent was much too extensive for one national government, which should have sufficient power and energy to pervade and hold in obedience 2.4.44 and subjection all its parts, consistent with the enjoyment and preservation of liberty; that the genius and habits of the people of America, were opposed to such a government—That during their connexion with Great-Britain, they had been accustomed to have all their concerns transacted within a narrow circle, their colonial district; they had been accustomed to have their seats of government near them, to which they might have access, without much inconvenience, when their business should require it—That at this time we find if a county is rather large the people complain of the inconvenience, and clamour for a division of their county, or for a removal of the place where their courts are held, so as to render it more central and convenient—That in those States, the territory of which is extensive, as soon as the population increases remote from the seat of government, the inhabitants are urgent for a removal of the seat of their government, or to be erected into a new State—As a proof of this, the inhabitants of the western parts of Virginia and North-Carolina, of Vermont and the Province of Main, were instances, even the inhabitants of the western parts of Pennsylvania, who it is said, already seriously look forward to the time when they shall either be erected into a new State, or have their seat of government removed to the Susquehanna.—If the inhabitants of the different States consider it as a grievance to attend a country court or the seat of their own government, when a little inconvenient, can it be supposed they would ever submit to have a national government established, the seat of which would be more than a thousand miles removed from some of them? It was insisted that governments of a republican nature, are those best calculated to preserve the freedom and happiness of the citizen—That governments of this kind, are only calculated for a territory but small in its extent; that the only method by which an extensive continent like America could be connected and united together consistent with the principles of freedom, must be by having a number of strong and energetic State governments for securing and protecting the rights of individuals forming those governments, and for regulating all their concerns; and a strong energetic federal government over those States for the protection and preservation, and for regulating the common concerns of the State. It was further insisted, that even if it was possible to effect a total abolition of the State governments at this time, and to establish one general government over the people of America, it could not long subsist, but in a little time would again be broken into a variety of governments of a smaller extent, similar in some manner to the present situation of this continent; the principal difference in all probability would be that the governments, so established, being affected by some violent convulsion, might not be formed on principles so favourable to liberty as those of our present State governments—That this ought to be an important consideration to such of the States who had excellent governments, which was the case with Maryland and most others, whatever it might be to persons who disapproving of their particular State government would be willing to hazard every thing to overturn and destroy it. These reasons, Sir, influenced me to vote against two branches in the legislature, and against every part of the system which was repugnant to the principles of a federal government—Nor was there a single argument urged, or reason assigned, which to my mind was satisfactory, to prove that a good government on federal principles was unattainable, the whole of their arguments only proving, what none of us controverted, that our federal government as originally formed was defective and wanted amendment—However, a majority of the convention hastily and inconsiderately, without condescending to make a fair trial, in their great wisdom, decided that a kind of government which a Montesquieu and a Price have declared the best calculated of any to preserve internal liberty, and to enjoy external strength and security, and the only one by which a large continent can be connected and united, consistent with the principles of liberty[13] was totally impracticable, and they acted accordingly.

With respect to that part of the second section of the first article, which 2.4.45 relates to the apportionment of representation and direct taxation, there were considerable objections made to it, besides the great objection of inequality—It was urged, that no principle could justify taking slaves into computation in apportioning the number of representatives a State should have in the government[14]—That it involved the absurdity of increasing the power of a State in making laws for free men in proportion as that State violated the rights of freedom—That it might be proper to take slaves into consideration, when taxes were to be apportioned, because it had a tendency to discourage slavery; but to take them into account in giving representation tended to encourage the slave trade, and to make it the interest of the States to continue that infamous traffic—That slaves could not be taken into account as men, or citizens, because they were not admitted to the rights of citizens, in the States which adopted or continued slavery—If they were to be taken into account as property, it was asked, what peculiar circumstance should render this property (of all others the most odious in its nature) entitled to the high privilege of conferring consequence and power in the government to its possessors, rather than any other property: and why slaves should, as property be taken into account rather than horses, cattle, mules, or any other species; and it was observed by an honourable member from Massachusetts, that he considered it as dishonourable and humiliating to enter into compact with the slaves of the southern States, as it would with the horses and mules of the eastern.[15] It was also objected, that the numbers of representatives appointed by this section to be sent by the particular States to compose the first legislature, were not precisely agreeable to the rule of representation adopted by this system, and that the numbers in this section are artfully lessened for the large States, while the smaller States have their full proportion in order to prevent the undue influence which the large States will have in the government from being too apparent;[16] and I think, Mr. Speaker, that this objection is well founded. I have taken some pains to obtain information of the number of free men and slaves in the different States, and I have reason to believe, that if the estimate was now taken, which is directed, and one delegate to be sent for every thirty thousand inhabitants, that Virginia would have at least twelve delegates, Massachusetts eleven, and Pennsylvania ten, instead of the number stated in this section; where the other States, I believe, would not have more than the number there allowed them, nor would Georgia, most probably at present, send more than two—If I am right, Mr. Speaker, upon the enumeration being made, and the representation being apportioned according to the rule prescribed, the whole number of delegates would be seventy-one, thirty-six of which would be a quorum to do business; the delegates of Virginia, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania, would amount to thirty-three of that quorum—Those three States will, therefore, have much more than equal power and influence in making the laws and regulations, which are to affect this continent, and will have a moral certainty of preventing any laws or regulations which they disapprove, although they might be thought ever so necessary by a great majority of the States—It was further objected, that even if the States who had most inhabitants ought to have a greater number of delegates, yet the number of delegates ought not to be in exact proportion to the number of inhabitants, because the influence and power of those States whose delegates are numerous, will be greater when compared to the influence and power of the other States, than the proportion which the numbers of their delegates bear to each other; as for instance, though Delaware has one delegate, and Virginia but ten, yet Virginia has more than ten times as much power and influence in the government as Delaware; to prove this, it was observed, that Virginia would have a much greater chance to carry any measure than any number of States, whose delegates were altogether ten (suppose the States of Delaware, Connecticut, Rhode-Island, and New-Hampshire) since the ten delegates from Virginia in every thing that related to the interest of that State would act in union, and move one solid and compact body, whereas the delegates of these four States, though collectively equal in number to those from Virginia, coming from different States, having different interests, will be less likely to harmonize and move in concert. As a further proof it was said, that Virginia, as the system is now reported, by uniting with her the delegates of four other States, can carry a question against the sense and interest of eight States by sixty-four different combinations; the four States voting with Virginia, being every time so far different as not to be composed of the same four; whereas the State of Delaware can only, by uniting four other States with her, carry a measure against the sense of eight States by two different combinations—a mathematical proof that the State of Virginia has thirty-two times greater chance of carrying a measure against the sense of eight States than Delaware, although Virginia has only ten times as many delegates: It was also shewn, that the idea was totally fallacious which was attempted to be maintained, that if a State had one thirteenth part of the numbers composing the delegation in this system, such State would have as much influence as under the articles of confederation; to prove the fallacy of this idea it was shewn, that under the articles of confederation the State of Maryland had but one vote in thirteen, yet no measure could be carried against her interests without seven States, a majority of the whole concurring in it; whereas in this system, though Maryland has six votes, which is more than the proportion of one in thirteen, yet five States may, in a variety of combinations, carry a question against her interest, tho' seven other States concur with her, and six States by a much greater number of combinations, may carry a measure against Maryland, united with six other States. I shall here, Sir, just observe, that as the committee of detail reported the system, the delegates from the different States were to be one for every forty thousand inhabitants; it was afterwards altered to one for every thirty thousand; this alteration was made after I left the convention, at the instance of whom I know not, but it is evident, that the alteration is in favour of the States which have large and extensive territory, to increase their power and influence in the government, and to the injury of the smaller States—Since it is the States of extensive territory, who will most speedily increase the number of their inhabitants as before has been observed, and will therefore, most speedily procure an increase to the number of their delegates—By this alteration Virginia, North-Carolina, or Georgia, by obtaining one hundred and twenty thousand additional inhabitants, will be entitled to four additional delegates, whereas such State would only have been entitled to three, if forty thousand had remained the number by which to apportion the delegation. As to that part of this section that relates to direct taxation, there was also an objection for the following reasons, it was said that a large sum of money was to be brought into the national treasury by the duties on commerce, which would be almost wholly paid by the commercial States, it would be unequal and unjust that the sum which was necessary to be raised by direct taxation should be apportioned equally upon all the States, obliging the commercial States to pay as large a share of the revenue arising therefrom, as the States from whom no revenue had been drawn by imposts; since the wealth and industry of the inhabitants of the commercial States will in the first place be severely taxed through their commerce, and afterwards be equally taxed with the industry and wealth of the inhabitants of the other States, who have paid no part of that revenue, so that by this provision, the inhabitants of the commercial States are in this system obliged to bear an unreasonable and disproportionate share in the expences of the union, and the payment of that foreign and domestic debt, which was incurred not more for the benefit of the commercial than of the other States.

In the sixth section of the first article, it is provided, that senators and representatives may be appointed to any civil office under the authority of 2.4.46 the United States, except such as shall have been created, or the emoluments of which have been increased during the time for which they were elected: upon this subject, Sir, there was a great diversity of sentiment among the members of the convention—As the propositions were reported by the committee of the whole house, a senator or representative could not be appointed to any office under a particular State, or under the United States, during the time for which they were chosen, nor to any office under the United States until one year after the expiration of that time.—It was said, and in my opinion justly, that no good reason could be assigned why a senator or representative should be incapacitated to hold an office in his own government, since it can only bind him more closely to his State, and attach him the more to its interests, which, as its representative, he is bound to consult and sacredly guard, as far as is consistent with the welfare of the union; and therefore, at most, would only add the additional motive of gratitude for discharging his duty; and according to this idea, the clause which prevented senators or delegates from holding offices in their own States, was rejected by a considerable majority; but, Sir, we sacredly endeavoured to preserve all that part of the resolution which prevented them from being eligible to offices under the United States, as we considered it essentially necessary to preserve the integrity, independence, and dignity of the legislature, and to secure its members from corruption.

2.4.47 I was in the number of those who were extremely solicitous to preserve this part of the report; but there was a powerful opposition made by such who wished the members of the legislature to be eligible to offices under the United States—Three different times did they attempt to procure an alteration, and as often failed, a majority firmly adhering to the resolution as reported by the committee; however, an alteration was at length by dint of perseverance, obtained even within the last twelve days of the convention, for it happened after I left Philadelphia[17]—As to the exception that they cannot be appointed to offices created by themselves, or the emoluments of which are by themselves increased, it is certainly of little consequence, since they may easily evade it by creating new offices, to which may be appointed the persons who fill the offices before created, and thereby vacancies will be made, which may be filled by the members who for that purpose have created the new offices.

2.4.48 It is true, the acceptance of an office vacates their seat, nor can they be re-elected during their continuance in office; but it was said, that the evil would first take place, that the price for the office would be paid before it was obtained; that vacating the seat of the person who was appointed to office, made way for the admission of a new member, who would come there as desirous to obtain an office as him whom he succeeded, and as ready to pay the price necessary to obtain it; in fine, that it would be only driving away the flies who were filled, to make room for the those that were hungry—And as the system is now reported, the President having the power to nominate to all offices, it must be evident, that there is no possible security for the integrity and independence of the legislature, but that they are most unduly placed under the influence of the President, and exposed to bribery and corruption.

The seventh section of this article was also the subject of contest—It was thought by many members of the convention, that it was very wrong to confine the origination of all revenue bills to the house of representatives, since the members of the senate will be chosen by the people as well as the members of the house of delegates, if not immediately, yet mediately, being chosen by the members of the State legislature, which members are elected by the people, and that it makes no real difference whether we do a thing in person, or by a deputy, or agent, appointed by us for that purpose. 2.4.49

That no argument can be drawn from the House of Lords in the British constitution, since they are neither mediately nor immediately the representatives of the people, but are one of the three estates, composing that kingdom, having hereditary right and privileges, distinct from, and independent of, the people. 2.4.50

That it may, and probably will be a future source of dispute and controversy between the two branches, what are, or are not revenue bills, and the more so, as they are not defined in the constitution; which controversies may be difficult to settle, and may become serious in their consequences, their being no power in the constitution to decide upon, or authorised in cases of absolute necessity to terminate them by a prorogation or dissolution of either of the branches; a remedy provided in the British constitution, where the King has that power, which has been found necessary at times to be exercised in case of violent dissentions between the Lords and Commons on the subject of money bills. 2.4.51

That every regulation of commerce; every law relative to excises, stamps, the post-office, the imposing of taxes, and their collection, the creation of courts and offices; in fine, every law for the union, if enforced by any pecuniary sanctions, as they would tend to bring money into the continental treasury, might and no doubt would be considered a revenue act—That consequently the senate, the members of whom will it may be presumed, be the most select in their choice, and consist of men the most enlightened, and of the greatest abilities, who from the duration of their appointment and the permanency of their body, will probably be best acquainted with the common concerns of the States, and with the means of providing for them, will be rendered almost useless as a part of the legislature; and that they will have but little to do in that capacity, except patiently to wait the proceedings of the house of representatives, and afterwards examine and approve, or propose amendments. 2.4.52

There were also objections to that part of this section which relates to the negative of the President.—There were some who thought no good reason could be assigned for giving the President a negative of any kind—Upon the 2.4.53 principle of a check to the proceedings of the legislature, it was said to be unnecessary; that the two branches having a controul over each others proceedings; and the senate being chosen by the State legislatures, and being composed of members from the different States, there would always be a sufficient guard against measures being hastily or rashly adopted.

2.4.54 That the President was not likely to have more wisdom or integrity than the senators, or any of them, or to better know or consult the interest of the States, than any member of the senate, so as to be entitled to a negative on that principle—And as to the precedent from the British constitution (for we were eternally troubled with arguments and precedents from the British government) it was said it would not apply. The King of Great-Britain there composed one of the three estates of the kingdom; he was possessed of rights and privileges, as such, distinct from the Lords and Commons; rights and privileges which descended to his heirs, and were inheritable by them; that for the preservation of these it was necessary he should have a negative, but that this was not the case with the President of the United States, who was no more than an officer of government, the sovereignty was not in him, but in the legislature: And it was further urged, even if he was allowed a negative, it ought not to be of so great extent as that given by the system, since his single voice is to countervail the whole of either branch, and any number less than two-thirds of the other; however, a majority of the convention was of a different opinion, and adopted it as it now makes a part of the system.

2.4.55 By the eighth section of this article, Congress is to have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.—When we met in convention after our adjournment, to receive the report of the committee of detail, the members of that committee were requested to inform us, what powers were meant to be vested in Congress by the word duties in this section, since the word imposts extended to duties on goods imported, and by another part of the system no duties on exports were to be laid: In answer to this inquiry we were informed, that it was meant to give the general government the power of laying stamp duties on paper, parchment, and vellum. We then proposed to have the power inserted in express words, least disputes hereafter might arise on the subject, and that the meaning might be understood by all who were to be affected by it; but to this it was objected, because it was said that the word stamp would probably sound odiously in the ears of many of the inhabitants, and be a cause of objection.[18] By the power of imposing stamp duties the Congress will have a right to declare, that no wills, deeds, or other instruments of writing, shall be good and valid, without being stamped—that without being reduced to writing, and being stamped, no bargain, sale, transfer of property, or contract of any kind or nature whatsoever shall be binding; and also that no exemplifications of records, depositions, or probates of any kind shall be received in evidence, unless they have the same solemnity—They may likewise oblige all proceedings of a judicial nature to be stamped to give them effect—Those stamp duties may be imposed to any amount they please, and under the pretence of securing the collection of these duties, and to prevent the laws which imposed them from being evaded, the Congress may bring the decision of all questions relating to the conveyance, disposition and rights of property, and every question relating to contracts between man and man into the courts of the general government.—Their inferior courts in the first instance and the superior court by appeal. By the power to lay and collect imposts, they may impose duties on any or every article of commerce imported into these States to what amount they please. By the power to lay excises, a power very odious in its nature, since it authorises officers to go into your houses, your kitchens, your cellars, and to examine into your private concerns; the Congress may impose duties on every article of use or consumption, on the food that we eat, on the liquors we drink, on the clothes that we wear, the glass which enlighten our houses, or the hearths necessary for our warmth and comfort. By the power to lay and collect taxes, they may proceed to direct taxation on every individual either by a capitation tax on their heads, or an assessment on their property. By this part of the section therefore, the government has a power to lay what duties they please on goods imported; to lay what duties they please afterwards on whatever we use or consume; to impose stamp duties to what amount they please, and in whatever case they please: afterwards to impose on the people direct taxes, by capitation tax, or by assessment, to what amount they choose, and thus to sluice them at every vein as long as they have a drop of blood, without any controul, limitation, or restraint; while all the officers for collecting these taxes, stamp duties, imposts, and excises, are to be appointed by the general government, under its directions, not accountable to the States; nor is there even a security that they shall be citizens of the respective States, in which they are to exercise their offices; at the same time the construction of every law imposing any and all these taxes and duties, and directing the collection of them, and every question arising thereon, and on the conduct of the officers appointed to execute these laws, and to collect these taxes and duties so various in their kinds, are taken away from the courts of justice of the different States, and confined to the courts of the general government, there to be heard and determined by judges holding their offices under the appointment not of the States, but of the general government.

Many of the members, and myself in the number, thought that the States were much better judges of the circumstances of their citizens, and what sum of money could be collected from them by direct taxation, and of the manner in which it could be raised, with the greatest ease and convenience to their citizens, than the general government could be; and that the general government ought not to have the power of laying direct taxes in any case, but in that of the delinquency of a State.—Agreeable to this sentiment, I brought in a proposition on which a vote of the convention was taken, the 2.4.56 proposition was as follows: "And wherever the legislature of the United States shall find it necessary that revenue should be raised by direct taxation, having apportioned the same by the above rule, requisitions shall be made of the respective States to pay into the continental treasury their respective quotas, within a time in the said requisition to be specified, and in case of any of the States failing to comply with such requisition, then and then only, to have power to devise and pass acts directing the mode and authorising the collection of the same."[19] Had this proposition been acceded to, the dangerous and oppressive power in the general government of imposing direct taxes on the inhabitants, which it now enjoys in all cases, would have been only vested in it, in case of the non-compliance of a State, as a punishment for its delinquency, and would have ceased the moment that the State complied with the requisition—But the proposition was rejected by a majority, consistent with their aim and desire of increasing the power of the general government as far as possible, and destroying the powers and influence of the States. And though there is a provision that all duties, imposts and excises shall be uniform, that is, to be laid to the same amount on the same articles in each State, yet this will not prevent Congress from having it in their power to cause them to fall very unequal and much hevier on some States than on others, because these duties may be laid on articles but little or not at all used in some States, and of absolute necessity for the use and consumption of others, in which case the first would pay little or no part of the revenue arising therefrom, while the whole or nearly the whole of it would be paid by the last, to wit, the States which use and consume the articles on which the imposts and excises are laid.

2.4.57 By our original articles of confederation, the Congress have a power to borrow money and emit bills of credit on the credit of the United States; agreeable to which was the report on this system as made by the committee of detail. When we came to this part of the report, a motion was made to strike out the words "to emit bills of credit;"[20] against the motion we urged, that it would be improper to deprive the Congress of that power; that it would be a novelty unprecedented to establish a government which should not have such authority—That it was impossible to look forward into futurity so far as to decide, that events might not happen that should render the exercise of such a power absolutely necessary—And that we doubted, whether if a war should take place it would be possible for this country to defend itself, without having recourse to paper credit, in which case there would be a necessity of becoming a prey to our enemies, or violating the constitution of our government; and that considering the administration of the government would be principally in the hands of the wealthy, there could be little reason to fear an abuse of the power by an unnecessary or injurious exercise of it—But, Sir, a majority of the convention, being wise beyond every event, and being willing to risque any political evil rather than admit the idea of a paper emission, in any possible case, refused to trust this authority to a government, to which they were lavishing the most unlimited powers of taxation, and to the mercy of which they were willing blindly to trust the liberty and property of the citizens of every State in the union; and they erased that clause from the system.[21]

Among other powers given to this government in the eighth section, it has 2.4.58
that of appointing tribunals inferior to the supreme court; to this power there was an opposition. It was urged, that there, was no occasion for inferior courts of the general government to be appointed in the different States, and that such ought not to be admitted—That the different State judiciaries in the respective States would be competent to, and sufficient for, the cognizance in the first instance of all cases that should arise under the laws of the general government, which being by this system made the supreme law of the States, would be binding on the different State judiciaries—That by giving an appeal to the supreme court of the United States, the general government would have a sufficient check over their decisions, and security for the enforcing of their laws—That to have inferior courts appointed under the authority of Congress in the different States, would eventually absorb and swallow up the State judiciaries, by drawing all business from them to the courts of the general government, which the extensive and undefined powers, legislative and judicial, of which it is possessed, would easily enable it to do—That it would unduly and dangerously increase the weight and influence of Congress in the several States, be productive of a prodigious number of officers, and be attended with an enormous additional and unnecessary expence—That the judiciaries of the respective States not having power to decide upon the laws of the general government, but the determination on those laws being confined to the judiciaries appointed under the authority of Congress in the first instance, as well as on appeal, there would be a necessity for judges or magistrates of the general government, and those to a considerable number, in each county of every State—That there would be a necessity for courts to be holden by them in each county, and that these courts would stand in need of all the proper officers, such as sheriffs, clerks and others commissioned, under the authority of the general government: in fine, that the administration of justice, as it will relate to the laws of the general government would require in each State all the magistrates, courts, officers and expence, which is now found necessary in the respective States for the administration of justice as it relates to the laws of the State governments. But here again we were overruled by a majority, who assuming it as a principle that the general government and the State governments (as long as they should exist) would be at perpetual variance and enmity, and that their interests would constantly be opposed to each other, insisted for that reason that the State judges being citizens of their respective States, and holding their commissions under them, ought not, though acting on oath, to be entrusted in the administration of the laws of the general government.

2.4.59 By the eighth section of the first article, the Congress have also a power given them to raise and support armies without any limitation as to numbers, and without any restriction in time of peace. Thus, Sir, this plan of government, instead of guarding against a standing army, that engine of arbitrary power, which has so often and so successfully been used for the subversion of freedom, has in its formation, given it an express and constitutional sanction, and hath provided for its introduction; nor could this be prevented: I took the sense of the convention on a proposition, by which the Congress should not have power, in time of peace, to keep embodied more than a certain number of regular troops—that number to be ascertained by what should be considered a respectable peace establishment. This proposition was rejected by a majority, it being their determination, that the power of congress to keep up a standing army, even in peace should only be restrained by their will and pleasure.[22]

2.4.60 This section proceeds further to give a power to the Congress to provide for the calling forth the militia, to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repel invasions. As to giving such a power there was no objection; but it was thought by some, that this power ought to be given with certain restrictions. It was thought that not more than a certain part of the militia of any one State, ought to be obliged to march out of the same, or be employed out of the same, at any one time, without the consent of the legislature of such State. This amendment I endeavored to obtain; but it met with the same fate, which attended almost every attempt to limit the powers given to the general government, and constitutionally to guard against their abuse, it was not adopted.[23] As it now stands, the Congress will have the power, if they please, to march the whole militia of Maryland to the remotest part of the union, and keep them in service as long as they think proper, without being in any respect dependent upon the government of Maryland for this unlimited exercise of power over its citizens. All of whom, from the lowest to the greatest, may, during such service, be subjected to military law, and tied up and whipped at the halbert like the meanest of slaves.

2.4.61 By the next paragraph, Congress is to have the power to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States.

2.4.62 For this extraordinary provision, by which the militia, the only defence and protection which the State can have for the security of their rights against arbitrary encroachments of the general government, is taken entirely out of the power of their respective States, and placed under the power of Congress, it was speciously assigned as a reason, that the general government would cause the militia to be better regulated and better disciplined than the State governments, and that it would be proper for the whole militia of the union to have a uniformity in their arms and exercise. To this it was answered, that the reason, however specious, was not just; that it would be absurd the militia of the western settlements, who were exposed to an Indian enemy, should either be confined to the same arms or exercise, as the militia of the eastern or middle States; that the same penalties which would be sufficient to enforce an obedience to militia laws in some States, would be totally disregarded in others—That leaving the power to the several States, they would respectively best know the situation and circumstances of their citizens, and the regulations that would be necessary and sufficient to effect a well regulated militia in each—That we were satisfied the militia had heretofore been as well disciplined, as if they had been under the regulations of Congress; and that the States would now have an additional motive to keep their militia in proper order, and fit for service, as it would be the only chance to preserve their existence against a general government, armed with powers sufficient to destroy them. These observations, Sir, procured from some of the members an open avowal of those reasons, by which we believed before that they were actuated. They said, that as the States would be opposed to the general government, and at enmity with it, which, as I have already observed, they assumed as a principle, if the militia was under the controul and the authority of the respective States, it would enable them to thwart and oppose the general government:—They said the States ought to be at the mercy of the general government, and, therefore, that the militia ought to be put under its power, and not suffered to remain under the power of the respective States. In answer to these declarations, it was urged, that if after having obtained to the general government the great powers already granted, and among those, that of raising and keeping up regular troops without limitation, the power over the militia should be taken away from the States, and also given to the general government, it ought to be considered as the last coup de grace to the State governments; that it must be the most convincing proof, the advocates of this system design the destruction of the State governments, and that no professions, to the contrary, ought to be trusted; and that every State in the union ought to reject such a system with indignation, since, if the general government should attempt to oppress and enslave them, they could not have any possible means of self defence; because the proposed system, taking away from the States the right of organizing, arming and disciplining of the militia, the first attempt made by a State to put the militia in a situation to counteract the arbitrary measures of the general government, would be construed into an act of rebellion, or treason; and Congress would instantly march their troops into the State.—It was further observed, that when a government wishes to deprive their citizens of freedom, and reduce them to slavery, it generally makes use of a standing army for that purpose, and leaves the militia in a situation as contemptible as possible, least they might oppose its arbitrary designs—That in this system, we give the general government every provision it could wish for, and even invite it to subvert the liberties of the States and their citizens, since we give them the right to encrease and keep up a standing army as numerous as it would wish, and by placing the militia under its power, enable it to leave the militia totally unorganized, undisciplined, and even to disarm them; while the citizens, so far from complaining of this neglect, might even esteem it a favor in the general government, as thereby they would be freed from the burthen of militia duties, and left to their own private occupations or pleasures. However, all arguments, and every reason that could be urged on this subject, as well as on many others, were obliged to yield to one that was unanswerable, a majority upon the division.

2.4.63 By the ninth section of this article, the importation of such persons as any of the States now existing, shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited prior to the year one thousand eight hundred and eight, but a duty may be imposed on such importation not exceeding ten dollars for each person.

2.4.64 The design of this clause is to prevent the general government from prohibiting the importation of slaves, but the same reasons which caused them to strike out the word "national," and not admit the word "stamps," influenced them here to guard against the word "slaves," they anxiously sought to avoid the admission of expressions which might be odious in the ears of Americans, although they were willing to admit into their system those things which the expressions signified: And hence it is, that the clause is so worded, as really to authorise the general government to impose a duty of ten dollars on every foreigner who comes into a State to become a citizen, whether he comes absolutely free, or qualifiedly so as a servant; although this is contrary to the design of the framers, and the duty was only meant to extend to the importation of slaves.

2.4.65 This clause was the subject of a great diversity of sentiment in the convention;—as the system was reported by the committee of detail, the provision was general, that such importation should not be prohibited, without confining it to any particular period. This was rejected by eight States—Georgia, South-Carolina, and I think North-Carolina voting for it.[24]

2.4.66 We were then told by the delegates of the two first of those States, that their States would never agree to a system which put it in the power of the general government to prevent the importation of slaves, and that they, as delegates from those States, must withhold their assent from such a system.

2.4.67 A committee of one member from each State was chosen by ballot, to take this part of the system under their consideration, and to endeavour to agree upon some report, which should reconcile those States; to this committee also was referred the following proposition, which had been reported by the committee of detail, to wit, "No navigation act shall be passed without the assent of two thirds of the members present in each house;" a proposition which the staple and commercial States were solicitous to retain, lest their commerce should be placed too much under the power of the eastern States, but which these last States were as anxious to reject.—This committee, of which also I had the honour to be a member, met and took under their consideration the subjects committed to them; I found the eastern States, notwithstanding their aversion to slavery, were very willing to indulge the southern States, at least with a temporary liberty to prosecute the slave trade, provided the southern States would in their turn gratify them, by laying no restriction on navigation acts; and after a very little time, the committee by a great majority, agreed on a report, by which the general government was to be prohibited from preventing the importation of slaves for a limited time, and the restrictive clause relative to navigation acts was to be omitted.

This report was adopted by a majority of the convention, but not without 2.4.68 considerable opposition.—It was said, that we had but just assumed a place among independent nations, in consequence of our opposition to the attempts of Great-Britain to enslave us; that this opposition was grounded upon the preservation of those rights, to which God and Nature had entitled us, not in particular, but in common with all the rest of mankind—That we had appealed to the Supreme being for his assistance, as the God of freedom, who could not but approve our efforts to preserve the rights which he had thus imparted to his creatures; that now, when we scarcely had risen from our knees, from supplicating his aid and protection—in forming our government over a free people, a government formed pretendedly on the principles of liberty and for its preservation,—in that government to have a provision, not only putting it out of its power to restrain and prevent the slave trade, but even encouraging that most infamous traffic, by giving the States power and influence in the union, in proportion as they cruelly and wantonly sport with the rights of their fellow creatures, ought to be considered as a solemn mockery of, and insult to, that God whose protection we had then implored, and could not fail to hold us up in detestation, and render us contemptible to every true friend of liberty in the world. It was said, it ought to be considered that national crimes can only be, and frequently are, punished in this world by national punishments, and that the continuance of the slave trade, and thus giving it a national sanction and encouragement, ought to be considered as justly exposing us to the displeasure and vengeance of Him, who is equal Lord of all, and who views with equal eye, the poor African slave and his American master!

It was urged, that by this system, we were giving the general government 2.4.69 full and absolute power to regulate commerce, under which general power it would have a right to restrain, or totally prohibit the slave trade: it must therefore, appear to the world absurd and disgraceful to the last degree, that we should except from the exercise of that power, the only branch of commerce which is unjustifiable in its nature, and contrary to the rights of mankind—That on the contrary, we ought rather to prohibit expressly in our constitution, the further importation of slaves; and to authorise the general government from time to time, to make such regulations as should be thought most advantageous for the gradual abolition of slavery, and the emancipation of the slaves which are already in the States.

2.4.70 That slavery is inconsistent with the genius of republicanism, and has a tendency to destroy those principles on which it is supported, as it lessens the sense of the equal rights of mankind, and habituates us to tyranny and oppression. It was further urged, that by this system of government, every State is to be protected both from foreign invasion and from domestic insurrections; that from this consideration, it was of the utmost importance it should have a power to restrain the importation of slaves, since in proportion as the number of slaves were increased in any State, in the same proportion the State is weakened and exposed to foreign invasion, or domestic insurrection, and by so much the less will it be able to protect itself against either; and therefore will by so much the more, want aid from, and be a burthen to, the union. It was further said, that as in this system we were giving the general government a power under the idea of national character, or national interest, to regulate even our weights and measures, and have prohibited all possibility of emitting paper money, and passing instalment laws, &c. It must appear still more extraordinary, that we should prohibit the government from interfering with the slave trade, than which nothing could so materially affect both our national honour and interest.—These reasons influenced me both on the committee and in convention, most decidedly to oppose and vote against the clause, as it now makes a part of the system.

2.4.71 You will perceive, Sir, not only that the general government is prohibited from interfering in the slave trade before the year eighteen hundred and eight, but that there is no provision in the constitution that it shall afterwards be prohibited, nor any security that such prohibition will ever take place; and I think there is great reason to believe, that if the importation of slaves is permitted until the year eighteen hundred and eight, it will not be prohibited afterwards: At this time we do not generally hold this commerce in so great abhorrence as we have done—When our liberties were at stake, we warmly felt for the common rights of men—The danger being thought to be past, which threatened ourselves, we are daily growing more insensible to those rights—In those States who have restrained or prohibited the importation of slaves, it is only done by legislative acts which may be repealed—When those States find that they must in their national character and connexion suffer in the disgrace, and share in the inconveniencies attendant upon that detestable and iniquitous traffic, they may be desirous also to share in the benefits arising from it, and the odium attending it will be greatly effaced by the sanction which is given to it in the general government.

2.4.72 By the next paragraph, the general government is to have a power of suspending the habeas corpus act, in cases of rebellion or invasion.

As the State governments have a power of suspending the habeas corpus act in those cases, it was said, there could be no reason for giving such a power to the general government, since, whenever the State which is invaded, or in which an insurrection takes place, finds its safety requires it, it will make use of that power—And it was urged, that if we gave this power to the general government, it would be an engine of oppression in its hands, since whenever a State should oppose its views, however arbitrary and unconstitutional, and refuse submission to them, the general government may declare it to be an act of rebellion, and suspending the habeas corpus act, may seize upon the persons of those advocates of freedom, who have had virtue and resolution enough to excite the opposition, and may imprison them during its pleasure in the remotest part of the union, so that a citizen of Georgia might be bastiled in the furthest part of New-Hampshire; or a citizen of New-Hampshire in the furthest extreme to the south, cut off from their family, their friends, and their every connexion—These considerations induced me, Sir, to give my negative also to this clause.[25]

In this same section there is a provision that no preference shall be given 2.4.73 to the ports of one State over another, and that vessels bound to or from one State shall not be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another. This provision, as well as that which relates to the uniformity of impost duties and excises, was introduced, Sir, by the delegation of this State.[26]—Without such a provision, it would have been in the power of the general government to have compelled all ships sailing into, or out of the Cheseapeak, to clear and enter at Norfolk, or some port in Virginia—a regulation which would be extremely injurious to our commerce, but which would if considered merely as to the interest of the union, perhaps not be thought unreasonable, since it would render the collection of the revenue arising from commerce more certain and less expensive.

But, Sir, as the system is now reported, the general government have a 2.4.74 power to establish what ports they please in each State, and to ascertain at what ports in every State ships shall clear and enter in such State, a power which may be so used as to destroy the effect of that provision, since by it may be established a port in such a place, as shall be so inconvenient to the State, as to render it more eligible for their shipping to clear and enter in another than in their own State; suppose, for instance, the general government should determine that all ships which cleared or entered in Maryland, should clear and enter at George-Town, on Potowmack, it would oblige all the ships which sailed from, or were bound to, any other port of Maryland, to clear or enter in some port in Virginia. To prevent such a use of the power which the general government now has of limiting the number of ports in a State, and fixing the place or places where they shall be, we endeavoured to obtain a provision, that the general government should only, in the first instance, have authority to ascertain the number of ports proper to be established in each State, and transmit information thereof to the several States, the legislatures of which, respectively, should have the power to fix the places where those ports should be, according to their idea of what would be most advantageous to the commerce of their State, and most for the ease and convenience of their citizens; and that the general government should not interfere in the establishment of the places, unless the legislature of the State should neglect or refuse so to do; but we could not obtain this alteration.[27]

2.4.75 By the tenth section every State is prohibited from emitting bills of credit—As it was reported by the committee of detail, the States were only prohibited from emitting them without the consent of Congress; but the convention was so smitten with the paper money dread, that they insisted the prohibition should be absolute. It was my opinion, Sir, that the States ought not not to be totally deprived of the right to emit bills of credit, and that as we had not given an authority to the general government for that purpose, it was the more necessary to retain it in the States—I considered that this State, and some others, have formerly received great benefit from paper emissions, and that if public and private credit should once more be restored, such emissions may hereafter be equally advantageous; and further, that it is impossible to foresee that events may not take place which shall render paper money of absolute necessity; and it was my opinion, if this power was not to be exercised by a State without the permission of the general government, it ought to be satisfactory even to those who were the most haunted by the apprehensions of paper money; I therefore, thought it my duty to vote against this part of the system.[28]

2.4.76 The same section also, puts it out of the power of the States, to make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts, or to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts.

2.4.77 I considered, Sir, that there might be times of such great public calamities and distress, and of such extreme scarcity of specie as should render it the duty of a government, for the preservation of even the most valuable part of its citizens in some measure to interfere in their favour, by passing laws totally or partially stopping the courts of justice, or authorising the debtor to pay by instalments, or by delivering up his property to his creditors at a reasonable and honest valuation. The times have been such as to render regulations of this kind necessary in most, or all of the States, to prevent the wealthy creditor and the monied man from totally destroying the poor though even industrious debtor—Such times may again arrive. I therefore, voted against depriving the States of this power, a power which I am decided they ought to possess, but which I admit ought only to be exercised on very important and urgent occasions.[29] I apprehend, Sir, the principal cause of complaint among the people at large is, the public and private debt with which they are oppressed, and which, in the present scarcity of cash, threatens them with destruction, unless they can obtain so much indulgence in point of time that by industry and frugality they may extricate themselves.

This government proposed, I apprehend, so far from removing will greatly encrease those complaints, since grasping in its all powerful hand the citizens of the respective States, it will by the imposition of the variety of taxes, imposts, stamps, excises, and other duties, squeeze from them the little money they may acquire, the hard earnings of their industry, as you would squeeze the juice from an orange, till not a drop more can be extracted, and then let loose upon them their private creditors, to whose mercy it consigns them, by whom their property is to be seized upon and sold in this scarcity of specie at a sheriff's sale, where nothing but ready cash can be received, for a tenth part of its value, and themselves and their families to be consigned to indigence and distress, without their governments having a power to give them a moment's indulgence, however necessary it might be, and however desirous to grant them aid. 2.4.78

By this same section, every State is also prohibited from laying any imposts, or duties on imports or exports, without the permission of the general government. It was urged, that as almost all sources of taxation were given to Congress, it would be but reasonable to leave the States the power of bringing revenue into their treasuries, by laying a duty on exports, if they should think proper, which might be so light as not to injure or discourage industry, and yet might be productive of considerable revenue—Also, that there might be cases in which it would be proper, for the purpose of encouraging manufactures, to lay duties to prohibit the exportation of raw materials, and even in addition to the duties laid by Congress on imports for the sake of revenue, to lay a duty to discourage the importation of particular articles into a State, or to enable the manufacturer here to supply us on as good terms as they could be obtained from a foreign market; however, the most we could obtain was, that this power might be exercised by the States with, and only with the consent of Congress, and subject to its controul—And so anxious were they to seize on every shilling of our money for the general government, that they insisted even the little revenue that might thus arise, should not be appropriated to the use of the respective States where it was collected, but should be paid into the treasury of the United States; and accordingly it is so determined. 2.4.79

The second article relates to the executive—his mode of election—his powers—and the length of time he should continue in office. 2.4.80

On these subjects there was a great diversity of sentiment; many of the members were desirous that the President should be elected for seven years, and not to be eligible a second time; others proposed that he should not be absolutely ineligible, but that he should not be capable of being chosen a second time, until the expiration of a certain number of years—The sup- 2.4.81 porter of the above propositions, went upon the idea that the best security for liberty was a limited duration and a rotation of office in the chief executive department.

2.4.82 There was a party who attempted to have the President appointed during good behaviour, without any limitation as to time, and not being able to succeed in that attempt, they then endeavoured to have him re-eligible without any restraint. It was objected that the choice of a President to continue in office during good behaviour, would be at once rendering our system an elective monarchy; and, that if the President was to be re-eligible without any interval of disqualification, it would amount nearly to the same thing, since with the powers that the President is to enjoy, and the interest and influence with which they will be attended, he will be almost absolutely certain of being re-elected from time to time, as long as he lives: As the propositions were reported by the committee of the whole house, the President was to be chosen for seven years, and not to be eligible at any time after—In the same manner the proposition was agreed to in convention, and so was it reported by the committee of detail, although a variety of attempts were made to alter that part of the system by those who were of a contrary opinion, in which they repeatedly failed; but, Sir, by never losing sight of their object, and choosing a proper time for their purpose, they succeeded at length in obtaining the alteration, which was not made until within the last twelve days before the convention adjourned.[30]

2.4.83 As the propositions were agreed to by the committee of the whole house, the President was to be appointed by the national legislature, and as it was reported by the committee of detail, the choice was to be made by ballot, in such a manner, that the States should have an equal voice in the appointment of this officer, as they, of right, ought to have; but those who wished as far as possible to establish a national instead of a federal government, made repeated attempts to have the President chosen by the people at large; on this the sense of the convention was taken, I think not less than three times while I was there, and as often rejected; but within the last fortnight of their session, they obtained the alteration in the manner it now stands, by which the large States have a very undue influence in the appointment of the President. There is no case where the States will have an equal voice in the appointment of the President, except where two persons shall have an equal number of votes, and those a majority of the whole number of electors, a case very unlikely to happen, or where no person has a majority of the votes; in these instances the house of representatives are to choose by ballot, each State having an equal voice, but they are confined in the last instance to the five who have the greatest number of votes, which gives the largest States a very unequal chance of having the President chose under their nomination.

2.4.84 As to the Vice-President, that great officer of government, who is in case of death, resignation, removal, or inability of the President, to supply his place, and be vested with his powers, and who is officially to be the President of the senate, there is no provision by which a majority of the voices of the electors are necessary for his appointment, but after it is decided who is chosen President, that person who has the next greatest number of votes of the electors, is declared to be legally elected to the vice-presidency, so that by this system it is very possible, and not improbable, that he may be appointed by the electors of a single large State; and a very undue influence in the senate is given to that State of which the Vice-President is a citizen, since in every question where the senate is divided that State will have two votes, the President having on those occasions a casting voice. Every part of the system which relates to the vice-president, as well as the present mode of electing the President, was introduced and agreed upon after I left Philadelphia.[31]

Objections were made to that part of this article, by which the President is appointed commander in chief of the army and navy of the United States, and of the militia of the several States, and it was wished to be so far restrained, that he should not command in person; but this could not be obtained.[32] The power given to the President of granting reprieves and pardons, was also thought extremely dangerous, and as such opposed—The President thereby has the power of pardoning those who are guilty of treason, as well as of other offences; it was said that no treason was so likely to take place as that in which the President himself might be engaged—The attempt to assume to himself powers not given by the constitution, and establish himself in regal authority; in which attempt a provision is made for him to secure from punishment the creatures of his ambition, the associates and abettors of his treasonable practices, by granting them pardons should they be defeated in their attempts to subvert the constitution. 2.4.85

To that part of this article also, which gives the President a right to nominate, and with the consent of the senate to appoint all the officers, civil and military, of the United States, there were considerable opposition—it was said that the person who nominates, will always in reality appoint, and that this was giving the President a power and influence, which together with the other powers, bestowed upon him, would place him above all restraint or controul. In fine, it was urged, that the President as here constituted, was a KING, in every thing but the name; that though he was to be chosen for a limited time, yet at the expiration of that time if he is not re-elected, it will depend entirely upon his own moderation whether he will resign that authority with which he has once been invested—that from his having the appointment of all the variety of officers in every part of the civil department for the union, who will be very numerous—in them and their connexions, relations, friends and dependants, he will have a formidable host devoted to his interest, and ready to support his ambitious views. That the army and navy, which may be encreased without restraint as to numbers, the officers of which, from the highest to the lowest, are all to be 2.4.86 appointed by him, and dependant on his will and pleasure, and commanded by him in person, will, of course, be subservient to his wishes, and ready to execute his commands; in addition to which, the militia also are entirely subjected to his orders—That these circumstances, combined together, will enable him, when he pleases, to become a King in name, as well as in substance, and establish himself in office not only for his own life, but even if he chooses, to have that authority perpetuated to his family.

2.4.87 It was further observed, that the only appearance of responsibility in the President, which the system holds up to our view, is the provision for impeachment; but that when we reflect that he cannot be impeached but by the house of delegates, and that the members of this house are rendered dependant upon, and unduly under the influence of the President, by being appointable to offices of which he has the sole nomination, so that without his favour and approbation, they cannot obtain them, there is little reason to believe, that a majority will ever concur in impeaching the President, let his conduct be ever so reprehensible, especially too, as the final event of that impeachment will depend upon a different body, and the members of the house of delegates will be certain, should the decision be ultimately in favour of the President, to become thereby the objects of his displeasure, and to bar to themselves every avenue to the emoluments of government.

2.4.88 Should he, contrary to probability, be impeached, he is afterwards to be tried and adjudged by the senate, and without the concurrence of two-thirds of the members who shall be present, he cannot be convicted—This senate being constituted a privy council to the President, it is probable many of its leading and influential members may have advised or concurred in the very measures for which he may be impeached; the members of the Senate also are by the system, placed as unduly under the influence of, and dependant upon the President, as the members of the other branch, since they also are appointable to offices, and cannot obtain them but through the favour of the President—There will be great, important and valuable offices under this government, should it take place, more than sufficient to enable him to hold out the expectation of one of them to each of the senators—Under these circumstances, will any person conceive it to be difficult for the President always to secure to himself more than one-third of that body? Or, can it reasonably be believed, that a criminal will be convicted, who is constitutionally empowered to bribe his judges, at the head of whom is to preside on those occasions the chief Justice. Which officer in his original appointment, must be nominated by the President, and will therefore, probably, be appointed so much for his eminence in legal knowledge and for his integrity, as from favouritism and influence, since the President knowing that in case of impeachment the chief Justice is to preside at his trial, will naturally wish to fill that office with a person of whose voice and influence he shall consider himself secure. These are reasons to induce a belief, that there will be but little probability of the President ever being either impeached or convicted; but it was also urged, that vested with the powers which the system gives him, and with the influence attendant upon those powers, to him it would be of little consequence whether he was impeached or convicted, since he will be able to set both at defiance. These considerations occasioned a part of the convention to give a negative to this part of the system establishing the executive as it is now offered for our acceptance.

2.4.89 By the third article, the judicial power of the United States is vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts, as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish: These courts, and these only, will have a right to decide upon the laws of the United States, and all questions arising upon their construction, and in a judicial manner to carry those laws into execution; to which the courts both superior and inferior of the respective States and their judges and other magistrates are rendered incompetent.[33] To the courts of the general government are also confined all cases in law or equity, arising under the proposed constitution, and treaties made under the authority of the United States—all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls—all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction—all controversies to which the United States are a party—all controversies between two or more States—between a State and citizens of another State—between citizens of the same State, claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens, or subjects. Whether therefore, any laws or regulations of the Congress, or any acts of its President or other officers are contrary to, or not warranted by the constitution, rests only with the judges, who are appointed by Congress to determine; by whose determinations every State must be bound. Should any question arise between a foreign consul and any of the citizens of the United States, however remote from the seat of empire, it is to be heard before the judiciary of the general government, and in the first instance to be heard in the supreme court, however inconvenient to the parties, and however trifling the subject of dispute.

2.4.90 Should the mariners of an American or foreign vessel, while in any American port, have occasion to sue for their wages, or in any other instance a controversy belonging to the admiralty jurisdiction should take place between them and their masters or owners, it is in the courts of the general government the suit must be instituted; and either party may carry it by appeal to its supreme court; the injury to commerce and the oppression to individuals which may thence arise need not be enlarged upon. Should a citizen of Virginia, Pennsylvania, or any other of the United States be indebted to, or have debts due from, a citizen of this State, or any other claim be subsisting on one side or the other, in consequence of commercial or other transactions, it is only in the courts of Congress that either can apply for redress. The case is the same should any claim subsist between citizens of this State and foreigners, merchants, mariners, and others, whether of a commercial or of any other nature, they must be prosecuted in the same courts; and though in the first instance they may be brought in the inferior, yet an appeal may be made to the supreme judiciary, even from the remotest State in the union.

2.4.91 The inquiry concerning, and trial of every offence against, and breach of the laws of Congress, are also confined to its courts; the same courts also have the sole right to inquire concerning and try every offence, from the lowest to the highest, committed by the citizens of any other State, or of a foreign nation, against the laws of this State within its territory—and in all these cases the decision may be ultimately brought before the supreme tribunal, since the appellate jurisdiction extends to criminal as well as to civil cases.

2.4.92 And in all those cases where the general government has jurisdiction in civil questions, the proposed constitution not only makes no provision for the trial by jury in the first instance, but by its appellate jurisdiction absolutely takes away that inestimable privilege, since it expressly declares the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact.—Should therefore, a jury be adopted in the inferior court, it would only be a needless expence, since on an appeal the determination of that jury, even on questions of fact, however honest and upright, is to be of no possible effect—the supreme court is to take up all questions of fact—to examine the evidence relative thereto—to decide upon them in the same manner as if they had never been tried by a jury—nor is trial by jury secured in criminal cases; it is true, that in the first instance, in the inferior court the trial is to be by jury, in this and in this only, is the difference between criminal and civil cases; but, Sir, the appellate jurisdiction extends, as I have observed, to cases criminal as well as to civil, and on the appeal the court is to decide not only on the law but on the fact, if, therefore, even in criminal cases the general government is not satisfied with the verdict of the jury, its officer may remove the prosecution to the supreme court, and there the verdict of the jury is to be of no effect, but the judges of this court are to decide upon the fact as well as the law, the same as in civil cases.[34]

2.4.93 Thus, Sir, jury trials, which have ever been the boast of the English constitution, which have been by our several State constitutions so cautiously secured to us—jury trials which have so long been considered the surest barrier against arbitrary power, and the palladium of liberty,—with the loss of which the loss of our freedom may be dated, are taken away by the proposed form of government, not only in a great variety of questions between individual and individual, but in every case whether civil or criminal arising under the laws of the United States, or the execution of those laws.—It is taken away in those very cases where of all others it is most essential for our liberty, to have it sacredly guarded and preserved, in every case, whether civil or criminal, between government and its officers on the one part, and the subject or citizen on the other.—Nor was this the effect of inattention, nor did it arise from any real difficulty in establishing and securing jury trials by the proposed constitution, if the convention had wished so to do: but the same reason influenced here as in the case of the establishment of inferior courts; as they could not trust State Judges, so would they not confide in State juries.—They alledged that the general government and the State governments would always be at variance; that the citizens of the different States would enter into the views and interests of their respective States, and therefore ought not to be trusted in determining causes in which the general government was any way interested, without giving the general government an opportunity, if it disapproved the verdict of the jury, to appeal, and to have the facts examined into again and decided upon by its own judges, on whom it was thought a reliance might be had by the general government, they being appointed under its authority.

Thus, Sir, in consequence of this appellate jurisdiction and its extension 2.4.94 to facts as well as to law, every arbitrary act of the general government, and every oppression of all those variety of officers appointed under its authority for the collection of taxes, duties, impost, excise, and other purposes, must be submitted to by the individual, or must be opposed with little prospect of success, and almost a certain prospect of ruin, at least in those cases where the middle and common class of citizens are interested: Since to avoid that oppression, or to obtain redress, the application must be made to one of the courts of the United States—by good fortune should this application be in the first instance attended with success, and should damages be recovered equivalent to the injury sustained, an appeal lies to the supreme court, in which case the citizen must at once give up his cause, or he must attend to it at the distance of perhaps more than a thousand miles from the place of his residence, and must take measures to procure before that court on the appeal all the evidence necessary to support his action, which even if ultimately prosperous must be attended with a loss of time, a neglect of business, and an expence which will be greater than the original grievance, and to which men in moderate circumstances would be utterly unequal.

By the third section of this article, it is declared, that treason against the 2.4.95
United States, shall consist in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid or comfort.

By the principles of the American revolution, arbitrary power may and 2.4.96 ought to be resisted even by arms if necessary—The time may come when it shall be the duty of a State, in order to preserve itself from the oppression of the general government, to have recourse to the sword—In which case the proposed form of government declares, that the State and every of its citizens who act under its authority are guilty of a direct act of treason; reducing by this provision the different States to this alternative, that they must tamely and passively yield to despotism, or their citizens must oppose it at the hazard of the halter if unsuccessful—and reducing the citizens of the

State which shall take arms, to a situation in which they must be exposed to punishment, let them act as they will, since if they obey the authority of their State government, they will be guilty of treason against the United States—if they join the general government they will be guilty of treason against their own State.

2.4.97 To save the citizens of the respective States from this disagreeable dilemma, and to secure them from being punishable as traitors to the United States, when acting expressly in obedience to the authority of their own State, I wished to have obtained as an amendment to the third section of this article the following clause: "Provided that no act or acts done by one or more of the States against the United States, or by any citizen of any one of the United States under the authority of one or more of the said States, shall be deemed treason, or punished as such; but in case of war being levied by one or more of the States against the United States, the conduct of each party towards the other, and their adherents respectively, shall be regulated by the laws of war and of nations."[35]

2.4.98 But this provision was not adopted, being too much opposed to the great object of many of the leading members of the convention, which was by all means to leave the States at the mercy of the general government, since they could not succeed in their immediate and entire abolition.

2.4.99 By the third section of the fourth article, no new State shall be formed or erected within the jurisdiction or any other State, without the consent of the legislature of such State.[36]

2.4.100 There are a number of States which are so circumstanced, with respect to themselves and to the other States, that every principle of justice and sound policy require their dismemberment or division into smaller States.—Massachusetts is divided into two districts, totally separated from each other by the State of New-Hampshire, on the north-east side of which lies the provinces of Main and Sagadohock, more extensive in point of territory, but less populous than old Massachusetts, which lies on the other side of New-Hampshire.: No person can cast their eye on the map of that State but they must in a moment admit, that every argument drawn from convenience, interest, and justice require that the provinces of Main and Sagadohock should be erected into a new State, and that they should not be compelled to remain connected with old Massachusetts under all the inconveniences of their situation.

2.4.101 The State of Georgia is larger in extent than the whole island of Great-Britain, extending from its sea coast to the Missisippi, a distance of eight hundred miles or more; its breadth for the most part, about three hundred miles. The States of North-Carolina and Virginia in the same manner reach from the sea coast unto the Missisippi.

2.4.102 The hardship, the inconvenience, and the injustice of compelling the inhabitants of those States who may dwell on the western side of the mountains and along the Ohio and Missisippi rivers to remain connected with the inhabitants of those States respectively, on the atlantic side of the mountains, and subject to the same State governments, would be such, as would in my opinion, justify even recourse to arms, to free themselves from, and to shake off, so ignominous a yoke.

This representation was made in convention, and it was further urged, 2.4.103 that the territory of these States were too large, and that the inhabitants thereof would be too much disconnected for a republican government to extend to them its benefits, which is only suited to a small and compact territory: That a regard also for the peace and safety of the union, ought to excite a desire that those States should become in time divided into separate States, since when their population should become proportioned in any degree to their territory, they would from their strength and power become dangerous members of a federal government. It was further said, that if the general government was not by its constitution to interfere, the inconvenience would soon remedy itself, for that as the population increased in those States, their legislatures would be obliged to consent to the erection of new States to avoid the evils of a civil war; but as by the proposed constitution the general government is obliged to protect each State against domestic violence, and consequently will be obliged to assist in suppressing such commotions and insurrections as may take place from the struggle to have new States erected, the general government ought to have a power to decide upon the propriety and necessity of establishing or erecting a new State, even without the approbation of the legislature of such States, within whose jurisdiction the new State should be erected, and for this purpose I submitted to the convention the following proposition;—"That on the application of the inhabitants of any district of territory within the limits of any of the States, it shall be lawful for the legislature of the United States, if they shall under all circumstances think it reasonable, to erect the same into a new State, and admit it into the union without the consent of the State of which the said district may be a part."[37] And it was said, that we surely might trust the general government with this power with more propriety than with many others with which they were proposed to be entrusted—and that as the general government was bound to suppress all insurrections and commotions which might arise on this subject, it ought to be in the power of the general government to decide upon it, and not in the power of the legislature of a single State, by obstinately and unreasonably opposing the erection of a new State to prevent its taking effect, and thereby extremely to oppress that part of its citizens which live remote from, and inconvenient to, the seat of its government, and even to involve the union in war to support its injustice and oppression.—But, upon the vote being taken, Georgia, South-Carolina, North-Carolina, Virginia, Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, were in the negative. New-Hampshire, Connecticut, Jersey, Delaware and Maryland, were in the affirmative. New-York was absent.[38]

That it was inconsistent with the rights of free and independent States, to 2.4.104 have their territory dismembered without their consent, was the principle argument used by the opponents of this proposition. The truth of the objection we readily admitted, but at the same time, insisted that it was not more inconsistent with the rights of free and independent States than that inequality of suffrage and power which the large States had extorted from the others; and that if the smaller States yielded up their rights in that instance, they were entitled to demand from the States of extensive territory a surrender of their rights in this instance; and in a particular manner, as it was equally necessary for the true interest and happiness of the citizens of their own States, as of the Union. But, Sir, although when the large States demanded undue and improper sacrifices to be made to their pride and ambition, they treated the rights of free States with more contempt than ever a British Parliament treated the rights of her colonial establishments, yet when a reasonable and necessary sacrifice was asked from them they spurned the idea with ineffable disdain. They then perfectly understood the full value and the sacred obligation of State rights, and at the least attempt to infringe them where they were concerned, they were tremblingly alive and agonized at every pore.

2.4.105 When we reflect how obstinately those States contended for that unjust superiority of power in the government, which they have in part obtained, and for the establishment of this superiority by the constitution. When we reflect that they appeared willing to hazard the existence of the union rather than not to succeed in their unjust attempt—That should their legislatures consent to the erection of new States within their jurisdiction, it would be an immediate sacrifice of that power, to obtain which they appeared disposed to sacrifice every other consideration.

2.4.106 When we further reflect that they now have a motive for desiring to preserve their territory entire and unbroken, which they never had before—the gratification of their ambition in possessing and exercising superior power over their sister States—and that this constitution is to give them the means to effect this desire of which they were formerly destitute—the whole force of the United States pledged to them for restraining intestine commotions, and preserving to them the obedience and subjection of their citizens, even in the extremest part of their territory:—I say, Sir, when we consider these things, it would be too absurd and improbable to deserve a serious answer, should any person suggest that these States mean ever to give their consent to the erection of new States within their territory: Some of them it is true, have been for some time past amusing their inhabitants in those districts that wished to be erected into new States, but should this constitution be adopted, armed with a sword and halter to compel their obedience and subjection, they will no longer act with indecision; and the State of Maryland may, and probably will be called upon to assist with her wealth and her blood in subduing the inhabitants of Franklin, Kentucky, Vermont, and the provinces of Main and Sagadohock, and in compelling them to continue in subjection to the States which respectively claim jurisdiction over them.

2.4.107 Let it not be forgotten at the same time, that a great part of the territory of these large and extensive States, which they now hold in possession, and over which they now claim and exercise jurisdiction, were crown lands, unlocated and unsettled when the American revolution took place—Lands which were acquired by the common blood and treasure, and which ought to have been the common stock, and for the common benefit of the Union. Let it be remembered that the State of Maryland was so deeply sensible of the injustice that these lands should be held by particular States for their own emolument, even at a time when no superiority of authority or power was annexed to extensive territory, that in the midst of the late war and all the dangers which threatened us, it withheld for a long time its assent to the articles of confederation for that reason, and when it ratified those articles it entered a solemn protest against what it considered so flagrant injustice:— But, Sir, the question is not now whether those States shall hold that territory unjustly to themselves, but whether by that act of injustice they shall have superiority of power and influence over the other States, and have a constitutional right to domineer and lord it over them—Nay, more, whether we will agree to a form of government by which we pledge to those States the whole force of the union to preserve to them that extensive territory entire and unbroken, and with our blood and wealth to assist them, whenever they please to demand it, to preserve the inhabitants thereof under their subjection, for the purpose of encreasing their superiority over us—of gratifying their unjust ambition—in a word, for the purpose of giving ourselves masters, and of rivetting our chains!

2.4.108 The part of the system, which provides that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States, was adopted by a great majority of the convention, and without much debate,—however, there were some members so unfashionable as to think that a belief of the existence of a Deity, and of a state of future rewards and punishments would be some security for the good conduct of our rulers, and that in a Christian country it would be at least decent to hold out some distinction between the professors of Christianity and downright infidelity or paganism.

2.4.109 The seventh article declares, that the ratification of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this constitution between the States ratifying the same.

2.4.110 It was attempted to obtain a resolve that if seven States, whose votes in the first branch should amount to a majority of the representation in that branch, concurred in the adoption of the system, it should be sufficient, and this attempt was supported on the principle, that a majority ought to govern the minority;[39]—but to this it was objected, that although it was true, after a constitution and form of government is agreed on, in every act done under and consistent with that constitution and form of government, the act of the majority, unless otherwise agreed in the constitution, should bind the minority, yet it was directly the reverse in originally forming a constitution, or dissolving it—That in originally forming a constitution, it was necessary that every individual should agree to it to become bound thereby—and that when once adopted it could not be dissolved by consent, unless with the consent of every individual who was party to the original agreement—That in forming our original federal government every member of that government, that is each State, expressly consented to it; that it is a part of the compact made and entered into in the most solemn manner, that there should be no dissolution or alteration of that federal government without the consent of every State, the members of, and parties to the original compact; that therefore no alteration could be made by a consent of a part of these States, or by the consent of the inhabitants of a part of the States, which could either release the States so consenting, from the obligation they are under to the other States, or which could in any manner become obligatory upon those States that should not ratify such alterations. Satisfied of the truth of these positions, and not holding ourselves at liberty to violate the compact, which this state had solemnly entered into with the others, by altering it in a different manner from that which by the same compact is provided and stipulated, a number of the members and among those the delegation of this State opposed the ratification of this system in any other manner than by the unanimous consent and agreement of all the States.

2.4.111 By our original articles of confederation any alterations proposed, are in the first place to be approved by Congress.—Accordingly as the resolutions were originally adopted by the convention, and as they were reported by the committee of detail, it was proposed that this system should be laid before Congress for their approbation; but, Sir, the warm advocates of this system fearing it would not meet with the approbation of Congress, and determined, even though Congress and the respective State legislatures should disapprove the same, to force it upon them, if possible, through the intervention of the people at large, moved to strike out the words "for their approbation" and succeeded in their motion; to which, it being directly in violation of the mode prescribed by the articles of confederation for the alteration of our federal government, a part of the convention, and myself in the number, thought it a duty to give a decided negative.[40]

2.4.112 Agreeable to the articles of confederation entered into in the most solemn manner, and for the observance of which the States pledged themselves to each other, and called upon the Supreme Being as a witness and avenger between them, no alterations are to be made in those articles unless after they are approved by Congress, they are agreed to and ratified by the legislature of every State; but by the resolve of the convention this constitution is not to be ratified by the legislatures of the respective States, but is to be submitted to conventions chosen by the people, and if ratified by them is to be binding.

This resolve was opposed among others by the delegation of 2.4.113
Maryland;—your delegates were of opinion, that as the form of government proposed was, if adopted, most essentially to alter the constitution of this State, and as our constitution had pointed out a mode by which, and by which only, alterations were to be made therein, a convention of the people could not be called to agree to and ratify the said form of government without a direct violation of our constitution, which it is the duty of every individual in this State to protect and support;—In this opinion all your delegates who were attending were unanimous; I, Sir, opposed it also upon a more extensive ground, as being directly contrary to the mode of altering our federal government established in our original compact, and as such being a direct violation of the mutual faith plighted by the States to each other, I gave it my negative.[41]

I also was of opinion, that the States considered as States, in their politi- 2.4.114 cal capacity, are the members of a federal government; that the States in their political capacity, or as Sovereignties, are entitled, and only entitled originally to agree upon the form of, and submit themselves to, a federal government, and afterwards by mutual consent to dissolve or alter it—That every thing which relates to the formation, the dissolution or the alteration of a federal government over States equally free, sovereign and independent is the peculiar province of the States in their sovereign or political capacity, in the same manner as what relates to forming alliance or treaties of peace, amity or commerce, and that the people at large in their individual capacity, have no more right to interfere in the one case than in the other:[42] That according to these principles we originally acted in forming our confederation; it was the States as States, by their representatives in Congress, that formed the articles of confederation; it was the States as States, by their legislatures, ratified those articles, and it was there established and provided that the States as States, that is by their legislatures, should agree to any alterations that should hereafter be proposed in the federal government, before they should be binding—and any alterations agreed to in any other manner cannot release the States from the obligation they are under to each other by virtue of the original articles of confederation. The people of the different States never made any objection to the manner the articles of confederation were formed or ratified, or to the mode by which alterations were to be made in that government—with the rights of their respective States they wished not to interfere—Nor do I believe the people in their individual capacity, would ever have expected or desired to have been appealed to on the present occasion, in violation of the rights of their respective States, if the favourers of the proposed constitution, imagining they had a better chance of forcing it to be adopted by a hasty appeal to the people at large, who could not be so good judges of the dangerous consequence, had not insisted upon this mode—nor do these positions in the least interfere with the principle, that all power originates from the people, because when once the people have exercised their power in establishing and forming themselves into a State government, it never devolves back to them, nor have they a right to resume or again to exercise that power until such events takes place as will amount to a dissolution of their State government:—And it is an established principle that a dissolution or alteration of a federal government doth not dissolve the State governments which compose it. It was also my opinion, that upon principles of sound policy, the agreement or disagreement to the proposed system ought to have been by the State legislatures, in which case, let the event have been what it would, there would have been but little prospects of the public peace being disturbed thereby—Whereas the attempt to force down this system, although Congress and the respective State legislatures should disapprove, by appealing to the people, and to procure its establishment in a manner totally unconstitutional, has a tendency to set the State governments and their subjects at variance with each other—to lessen the obligations of government—to weaken the bands of society—to introduce anarchy and confusion—And to light the torch of discord and civil war throughout this continent. All these considerations weighed with me most forcibly against giving my assent to the mode by which it is resolved this system is to be ratified, and were urged by me in opposition to the measure.[43]

2.4.115 I have now, Sir, in discharge of the duty I owe to this house, given such information as hath occured to me, which I consider most material for them to know; and you will easily perceive from this detail that a great portion of that time, which ought to have been devoted calmly and impartially to consider what alterations in our federal government would be most likely to procure and preserve the happiness of the union, was employed in a violent struggle on the one side to obtain all power and dominion in their own hands, and on the other to prevent it; and that the aggrandizement of particular States and particular individuals appears to have been much more the object sought after, than the welfare of our country.

2.4.116 The interest of this State, not confined merely to itself, abstracted from all others, but considered relatively; as far as was consistent with the common interest of the other States, I thought it my duty to pursue according to the best opinion I could form of it.

2.4.117 When I took my seat in the convention, I found them attempting to bring forward a system, which I was sure never had entered into the contemplation of those I had the honor to represent, and which upon the fullest consideration, I considered not only injurious to the interest and the rights of this State, but also incompatible with the political happiness and freedom of the States in general; from that time until my business compelled me to leave the convention, I gave it every possible opposition in every stage of its progression. I opposed the system there with the same explicit frankness with which I have here given you a history of our proceedings, and an account of my own conduct, which in a particular manner I consider you as having a right to know—While there, I endeavoured to act as became a free man, and the delegate of a free State. Should my conduct obtain the approbation of those who appointed me, I will not deny it would afford me satisfaction; but to me that approbation was at most no more than a secondary consideration—my first was to deserve it;—left to myself to act according to the best of my discretion, my conduct should have been the same, had I been even sure your censure would have been my only reward, since I hold it sacredly my duty to dash the cup of poison, if possible, from the hand of a State, or an individual, however anxious the one or the other might be to swallow it.

Indulge me, Sir, in a single observation further:—There are persons who 2.4.118 endeavour to hold up the idea that this system is only opposed by the officers of government;[44] I, Sir, am in that predicament, I have the honor to hold an appointment in this State. Had it been considered any objection, I presume I should not have been appointed to the convention; if it could have any effect on my mind, it would only be that of warming my heart with gratitude, and rendering me more anxious to promote the true interest of that State, which has conferred on me the obligation, and to heighten my guilt had I joined in sacrificing its essential rights: But, Sir, it would be well to remember, that this system is not calculated to diminish the number or the value of offices; on the contrary, if adopted, it will be productive of an enormous encrease in their number; many of them will be also of great honor and emoluments. Whether, Sir, in this variety of appointments, and in the scramble for them, I might not have as good a prospect to advantage myself as many others, is not for me to say; but this, Sir, I can say with truth, that so far was I from being influenced in my conduct by interest, or the consideration of office, that I would cheerfully resign the appointment I now hold, I would bind myself never to accept another, either under the general government or that of my own State: I would do more, Sir, so destructive do I consider the present system to the happiness of my country, I would cheerfully sacrifice that share of property with which Heaven has blessed a life of industry,—I would reduce myself to indigence and poverty, and those who are dearer to me than my own existence I would entrust to the care and protection of that Providence who hath so kindly protected myself, if on those terms only I could procure my country to reject those chains which are forged for it.[45]

1. See A Landholder, Ford, Essays 185–86, and generally Martin's defense of his conduct in letters to the Maryland Journal in March and April 1788, Ford, Essays 339–83.

2. Farrand I, 20–22 (29 May). Martin took his seat in the Convention on 9 June, was absent between 7 and 12 August, and left the Convention on 4 September. Farrand III, 589.

3. See Farrand I, 235–37 (13 June).

4. The Jersey proposals were rejected on 19 June. The debate on the seventh resolution, of which Martin gives an account here, occurred on 27–29 June. Farrand I, 436–79. The "warm and decided opposition" to the Virginia proposals was provided preeminently by Martin's own speech extending over two days. On Martin's part in these proceedings, see his and Gerry's exchange with Oliver Ellsworth, Ford, Essays 130, 183, 356–57.

5. Cf. James Wilson's important speech of 8 June where he says, inter alia, "Federal liberty is to states, what civil liberty, is to private individuals." Farrand I, 166. For similar Federalist views see McMaster and Stone 189 (Plain Truth); Ford, Pamphlets 38, 55 (A Citizen of America), 176–79 (Fabius), 251–52 (Aristides), 373 (Ramsay); Carlisle Gazette 24 October 1787 (A Citizen). The concession is as problematic for the Federalists as it is widespread. See Herbert J. Storing, "The 'Other' Federalist Papers," Political Science Reviewer Fall 1976.

6. Farrand I, 468 (29 June).

7. The delegate referred to is Abraham Baldwin. This vote was taken on 2 July. Farrand I, 510.

8. Farrand II, 115 (25 July).

9. John Adams, Defence of the Constitutions of Government of the United States of America (1786–87) I, letter 53 (John Adams, Works IV, 579–80). In his compilation of his grandfather's works, Charles Francis Adams corrected numerous errors in the Defence and changed what he regarded as "the original, unmeaning, and arbitrary division of the subject into letters addressed to a friend" to "a more natural one of chapters, embracing the whole or a certain portion of some one topic." Ibid., p. 275. The mode of citation adopted here preserves reference to the "letters" of the early editions, while providing a specific citation to the Defence as printed in the Works.

10. Martin's meaning here is obscure. Elliot makes it read, "Seventy years are esteemed for the life of a man . . ." (Elliot I, 361), but this makes little sense.

11. Farrand I, 33–35 (30 May); 335–36 (20 June). Regarding the first of these, Martin probably refers to the proposal by Read for a general statement of intention more in line with the principles of the Articles of Confederation, although Martin's language is taken from the nationalists' proposal rather than from Read's.

12. In a reply to A Landholder, Martin says that he has been unable to discover anywhere anything "to warrant or countenance the motley mixture of the system proposed: a system which is an innovation in government of the most extraordinary kind; a system neither wholly federal, nor wholly national—but a strange hotch-potch of both—just so much federal in appearance as to give its advocates in some measure, an opportunity of passing it as such upon the unsuspecting multitude, before they had time and opportunity to examine it, and yet so predominantly national as to put it in the power of its movers, whenever the machine shall be set agoing, to strike out every part that has the appearance of being federal, and to render it wholly and entirely a national government. . . ." Luther Martin letter, Maryland Journal 21 March 1788; Ford, Essays 367–68. On the confusion of names see Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.72; I, 2.8.10 and n. 9; None of the Well Born Conspirators 3.15.1–2; Columbian Patriot 4.28.4; [Maryland] Farmer 5.1.50; Impartial Examiner 5.14.25–26; Countryman 6.7.4; Smith 6.12.5.

13. See Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws IX, ch. 1; Richard Price, Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty . . . (London and Philadelphia, 1776) sec. 2. For other Anti-Federalist arguments in defense of the small republic, see references in Cato II, 2.6.10–21 and n. 8.

14. See Farrand I, 561 (9 July), 580–88 (11 July); Farrand II, 219–22 (8 August).

15. Elbridge Gerry. Cf. Farrand II, 205–6, 208 (11 June).

16. Such a disproportion was noted, though the other reports of the deliberations do not contain the suggestion that the representation of the larger states was artfully lessened for this reason. See Farrand I, 559–61 (9 July), 566–68 (10 July), 601 (13 July).

17. Farrand II, 217 (12 June), 375–77 (22 June), 386–90 (23 June); Farrand II, 283–90 (14 August), 484 (1 September), 489–92 (3 September).

18. Martin raised a question about this matter on 16 August, but there is no record of any such proposal or reply to it. See Farrand II, 305.

19. Farrand II, 359 (21 August).

20. Farrand II, 308–10 (16 August).

21. This is not a new paragraph in the original.

22. Farrand II, 330 (18 August).

23. Farrand II, 384–88 (23 August); see 330–33 (18 August).

24. See Farrand II, 364–65 (21 August), 369–74 (22 August), 400 (24 August), 414–17 (25 August). The strong antislavery discussion that follows may be compared with other Anti-Federal criticisms of the "slave trade" clause: Centinel III, 2.7.76; Brutus III, 2.9.39; Deliberator 3.13.5; Gentleman in a Neighboring State 4.2.9; Friend to the Rights of the People 4.23.3(5); Consider Arms et al. 4.26.8–15; Phileleutheros 4.27.3–5; Republicus 5.13.14; Countryman from Dutchess County 6.6.2–4, 9–14; Countryman 6.7.6; Adelos, Northampton, Mass., Hampshire Gazette 6 February 1788. Some Anti-Federalists conceded the main Federalist defense of the provision, that it was a step towards freedom; cf. the argument of The Federal Farmer XVIII, 2.8.229, and Tench Coxe, Ford, Pamphlets 146, and James Wilson, McMaster and Stone 347. But see A Federal Republican (3.6.22) who denied that abolishing the slave trade implied the abolition of slavery. While there was little or no attempt on either side to justify the slave trade (but see Lowndes 5.12.1), the terms of discussion in the South were of course rather different. See Elliot IV, 285 (C. C. Pinckney), 296 (Barnwell); Ford, Pamphlets 378 (Ramsay). On the slave trade and the commerce power see Cincinnatus II, 6.1.12 n. 10.

25. See Farrand II, 438 (28 August).

26. Farrand II, 417–18 (25 August).

27. Farrand II, 418 (25 August).

28. Farrand II, 439 (28 August).

29. Ibid.

30. Farrand I, 236 (13 June); Farrand II, 51–121 passim (19 July–26 July), 185–86 (6 August), 496–529 passim (4 September–6 September).

31. Martin left the Convention on 4 September. See above, n. 2.

32. The Paterson plan contained such a prohibition. Farrand I, 244 (15 June).

33. On the question of exclusive versus concurrent jurisdiction, see The Federalist no. 82; Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 333–42, 372–82 (1816); Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States, 2d ed. (Boston 1851) sec. 1754ff.

34. See Democratic Federalist 3.5.6 n. 6.

35. There is no record in Farrand of Martin's having put such a proposal before the Convention. See Farrand II, 345–50 (20 August).

36. Martin's opposition to this provision is, at first sight, inconsistent with his strict federalism (see above, 2.4.29–34). His discussion here (to 2.4.107) deserves particular attention because of the light it throws on the basis of Martin's (and the Anti-Federalists') federalism and the application of the principles of that federalism under the circumstances that would be created by the Constitution's rejection of these principles.

37. According to both the Journal and Madison's notes, the language (if not the intention) of Martin's proposal was quite different from that given here, namely: "The Legislature of the United States shall have power to erect new States within as well as without the territory claimed by the several States or either of them and admit the same into the Union: Provided that nothing in this Constitution shall be construed to affect the claim of the United States to vacant lands ceded to them by the late treaty of Peace." Farrand II, 457–58, 464 (30 August); see also 454–55, 461–64.

38. According to the Journal, New Hampshire and Connecticut voted against the motion. Farrand II, 458 n. 3, 460, 464 n. 15 (30 August).

39. Farrand II, 475 (31 August). The proposal was Madison's, and he defended it on the ground that it "would require the concurrence of a majority of both the States and people."

40. Farrand II, 478 (31 August).

41. Farrand I, 341 (20 June); Farrand II, 211–12 (7 August), 475–79 (31 August).

42. Farrand I, 340–41 (20 June), 437 (27 June); Farrand II, 476 (31 August).

43. Farrand II, 475–77 (31 August).

44. The charge that the heart of the opposition to the Constitution was to be found among petty state politicians and "placemen" was very widespread. See McMaster and Stone 88 (An Independent Citizen), 114 (One of the Four Thousand), 149 (Wilson), 449 (A True Whig), 451 (E.G.O.): Ford, Essays 144–45 (A Landholder), 216 (A Countryman); Ford, Pamphlets 250–51 (Aristides); The Federalist no. 1. Anti-Federalist replies to this charge include Centinel II, 2.7.57–58; Yeomanry of Massachusetts 4.19.1–2; Brutus, Jr., 6.3.12; and John Tyler, Elliot III, 640.

45. The pamphlet as originally published concluded with some brief "Remarks on a Standing Army," taken from A [Maryland] Farmer, Maryland Gazette 29 February 1788 (5.1 below) and some anonymous "Remarks Relative to a Bill of Rights," which do not add materially to the discussion of this subject in other Anti-Federal writings printed here.

Letter from Edmund Randolph Giving His Reasons for Refusing His Signature To the Proposed Federal Constitution

10 October 1787

Edmund Randolph's political career was marked by early and continued success, though he never entirely escaped something of a reputation for insubstantiality. He was the youngest member of the convention that adopted the Virginia constitution of 1777; he was elected governor of Virginia at the age of 33; he took an active part in the deliberations of the Philadelphia Convention; and he was later chosen by Washington, who knew him well, as the first Attorney General of the United States.

Almost literally, Randolph opened and closed the debates of both the Constitutional Convention and the Virginia ratifying convention. He opened the main business at Philadelphia, presenting the Virginia Plan which served as the basis of its deliberations, and he gave major speeches during the final two days of the convention, explaining his reasons for not signing.[1] In Richmond, Randolph seconded Wilson Nicholas in opening the debate for the proponents of the Constitution and closed the debate with "one parting word" in explanation of his apparently vacillating behavior.[2] Without here trying to resolve the question whether there was an underlying consistency in his behavior—except to say that his own explanation has never been taken seriously enough by historians[3]—Randolph certainly gave the appearance of weakness and inconsistency. While the letter printed here was written to the Virginia House of Delegates on 10 October, it was not sent. Later in 1787, it was printed in Richmond as a pamphlet, with Randolph's permission, by a group of Anti-Federalists;[4] and in the early months of 1788 it was reprinted in newspapers in Virginia and around the country.[5] The pamphlet version is printed here. The letter was criticized by A Plain Dealer, who was mainly concerned to show Randolph's inconsistency and who was supposed by Randolph to have been Spencer Roane.[6]

But is this letter really part of the Anti-Federal corpus? In many respects, surely, the principles expressed in it are more Federal than Anti-Federal. One Federalist writer remarked that Randolph "appears to surmount all the leading objections which have been so profusely raised against the Constitution—he advocates with great ingenuity and precision all its essential principles, and then (to the astonishment of his friends, and as a strong instance of the weakness of human reason) he appears to refuse his assent on some of the lesser and very immaterial parts of its structure."[7] Nevertheless, Randolph did refuse to sign the Constitution; he expressed objections to it which were relied on by the opponents and which had to be answered by the proponents. He was unusual among Anti-Federalists in the strength of his (as it were) Federal principles, but he was by no means unique.

The first two-thirds of Randolph's letter is similar to the speech he gave at the outset of the Philadelphia Convention. He describes the objects of the Union as protection against foreign hostility, protection against domestic commotion, and promotion of trade and prosperity. He shows how incapable is the government under the Articles to secure these objects, because of its weaknesses in the military, taxation, and commercial fields. The government is unable to reach directly to the individual to enforce national engagements with foreign powers, to arbitrate effectively among the states, to protect the states against domestic violence, and to stand superior to ordinary laws. He concludes that an essential change in the government is necessary; "the confederation must be thrown aside." The general government must be remodeled to make it a fit instrument for increased powers, and this new government should "grow out of a consolidation of the union"—that term so generally hated by the Anti-Federalists—"so far, as the circumstances of the states will allow."

The alternatives to consolidation are disunion or partial confederacies; and Randolph describes, with great force, the dangers of any kind of disunion, especially to the South. Preservation of the Union, Randolph always insisted, was the great end guiding all of his political action.[8]

Randolph concludes by arguing in favor of a second convention, to consult again the opinions of the people, thus both improving the constitution and strengthening the indispensable popular support for the constitution ultimately decided upon. In particular, he would modify some of the aristocratic qualities that he thought had been introduced into the plan as the Philadelphia deliberations proceeded. In addition to clearing up ambiguities, he suggests making the President ineligible after a number of years and reducing his power; drawing clearer lines between the power of the Congress and the powers of the states, reducing the powers of the Senate regarding treaties and impeachments and of Congress in determining their salaries and defining the judicial powers.

1. Farrand I, 18–28 (29 May); Farrand II, 631 (15 September), 644–46 (17 September).

2. Elliot III, 23–29, 652.

3. See, however, Moncure Daniel Conway, Omitted Chapters of History Disclosed in the Life and Papers of Edmund Randolph (New York 1888) chs. 9–12; and Burnet

V. Davis, "Edmund Randolph and the U.S. Constitution: A Study in Statesmanship" (M.A. thesis, University of Chicago, 1969), where a useful beginning has been made.

4. Evans, Early American Imprints no. 20669. See Conway, Omitted Chapters of History 97–98. Randolph's letter to Washington, 27 December 1787, Bancroft, History of the Formation of the Constitution II, 455.

5. The first newspaper publications were in the Virginia Independent Chronicle (2 January 1788) and the Richmond Virginia Gazette (3 and 10 January 1788).

6. Ford, Essays 385–92.

7. The Country Journal and the Poughkeepsie Advertiser 22 April 1788, a review by A Federalist of an Anti-Federalist pamphlet entitled Observations on the Proposed Constitution for the U.S.A., clearly showing it to be a complete System of Aristocracy and Tyranny. . . . As the reviewer pointed out, the Anti-Federalist editor of the pamphlet omitted Randolph's penultimate paragraph, in which he affirmed his commitment to a strong energetic government and to union and his intention to support the Constitution even if no amendments were attained. See below, 2.5.43. Cf. Madison to Washington, 25 January 1788, Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 485.

8. Elliot III, 652.

To the Printer

Sir,

The inclosed letter contains the reasons of his Excellency Governor Randolph for refusing his signature to the proposed Foederal Constitution of Government submitted to the several states by the late Convention at Philadelphia. The manner in which we have obtained it, and the authority by which we convey it to the Public, through the channel of your Press, will be explained by the letter herewith sent to you, which, we request may precede his Excellency's letter to the Speaker of the House of Delegates in your publication of them.

M. Smith.
Charles M. Thruston.
John H. Briggs.
Mann Page, jun.

To his Excellency Edmund Randolph, Esquire.

Sir, December 2, 1787.

It has been reported in various parts of the state, that the reasons which governed you in your disapprobation of the proposed Foederal Constitution, no longer exist; and many of the people of this Commonwealth have wished to know what objections could induce you to refuse your signature to a measure so flattering to many principal characters in America, and which is so generally supposed to contain the seeds of prosperity and happiness to the United States.

We are satisfied, sir, that the time is passed, when you might with propriety have been requested to communicate your sentiments to the General Assembly on this subject; but, as you have been pleased to favor us with your observations in private, and we conceive they would not only afford satisfaction to the public, but also be useful by the information and instruction they will convey, we hope, you can have no objection to enable us to make them public through the medium of the Press. We have the honor to be, with respectful esteem, Sir, your most obedient servants,

M. Smith
Charles M. Thruston
John H. Briggs
Mann Page, jun.

To M. Smith, Charles M. Thruston, John H. Briggs, and Mann Page, jun. Esquires.

Gentlemen, December 10, 1787.

Your favor of the second instant, requesting permission to publish my letter on the new Constitution, gives me an opportunity of making known my sentiments, which, perhaps I ought not to decline. It has been written ever since its date, and was intended for the General Assembly. But I have hitherto been restrained from sending it to them, by motives of delicacy arising from two questions depending before that body, the one respecting the Constitution, the other myself. At this day too I feel an unwillingness to bring it before the Legislature, lest in the diversity of opinion, I should excite a contest unfavorable to that harmony with which I trust the great subject will be discussed. I therefore submit the publication of the letter to your pleasure.

I beg leave however, to remind you, that I have only mentioned my objections to the Constitution in general terms, thinking it improper, and too voluminous, to explain them at full length. But it is my purpose to go at large into the Constitution when a fit occasion shall present itself.

I am, Gentlemen, with the greatest respect, your most obedient servant,

Edmund Randolph

A Letter of His Excellency Edmund Randolph, Esquire, on the Federal Constitution

Richmond, October 10, 1787.

Sir,

2.5.1 The Constitution, which I inclosed to the General Assembly in a late official letter, appears without my signature. This circumstance, although trivial in its own nature, has been rendered rather important to myself at least, by being misunderstood by some, and misrepresented by others—As I disdain to conceal the reasons for with-holding my subscription, I have always been, still am, and ever shall be, ready to proclaim them to the world. To the legislature therefore, by whom I was deputed to the Foederal Convention, I beg leave now to address them; affecting no indifference to public opinion, but resolved not to court it by an unmanly sacrifice of my own judgment.

As this explanation will involve a summary, but general review of our foederal situation, you will pardon me, I trust, although I should transgress the usual bounds of a letter. 2.5.2

Before my departure for the Convention, I believed, that the confederation was not so eminently defective, as it had been supposed. But after I had entered into a free communication with those, who were best informed of the condition and interest of each state; after I had compared the intelligence derived from them, with the properties, which ought to characterize the government of our union, I became persuaded, that the confederation was destitute of every energy, which a constitution of the United States ought to possess.[1] 2.5.3

For the objects proposed by its institution were, that it should be a shield against foreign hostility, and a firm resort against domestic commotion: that it should cherish trade, and promote the prosperity of the states under its care. 2.5.4

But these are not among the attributes of our present union. Severe experience under the pressure of war—a ruinous weakness, manifested since the return of peace—and the contemplation of these dangers, which darken the future prospect, have condemned the hope of grandeur and of safety under the auspices of the confederation. 2.5.5

In the exigencies of war indeed the history of its effects is short; the final ratification having been delayed until the beginning of the year 1781. But howsoever short, this period is distinguished by melancholy testimonies, of its inability to maintain in harmony the social intercourse of the states, to defend Congress against incroachments on their rights, and to obtain by requisitions supplies to the foederal treasury or recruits to the foederal armies. I shall not attempt an enumeration of the particular instances; but leave to your own remembrance and the records of Congress, the support of these assertions. 2.5.6

In the season of peace too not many years have elapsed; and yet each of them has produced fatal examples of delinquency, and sometimes of pointed opposition to foederal duties. To the various remonstrances of Congress I appeal for a gloomy, but unexaggerated narrative of the injuries, which our faith, honor and happiness have sustained by the failures of the states. 2.5.7

But these evils are past; and some may be led by an honest zeal to conclude, that they cannot be repeated. Yes, sir; they will be repeated as 2.5.8

long as the confederation exists, and will bring with them other mischiefs, springing from the same source, which cannot be yet foreseen in their full array of terror.

2.5.9 If we examine the constitutions, and laws of the several states, it is immediately discovered, that the law of nations is unprovided with sanctions in many cases, which deeply affect public dignity and public justice. The letter, however of the confederation does not permit Congress to remedy these defects, and such an authority, although evidently deducible from its spirit, cannot, without a violation of the second article, be assumed. Is it not a political phaenomenon, that the head of the confederacy should be doomed to be plunged into war, from its wretched impotency to check offences against this law? And sentenced to witness in unavailing anguish the infraction of their engagements to foreign sovereigns?

2.5.10 And yet this is not the only grievous point of weakness. After a war shall be inevitable, the requisitions of Congress for quotas of men or money, will again prove unproductive and fallacious. Two causes will always conspire to this baneful consequence.

1. No government can be stable, which hangs on human inclination alone, unbiassed by the fear of coercion; and 2. from the very connection between states bound to proportionate contributions,—jealousies and suspicions naturally arise, which at least chill the ardor, if they do not excite the murmurs of the whole. I do not forget indeed, that by one sudden impulse our part of the American continent has been thrown into a military posture, and that in the earlier annals of the war, our armies marched to the field on the mere recommendations of Congress. But ought we to argue from a contest, thus signalized by the magnitude of its stake, that as often as a flame shall be hereafter kindled, the same enthusiasm will fill our legions? or renew them, as they may be thinned by losses?

2.5.11 If not, where shall we find protection? Impressions, like those, which prevent a compliance with requisitions of regular forces, will deprive the American republic of the services of militia. But let us suppose, that they are attainable, and acknowledge, as I always shall, that they are the natural support of a free government. When it is remembered, that in their absence agriculture must languish; that they are not habituated to military exposures and the rigor of military discipline, and that the necessity of holding in readiness successive detachments, carries the expence far beyond that of inlistments—this resource ought to be adopted with the caution.

2.5.12 As strongly too am I persuaded, that requisitions for money will not be more cordially received. For besides the distrust, which would prevail with respect to them also; besides the opinion, entertained by each state of its own liberality and unsatisfied demands against the United States, there is another consideration, not less worthy of attention. The first rule for determining each quota was the value of all land granted or surveyed, and of the buildings and improvements thereon. It is no longer doubted, that an equitable, uniform mode of estimating that value, is impracticable; and therefore twelve states have substituted the number of inhabitants under certain limitations, as the standard according to which money is to be furnished. But under the subsisting articles of the union, the assent of the thirteenth state is necessary, and has not yet been given. This does of itself lessen the hope of procuring a revenue for foederal uses; and the miscarriage of the impost almost rivets our despondency.

Amidst these disappointments, it would afford some consolation, if when 2.5.13 rebellion shall threaten any state, an ultimate asylum could be found under the wing of Congress. But it is at least equivocal, whether they can intrude forces into a state, rent asunder by civil discord, even with the purest solicitude for our foederal welfare, and on the most urgent intreaties of the state itself. Nay the very allowance of this power would be pageantry alone, from the want of money and of men.

To these defects of Congressional power, the history of man has sub- 2.5.14 joined others, not less alarming. I earnestly pray, that the recollection of common sufferings, which terminated in common glory, may check the sallies of violence, and perpetuate mutual friendship between the states. But I cannot presume, that we are superior to those unsocial passions, which under like circumstances have infested more ancient nations.[2] I cannot presume, that through all time, in the daily mixture of American citizens with each other, in the conflicts for commercial advantages, in the discontents, which the neighborhood of territory has been seen to engender in other quarters of the globe, and in the efforts of faction and intrigue—thirteen distinct communities under no effective superintending controul (as the United States confessedly now are notwithstanding the bold terms of the confederation) will avoid a hatred to each other deep and deadly.

In the prosecution of this inquiry we shall find the general prosperity to 2.5.15 decline under a system thus unnerved. No sooner is the merchant prepared for foreign ports with the treasures, which this new world kindly offers to his acceptance, than it is announced to him, that they are shut against American shipping, or opened under oppressive regulations. He urges Congress to a counter-policy, and is answered only by a condolence on the general misfortune. He is immediately struck with the conviction, that until exclusion shall be opposed to exclusion and restriction to restriction, the American flag will be disgraced. For who can conceive, that thirteen legislatures, viewing commerce under different relations, and fancying themselves, discharged from every obligation to concede the smallest of their commercial advantages for the benefit of the whole, will be wrought into a concert of action in defiance of every prejudice? Nor is this all:—Let the great improvements be recounted, which have inriched and illustrated Europe: Let it be noted, how few those are, which will be absolutely denied to the United States, comprehending within their boundaries the choicest blessings of climate, soil and navigable waters; then let the most sanguine patriot banish, if he can, the mortifying belief, that all these must sleep, until they shall be roused by the vigour of a national government.

2.5.16 I have not exemplified the preceding remarks by minute details; because they are evidently fortified by truth, and the consciousness of United America. I shall therefore no longer deplore the unfitness of the confederation to secure our peace; but proceed, with a truly unaffected distrust of my own opinions, to examine what order of powers the government of the United States ought to enjoy? how they ought to be defended against incroachment? whether they can be interwoven in the confederation without an alteration of its very essence? or must be lodged in new hands? shewing at the same time the convulsions, which seem to await us from a dissolution of the union or partial confederacies.

2.5.17 To mark the kind and degree of authority, which ought to be confided to the government of the United States is no more than to reverse the description, which I have already given, of the defects of the confederation.

2.5.18 From thence it will follow, that the operations of peace and war will be clogged without regular advances of money, and that these will be slow indeed, if dependent on supplication alone. For what better name do requisitions deserve, which may be evaded or opposed, without the fear of coercion? But although coercion is an indispensable ingredient, it ought not to be directed against a state, as a state; it being impossible to attempt it except by blockading the trade of the delinquent, or carrying war into its bowels.[3] Even if these violent schemes were eligible, in other respects both of them might perhaps be defeated by the scantiness of the public chest; would be tardy in their complete effect, as the expence of the land and naval equipments must be first reimbursed; and might drive the proscribed state into the desperate resolve of inviting foreign alliances. Against each of them lie separate unconquerable objections. A blockade is not equally applicable to all the states, they being differently circumstanced in commerce and in ports; nay an excommunication from the privileges of the union would be vain, because every regulation or prohibition may be easily eluded under the rights of American citizenship, or of foreign nations. But how shall we speak of the intrusion of troops? shall we arm citizens against citizens, and habituate them to shed kindred blood? shall we risque the inflicting of wounds, which will generate a rancour never to be subdued? would there be no room to fear, that an army accustomed to fight, for the establishment of authority, would salute an emperor of their own? Let us not bring these things into jeopardy. Let us rather substitute the same process, by which individuals are compelled to contribute to the government of their own states. Instead of making requisitions to the legislatures, it would appear more proper, that taxes should be imposed by the foederal head, under due modifications and guards: that the collectors should demand from the citizens their respective quotas, and be supported as in the collection of ordinary taxes.

It follows too, that, as the general government will be responsible to foreign nations, it ought to be able to annul any offensive measure, or inforce any public right. Perhaps, among the topics on which they may be aggrieved or complain, the commercial intercourse, and the manner, in which contracts are discharged, may constitute the principal articles of clamour. 2.5.19

It follows too, that the general government ought to be the supreme arbiter for adjusting every contention among the states. In all their connections therefore with each other, and particularly in commerce, which will probably create the greatest discord, it ought to hold the reins.

It follows too, that the general government ought to protect each state against domestic as well as external violence.

And lastly it follows, that through the general government alone can we ever assume the rank, to which we are entitled by our resources and situation.

Should the people of America surrender these powers, they can be paramount to the constitutions, and ordinary acts of legislation, only by being delegated by them. I do not pretend to affirm, but I venture to believe, that if the confederation had been solemnly questioned in opposition to our constitution or even to one of our laws, posterior to it, it must have given way. For never did it obtain with us a higher ratification, than a resolution of Assembly in the daily form. 2.5.20

This will be one security against incroachment. But another not less effectual is, to exclude the individual states from any agency in the national government, as far as it may be safe, and their interposition may not be absolutely necessary. 2.5.21

But now, sir, permit me to declare, that in my humble judgment the powers by which alone the blessings of a general government can be accomplished, cannot be interwoven in the confederation without a change of its very essence; in other words, that the confederation must be thrown aside. This is almost demonstrable from the inefficacy of requisitions and from the necessity of converting them into acts of authority. My suffrage, as a citizen, is also for additional powers. But to whom shall we commit these acts of authority, these additional powers? To Congress?—When I formerly lamented the defects in the jurisdiction of Congress, I had no view to indicate any other opinion, than that the foederal head ought not to be so circumscribed. For free as I am at all times to profess my reverence for that body, and the individuals, who compose it, I am yet equally free to make known my aversion to repose such a trust in a tribunal so constituted. My objections are not the visions of theory, but the result of my own observation in America, and of the experience of others abroad. 1. The legislative and executive are concentred in the same persons. This, where real power exists, must eventuate in tyranny. 2. The representation of the states bears no proportion to their importance. This is an unreasonable subjection of the 2.5.22 will of the majority to that of the minority. 3. The mode of election and the liability to be recalled may too often render the delegates rather partizans of their own states, than representatives of the union. 4. Cabal and intrigue must consequently gain an ascendancy in a course of years. 5. A single house of legislation will some times be precipitate, perhaps passionate. 6. As long as seven states are required for the smallest, and nine for the greatest votes, may not foreign influence at some future day insinuate itself, so as to interrupt every active exertion? 7. To crown the whole, it is scarcely within the verge of possibility, that so numerous an assembly should acquire that secrecy, dispatch, and vigour, which are the test of excellence in the executive department.

2.5.23 My inference from these facts and principles is, that the new powers must be deposited in a new body, growing out of a consolidation of the union, as far as the circumstances of the states will allow. Perhaps, however, some may meditate its dissolution, and others partial confederacies.

2.5.24 The first is an idea awful indeed and irreconcileable with a very early, and hitherto uniform conviction, that without union we must be undone. For before the voice of war was heard, the pulse of the then colonies was tried and found to beat in unison. The unremitted labour of our enemies was to divide, and the policy of every Congress to bind us together. But in no example was this truth more clearly displayed, than in the prudence, with which independence was unfolded to the sight, and in the forbearance to declare it, until America almost unanimously called for it. After we had thus launched into troubles, never before explored, and in the hour of heavy distress, the remembrance of our social strength not only forbade despair, but drew from Congress the most illustrious repetition of their settled purpose to despise all terms, short of independence.

2.5.25 Behold then, how successful and glorious we have been, while we acted in fraternal concord. But let us discard the illusion, that by this success and this glory the crest of danger has irrecoverably fallen. Our governments are yet too youthful to have acquired stability from habit. Our very quiet depends upon the duration of the union. Among the upright and intelligent, few can read without emotion the future fate of the states, if severed from each other. Then shall we learn the full weight of foreign intrigue—Then shall we hear of partitions of our country. If a prince, inflamed by the lust of conquest, should use one state, as the instrument of enslaving others—if every state is to be wearied by perpetual alarms, and compelled to maintain large military establishments—if all questions are to be decided by an appeal to arms, where a difference of opinion cannot be removed by negotiation—in a word, if all the direful misfortunes, which haunt the peace of rival nations, are to triumph over the land—for what have we contended? Why have we exhausted our wealth? Why have we basely betrayed the heroic martyrs of the federal cause?

But dreadful as the total dissolution of the union is to any mind, I entertain no less horror at the thought of partial confederacies.[4] I have not the least ground for supposing, that an overture of this kind would be listened to by a single state; and the presumption is, that the politics of the greater part of the states flow from the warmest attachment to an union of the whole. If however a lesser confederacy could be obtained, by Virginia, let me conjure my countrymen well to weigh the probable consequences, before they attempt to form it. 2.5.26

On such an event, the strength of the union would be divided into two or perhaps three parts. Has it so increased since the war as to be divisible?—and yet remain sufficient for our happiness? 2.5.27

The utmost limit of any partial confederacy, which Virginia could expect to form, would comprehend only the three southern states, and her nearest northern neighbour. But they, like ourselves, are diminished in their real force, by the mixture of an unhappy species of population.

Again may I ask, whether the opulence of the United States has been augmented since the war? This is answered in the negative by a load of debt, and the declension of trade. 2.5.28

At all times must a southern confederacy support ships of war, and soldiery. As soon would a navy move from the forest, and an army spring from the earth, as such a confederacy, indebted, impoverished in its commerce, and destitute of men, could, for some years at least provide an ample defence for itself.

Let it not be forgotten, that nations, which can inforce their rights, have large claims against the United States, and that the creditor may insist on payment from any one of them. Which of them would probably be the victim? The most productive and the most exposed. When vexed by reprisals or war, the southern states will sue for alliances on this continent or beyond sea. If for the former, the necessity of an union of the whole is decided. If for the latter, America will, I fear, re-act the scenes of confusion and bloodshed, exhibited among most of those nations, which have, too late, repented the folly of relying on auxiliaries. 2.5.29

Two or more confederacies cannot but be competitors for power. The ancient friendship between the citizens of America, being thus cut off, bitterness and hostility will succeed in its place. In order to prepare against surrounding danger, we shall be compelled to vest somewhere or other power approaching near to a military government. 2.5.30

The annals of the world have abounded so much with instances of a divided people, being a prey to foreign influence, that I shall not restrain my apprehensions of it, should our union be torn assunder. The opportunity of insinuating it will be multiplied in proportion to the parts, into which we may be broken.

In short, sir, I am fatigued with summoning up to my imagination the miseries, which will harrass the United States, if torn from each other, and which will not end, until they are superseded by fresh mischiefs under the yoke of a tyrant.

2.5.31 I come therefore to the last and perhaps only refuge in our difficulties, a consolidation of the union, as far as circumstances will permit. To fulfil this desirable object, the constitution was framed by the Foederal Convention. A quorum of eleven states, and the only member from a twelfth have subscribed it; Mr. MASON of Virginia, Mr. GERRY of Massachusetts and myself having refused to subscribe.[5]

2.5.32 Why I refused, would, I hope, be solved to the satisfaction of those, who know me, by saying that a sense of duty commanded me thus to act. It commanded me, sir, for believe me, that no event of my life ever occupied more of my reflection. To subscribe seemed to offer no inconsiderable gratification; since it would have presented me to the world, as a fellow-labourer with the learned and zealous statesmen of America. But it was far more interesting to my feelings, that I was about to differ from three of my colleagues; one of whom is, to the honor of the country, which he has saved, imbosomed in their affections, and can receive no praise from the highest lustre of language; the other two of whom have been long inrolled among the wisest and best lovers of the commonwealth; and the unshaken and intimate friendship of all of whom I have ever prized, and still do prize, as among the happiest of all my acquisitions. I was no stranger to the reigning partiality for the members, who composed the convention; and had not the smallest doubt, that from this cause, and from the ardor for a reform of government, the first applauses at least would be loud, and profuse. I suspected too, that there was something in the human breast, which for a time would be apt to construe a temperateness in politicks into an enmity to the union. Nay I plainly foresaw, that in the dissensions of parties, a middle line would probably be interpreted into a want of enterprize and decision.[6] But these considerations, how seducing soever, were feeble opponents to the suggestions of my conscience. I was sent to exercise my judgment, and to exercise it was my fixed determination; being instructed by even an imperfect acquaintance with mankind, that self approbation is the only true reward, which a political career can bestow, and that popularity would have been but another name for perfidy, if to secure it, I had given up the freedom of thinking for myself.

2.5.33 It would have been a peculiar pleasure to me, to have ascertained, before I left Virginia, the temper and genius of my fellow-citizens, considered relatively to a government, so substantially differing from the confederation, as that, which is now submitted. But this was for many obvious reasons impossible: and I was thereby deprived of what I thought the necessary guides.

2.5.34 I saw however that the confederation was tottering from its own weakness, and that the sitting of the convention was a signal of its total insufficiency. I was therefore ready to assent to a scheme of government, which was proposed, and which went beyond the limits of the confederation, believing, that without being too extensive it would have preserved our tranquility, until that temper and that genius should be collected.

But when the plan which is now before the General Assembly, was on its 2.5.35 passage through the convention, I moved, that the state-conventions should be at liberty to amend, and that a second general Convention should be holden to discuss the amendments, which should be suggested by them. This motion was in some measure justified by the manner, in which the confederation was forwarded originally, by Congress to the state-legislatures, in many of which amendments were proposed, and those amendments were afterwards examined in Congress. Such a motion was doubly expedient here, as the delegation of so much more power was sought for. But it was negatived. I then expressed my unwillingness to sign. My reasons were the following.[7]

1. It is said in the resolutions, which accompany the constitution, that it is 2.5.36 to be submitted to a convention of Delegates, chosen in each state by the people thereof, for their assent and ratification. The meaning of these terms is allowed universally to be, that the Convention must either adopt the constitution in the whole, or reject it in the whole, and is positively forbidden to amend. If therefore I had signed, I should have felt myself bound to be silent as to amendments, and to endeavor to support the constitution without the correction of a letter. With this consequence before my eyes and with a determination to attempt an amendment, I was taught by a regard for consistency not to sign.

2. My opinion always was, and still is, that every citizen of America, let the crisis be what it may, ought to have a full opportunity to propose through his representatives any amendment, which in his apprehension tends to the public welfare—By signing I should have contradicted this sentiment.

3. A constitution ought to have the hearts of the people on its side. But if at a future day it should be burthensome, after having been adopted in the whole, and they should insinuate, that it was in some measure forced upon them, by being confined to the single alternative of taking or rejecting it altogether, under my impressions and with my opinions I should not be able to justify myself had I signed.

4. I was always satisfied, as I have now experienced, that this great subject, would be placed in new lights and attitudes by the criticism of the world, and that no man can assure himself, how a constitution will work for a course of years, until at least he shall have heard the observations of the people at large. I also fear more from inaccuracies in a constitution, than from gross errors in any other composition; because our dearest interests are to be regulated by it, and power, if loosely given, especially where it will be interpreted with great latitude, may bring sorrow in its execution. Had I signed with these ideas, I should have virtually shut my ears against the information, which I ardently desired.

5. I was afraid, that if the Constitution was to be submitted to the people, to be wholly adopted or wholly rejected by them, they would not only reject it, but bid a lasting farewell to the union. This formidable event I wished to avert, by keeping myself free to propose amendments, and thus, if possible, to remove the obstacles to an effectual government. But it will be asked, whether all these arguments were not well weighed in Convention. They were, sir, and with great candor. Nay, when I called to mind the respectability of those, with whom I was associated, I almost lost confidence in these principles. On other occasions I should chearfully have yielded to a majority; on this the fate of thousands, yet unborn, enjoined me not to yield, until I was convinced—

2.5.37 Again may I be asked, why the mode pointed out in the Constitution for its amendment, may not be a sufficient security against its imperfections, without now arresting it in its progress?—My answers are, 1. that it is better to amend, while we have the Constitution in our power, while the passions of designing men are not yet enlisted and while a bare majority of the states may amend, than to wait for the uncertain assent of three fourths of the states. 2. That a bad feature in government becomes more and more fixed every day. 3. That frequent changes of a Constitution even if practicable ought not to be wished, but avoided as much as possible: and 4. That in the present case it may be questionable, whether, after the particular advantages of its operation shall be discerned, three fourths of the states can be induced to amend.

2.5.38 I confess, that it is no easy task, to devise a scheme which shall be suitable to the views of all. Many expedients have occurred to me, but none of them appear less exceptionable than this: that if our Convention should choose to amend, another federal convention be recommended: that in that federal Convention the amendments proposed by this or any other state, be discussed; and if incorporated in the constitution or rejected, or if a proper number of the other states should be unwilling to accede to a second Convention, the constitution be again laid before the same state-conventions, which shall again assemble on the summons of the Executives, and it shall be either wholly adopted, or wholly rejected, without a further power of amendment. I count such a delay, as nothing in comparison with so grand an object; especially too as the privilege of amending must terminate after the use of it once.

2.5.39 I should now conclude this letter, which is already too long, were it not incumbent on me from having contended for amendments, to set forth the particulars, which I conceive to require correction. I undertake this with reluctance; because it is remote from my intentions to catch the prejudices or prepossessions of any man. But as I mean only to manifest, that I have not been actuated by caprice, and now to explain every objection at full length would be an immense labour, I shall content myself with enumerating certain heads, in which the constitution is most repugnant to my wishes.[8]

The two first points are the equality of suffrage in the Senate, and the submission of commerce to a mere majority in the legislature, with no other check than the revision of the President. I conjecture that neither of these things can be corrected; and particularly the former; without which we must have risen perhaps in disorder. 2.5.40

But I am sanguine in hoping, that in every other, justly obnoxious clause, Virginia, will be seconded by a majority of the states. I hope, that she will be seconded 1. in causing all ambiguities of expression to be precisely explained: 2. in rendering the President ineligible after a given number of years: 3. in taking from him either the power of nominating to the judiciary offices, or of filling up vacancies which therein may happen during the recess of the senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session: 4. in taking from him the power of pardoning for treason, at least before conviction: 5. in drawing a line between the powers of Congress and individual states; and in defining the former; so as to leave no clashing of jurisdictions nor dangerous disputes: and to prevent the one from being swallowed up by the other, under the cover of general words, and implication: 6. in abridging the power of the Senate to make treaties the supreme laws of the land: 7. in providing a tribunal instead of the Senate for the impeachment of Senators: 8. in incapacitating the Congress to determine their own salaries: and often limiting and defining the judicial power. 2.5.41

The proper remedy must be consigned to the wisdom of the convention: and the final step, which Virginia shall pursue, if her overtures shall be discarded, must also rest with them. 2.5.42

But as I affect neither mystery nor subtilty, in politics, I hesitate not to say, that the most fervent prayer of my soul is the establishment of a firm, energetic government; that the most inveterate curse, which can befal us, is a dissolution of the union; and that the present moment, if suffered to pass away unemployed, can never be recalled. These were my opinions, while I acted as a Delegate; they sway me, while I speak as a private citizen. I shall therefore cling to the union, as the rock of our salvation, and urge Virginia to finish the salutary work, which she has begun. And if after our best efforts for amendments they cannot be obtained, I scruple not to declare, (notwithstanding the advantage, which such a declaration may give to the enemies of my proposal,) that I will, as an individual citizen, accept the constitution; because I would regulate myself by the spirit of America. 2.5.43

You will excuse me, sir, for having been thus tedious. My feelings and duty demanded this exposition: for through no other channel could I rescue 2.5.44 my omission to sign from misrepresentation, and in no more effectual way could I exhibit to the General Assembly an unreserved history of my conduct.

I have the honor, Sir, to be, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

Edmund Randolph

The Honorable the Speaker of the House of Delegates.

1. See Randolph's speech at the Philadelphia Convention introducing the Virginia Plan. Farrand I, 18 (29 May).
2. Cf. The Federalist no. 7.
3. Cf. The Federalist nos. 12, 16. Cf. Henry 5.15.15–16.
4. See Centinel XI, 2.7.142 n. 75; Henry 5.16.11 n. 25.
5. An essay by Philanthropos sought to show that the three non-signers differed radically in their objections. Independent Gazetteer 16 January 1788, McMaster and Stone 521–24.
6. "Previous to the appearance of this letter . . . it became difficult for many to conjecture how his Excellency would devise a middle course, so as to catch the spirit of all his countrymen, and to reconcile himself to all parties." Plain Dealer, Ford, Essays 389. Tench Coxe, however, thought that in not signing, Randolph had hurt himself politically but helped the cause of the Constitution in Virginia. Letter from Tench Coxe to James Madison, 21 October 1787, Documentary History of the Constitution IV, 340.
7. Cf. Randolph's explanations before the Constitutional Convention, Farrand II, 560–61 (10 September), 631 (15 September), 644–45 (17 September).
8. Cf. the objections expressed by Randolph on 10 September in Philadelphia, Farrand II, 560–61.

PART 2

Major Series of Essays at the Outset

Letters of Cato

NEW YORK JOURNAL
September 1787–January 1788

In the New York Journal of 27 September 1787, the same issue containing the text of the proposed Constitution,[1] there appeared the first of a series of Anti-Federal essays by Cato, addressed to the citizens of the state of New York. Historians have not generally found the arguments of this earliest series of Anti-Federal essays very significant or substantial. E. Wilder Spaulding regards them as "dull and ponderous, full of the usual tedious allusions to such classic names as Montesquieu, Hume, Locke, and Sidney, and intemperate in their dogmatism and exaggeration." He sees as their chief merit to show "far better than such scholarly productions as 'The Federalist' what men were thinking and talking."[2] Linda Grant DePauw describes them as "among the better pieces produced during the ratification campaign, although hardly good enough to be considered of enduring value or even of particular historical importance." She thinks they are "dreary" and "pedantic," and she attributes the attention they have received to the fact that they are usually thought to have been written by Governor George Clinton.[3] Yet if Cato is neither profound nor witty, his arguments have a cogency and a respectable grounding in the philosophy of the day sufficient to claim the attention of not only the student of historical movements and personalities but also the student of Anti-Federalist thought.

In the first essay Cato urges the importance of careful and independent deliberation in order that the people should preserve both their safety and their reputation, laying notable emphasis on the latter. Referring to the distinguished sponsorship of the Constitution, he urges the citizens of New York to "Attach yourselves to measures not to men" (I, 2.6.5). Stung by a sharp reply from Caesar, Cato devotes most of his second essay to a rebuttal, a vindication of popular authority, a showing that the proposed Constitution "originated in an assumption of power, which your voice alone can sanctify" (II, 2.6.9), and a conclusion that a full and free examination is essentially necessary.

In essay III, Cato takes up the question of consolidation, arguing the impossibility of maintaining a government both free and vigorous over so extensive and heterogeneous a country as the United States. He makes a standard Anti-Federalist defense of the small republic, conceding that some of the states were already or would soon become too large to remain both vigorous and free.[4]

Cato then turns, in essay IV, to the Constitution, taking up first, not the legislature, but the executive which, while "not the first in order, as arranged therein, yet being the chief, is perhaps entitled by the rules of rank to the first consideration." (IV, 2.6.23). Some of the arguments here about the dangers of the presidency and its similarity to the British monarchy, are familiar due to the replies to them in The Federalist.

Pausing for brief but very interesting comments on the inexplicitness of the Constitution and the relation between the opinions and manners of the people, commerce, and the form of government (IV, 2.6.24, 28)—frequent Anti-Federalist themes—Cato turns in the remainder of his essays (V–VII) to the organization and powers of the legislature. Although not without interest, these papers are more routine than the earlier ones, criticizing the provision for biennial elections (V, 2.6.36–37); the inadequacy of the representation (V, 2.6.38); the unjust apportionment of representatives and direct taxes (VI, 2.6.39–42); the aristocratic tendency of the Senate (VI, 2.6.43) and its improper connection with the presidency (VI, 2.6.44; VII, 2.6.45); and the absence of sufficient limits on the federal governors, particularly with reference to the power given to Congress to make or alter the regulations regarding the time, place, and manner of choosing members of the federal legislature (VII, 2.6.46–48). The essays are broken off here, leaving undiscussed several heads listed in the initial sketch (V, 2.6.35).

The Cato letters (not to be confused with Cato [South Carolina] 5.10) were attributed by Paul Leicester Ford to George Clinton;[5] but on the basis of work by Jacob Cooke and Linda Grant DePauw, it now appears that Ford's attribution is almost entirely groundless.[6] Clinton's biographer, E. Wilder Spaulding, notes that "it was only in his later years that [Clinton] learned to write correct English and to spell passing well, and he was never an eager reader." Spaulding did not, nevertheless, find the essays inconsistent with Clinton's politics, style, or character, a judgment that must be given due weight, though he cites no evidence of Clinton's authorship except Ford's discussion.[7] DePauw argues that a project of this kind—sustained theoretical argument—was out of character for the relatively unscholarly Clinton and that such an early, decisive move was inconsistent with his prudent political style, particularly regarding the proposed Constitution. Yet Clinton's performance at the New York Convention, as revealed in the Bancroft transcripts, was surely theoretically respectable;[8] and he might well have taken an earlier and stronger stand against the Constitution in anonymous newspaper pieces than he would take publicly in his own name.[9] In The Federalist Hamilton referred to the author of Cato as "a writer who (whatever may be his real merit) has had no inconsiderable share in the applauses of his party,"[10] a description that would fit Clinton as well as many others, including Abraham Yates, who is DePauw's candidate. An essayist in the Connecticut Courant, who provides what appears to be the only contemporary identification of Richard Henry Lee as the author of the Letters of The Federal Farmer, went on to express his surprise that Lee had united "with the G—r of N— Y—, and a train of Collectors of impost and excise, tide-waiters and bailiffs, to instruct us poor and despised Yankees in the arts of government. . . ."[11] The internal evidence is inconclusive. There is at least one striking similarity between a remark of Cato and one of Clinton in the New York ratifying convention, but there are several even sharper similarities between Cato and John Williams;[12] in either case, or both, the speaker may simply have found useful material in the newspaper series. DePauw suggests that on the available evidence a reasonable guess as to the author of Cato might be Abraham Yates;[13] but it must have been a far more lucid Abraham Yates than the one who is also identified by DePauw (on quite strong grounds) as having written the Sidney (and Sydney?) Anti-Federal essays.[14] The present editor is inclined to think that the weight of evidence still inclines toward Clinton as Cato; but the question is surely open. For most purposes it is better to regard him simply as—Cato.

1. The text of the Constitution had already been printed on the 22d in the New York Independent Journal.

2. E. Wilder Spaulding, His Excellency George Clinton (New York 1938) 173.

3. DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar 284–85. On reading Anti-Federalist essays, see below, A Countryman 6.7.4 n. 3.

4. See below, III, 2.6.16 n. 11.

5. See Ford, Essays 245, 281.

6. Jacob Cooke, "Alexander Hamilton's Authorship of the 'Caesar' Letters," William and Mary Quarterly January 1960, 78–85. The argument against Hamilton's authorship of the Caesar letters, to which Cato replies, is reenforced by the statistical work of Frederick Mosteller and David Wallace, Inference and Disputed Authorship: The Federalist (Reading, Mass., 1964) 251–52. DePauw devotes an appendix to her The Eleventh Pillar (283–92) to a full discussion of the question of the authorship of the Cato letters.

7. Spaulding, His Excellency George Clinton, p. 11. Spaulding betrays a certain uneasiness when he says that "the learned references to such authorities as Locke and Montesquieu showed that even the democratic governor could not rise above the affected pedantries of his time." E. Wilder Spaulding, New York in the Critical Period 1783–1789 (New York 1932) 207. A contemporary critic was ungenerous enough to suggest that Cato had never read most of the works he refers to and that it was even probable that "he has never seen any more of Montesquieu's works, than a few scraps, picked out of some late miscellaneous pieces." Examiner in the New York Journal 14 December 1787.

8. See below, Clinton 6.13. Cf. DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar 197–98.

9. While the Philadelphia Convention was still sitting, Alexander Hamilton accused Clinton of having expressed "in public company" the opinion that the Convention was unnecessary and mischievous, giving rise to a newspaper exchange between Hamilton and Clinton's defenders. See Hamilton's letter to the New York Daily Advertiser 21 July 1787; the reply of A Republican on behalf of Clinton, New York Journal 6 September 1787; and Hamilton's rebuttal in the Daily Advertiser 15 September 1787. The Hamilton letters, with explanatory notes, are printed in The Papers of Alexander Hamilton, ed. Harold C. Syrett et al. (New York 1961–) IV, 229–32, 248–53; see also his letter to General Washington of October 1787, 280–81. See DePauw's ingenious attempt to lay the responsibility for the powerful opposition to the Constitution in New York on Hamilton's apparently unfounded attack on Clinton, The Eleventh Pillar 72–83.

10. The Federalist no. 67. Hamilton here clearly suggests that he knows who the author was; and since, according to DePauw, "it is certain that Hamilton did not believe the governor was 'Cato,' " the case against Clinton's authorship would seem almost conclusive. DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar 288. DePauw's authority is Jacob E. Cooke, who relies on a letter from Hamilton to Washington, written after the appearance of Cato, saying that, "though the Governor has not publicly declared himself his particular connections and confidential friends are loud against it." "Alexander Hamilton's Authorship of the 'Caesar' Letters," William and Mary Quarterly January 1960, 79–80 n; my italics. This may mean that Hamilton did not think that Clinton wrote Cato; but the observation is altogether consistent with a belief that the Governor did write anonymously as Cato, while declining to make a public declaration in his own name. This was similar to the kind of behavior Hamilton had earlier suspected Clinton of engaging in. See also below, 2.6.16 n. 11.

11. See New England in Connecticut Courant 24 December 1787. On the authorship of the Letters from the Federal Farmer, see below, 2.8 intro.

12. See Cato V, 2.6.36 n. 24, and 2.6.38 n. 27.

13. DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar 290–92.

14. See below, Sydney 6.9 intro.

I

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

2.6.1 The Convention, who sat at Philadelphia, have at last delivered to Congress that system of general government, which they have declared best calculated to promote your safety and happiness as citizens of the United States. This system, though not handed to you formally by the authority of government,[1] has obtained an introduction through divers channels; and the minds of you all, to whose observation it has come, have no doubt been contemplating it; and alternate joy, hope, or fear have preponderated, as it conformed to, or differed from, your various ideas of just government.

2.6.2 Government, to an American, is the science of his political safety—this then is a moment to you the most important—and that in various points—to your reputation as members of a great nation—to your immediate safety, and to that of your posterity. In your private concerns and affairs of life you deliberate with caution, and act with prudence; your public concerns require a caution and prudence, in a ratio suited to the difference [difficulty?] and dignity of the subject. The disposal of your reputation, and of your lives and property, is more momentous than a contract for a farm, or the sale of a bale of goods; in the former, if you are negligent or inattentive, the ambitious and despotic will entrap you in their toils, and bind you with the cord of power from which you, and your posterity, may never be freed; and if the possibility should exist, it carries along with it consequences that will make your community totter to its center: in the latter, it is a mere loss of a little property, which more circumspection, or assiduity, may repair.

Without directly engaging as an advocate for this new form of national government, or as an opponent—let me conjure you to consider this a very important crisis of your safety and character—You have already, in common with the rest of your countrymen, the citizens of the other states, given to the world astonishing evidences of your greatness—you have fought under peculiar circumstances, and [were] successful against a powerful nation on a speculative question—you have established an original compact between you and your governors, a fact heretofore unknown in the formation of the governments of the world—your experience has informed you, that there are defects in the foederal system, and, to the astonishment of mankind, your legislatures have concerted measures for an alteration, with as much ease as an individual would make a disposition of his ordinary domestic affairs: this alteration now lies before you, for your consideration; but beware how you determine—do not, because you admit that something must be done, adopt any thing—teach the members of that convention, that you are capable of a supervision of their conduct. The same medium that gave you this system, if it is erroneous, while the door is now open, can make amendments, or give you another, if it is required.—Your fate, and that of your posterity, depends on your present conduct—do not give the latter reason to curse you, nor yourselves cause of reprehension; as individuals you are ambitious of leaving behind you a good name, and it is the reflection, that you have done right in this life, that blunts the sharpness of death; the same principles would be a consolation to you, as patriots, in the hour of dissolution, that you would leave to your children a fair political inheritance, untouched by the vultures of power, which you had acquired by an unshaken perseverance in the cause of liberty—but how miserable the alternative—you would deprecate the ruin you had brought on yourselves—be the curse of posterity, and the scorn and scoff of nations. 2.6.3

Deliberate, therefore, on this new national government with coolness; analize it with criticism; and reflect on it with candour: if you find that the influence of a powerful few, or the exercise of a standing army, will always be directed and exerted for your welfare alone, and not to the agrandizement of themselves, and that it will secure to you and your posterity happiness at home, and national dignity and respect from abroad, adopt it—if it will not, reject it with indignation—better to be where you are, for the present, than insecure forever afterwards. Turn your eyes to the United Netherlands, at this moment, and view their situation; compare it with what yours may be, under a government substantially similar to theirs. 2.6.4

Beware of those who wish to influence your passions, and to make you 2.6.5

dupes to their resentments and little interests—personal invectives can never persuade, but they always fix prejudices which candor might have removed—those who deal in them have not your happiness at heart. Attach yourselves to measures, not to men.

2.6.6 This form of government is handed to you by the recommendations of a man who merits the confidence of the public; but you ought to recollect, that the wisest and best of men may err, and their errors, if adopted, may be fatal to the community; therefore, in principles of politics, as well as in religious faith, every man ought to think for himself.

Hereafter, when it will be necessary, I shall make such observations, on this new constitution, as will tend to promote your welfare, and be justified by reason and truth.

Cato.

Sept. 26, 1787.

II

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

Remember, O my friends! the laws, the rights,
The generous plan of power deliver'd down,
By your renown'd Forefathers;
So dearly bought, the price of so much blood!
O let it never perish in your hands!
But piously transmit it to your children.[2]

2.6.7 The object of my last address to you was to engage your dispassionate consideration of the new Foederal government; to caution you against precipitancy in the adoption of it; to recommend a correction of its errors, if it contained any; to hint to you the danger of an easy perversion of some of its powers; to solicit you to separate yourselves from party, and to be independent of and uninfluenced by any in your principles of politics: and, that address was closed with a promise of future observations on the same subject which should be justified by reason and truth. Here I intended to have rested the introduction, but a writer under the signature of CAESAR, in Mr. Childs's paper of the 1st instant, who treats you with passion, insult, and threat has anticipated those observations which would otherwise have remained in silence until a future period.[3] It would be criminal in me to hesitate a moment to appear as your advocate in so interesting a cause, and to resist the influence of such doctrines as this Caesar holds.—I shall take no other cognizance of his remarks on the questionable shape of my future, or the equivocal appearance of my past reflections, than to declare, that in my past I did not mean to be misunderstood (for Caesar himself declares, that it is obviously the language of distrust) and that in my future there will not be the semblance of doubt. But, what is the language of Caesar[4]—he ridicules your prerogative, power, and majesty—he talks of this proferred constitution as the tender mercy of a benevolent sovereign to deluded subjects, or, as his tyrant name-sake, of his proferred grace to the virtuous Cato:—he shuts the door of free deliberation and discussion, and declares, that you must receive this government in manner and form as it is proferred—that you cannot revise nor amend it, and lastly, to close the scene, he insinuates, that it will be more healthy for you that the American Fabius should be induced to accept of the presidency of this new government than that, in case you do not acquiesce, he should be solicited to command an army to impose it on you. Is not your indignation roused at this absolute, imperious stile?—For what did you open the veins of your citizens and expend their treasure?—For what did you throw off the yoke of Britain and call yourselves independent?[5]—Was it from a disposition fond of change, or to procure new masters?—if those were your motives, you have your reward before you—go,—retire into silent obscurity, and kiss the rod that scourges you—bury the prospects you had in store, that you and your posterity would participate in the blessings of freedom, and the employments of your country—let the rich and insolent alone be your rulers—perhaps you are designed by providence as an emphatic evidence of the mutability of human affairs, to have the shew of happiness only, that your misery may seem the sharper, and if so, you must submit. But, if you had nobler views, and you are not designed by heaven as an example—are you now to be derided and insulted?—Is the power of thinking, on the only subject important to you, to be taken away? and if per chance you should happen to dissent from Caesar, are you to have Caesar's principles crammed down your throats with an army?—God forbid!

In democratic republics the people collectively are considered as the sovereign—all legislative, judicial, and executive power, is inherent in and derived from them. As a people, your power and authority have sanctioned and established the present government—your executive, legislative, and judicial acknowledge it by their public acts—you are again solicited to sanction and establish the future one—yet this Caesar mocks your dignity and laughs at the majesty of the people.[6] Caesar, with his usual dogmatism, enquires, if I had talents to throw light on the subject of legislation, why did I not offer them when the Convention was in session?—he is answered in a moment—I thought with him and you, that the wisdom of America, in that Convention, was drawn as it were to a Focus—I placed an unbounded confidence in some of the characters who were members of it, from the services they had rendered their country, without adverting to the ambitious and interested views of others. I was willingly led to expect a model of 2.6.8

perfection and security that would have astonished the world. Therefore, to have offered observation, on the subject of legislation, under these impressions, would have discovered no less arrogance than Caesar. The Convention too, when in session, shut their doors to the observations of the community, and their members were under an obligation of secrecy—Nothing transpired—to have suggested remarks on unknown and anticipated principles would have been like a man groping in the dark, and folly in the extreme. I confess, however, I have been disappointed, and Caesar is candid enough to make the same declaration, for he thinks it might have been more perfect.

2.6.9 But to call in dispute, at this time, and in the manner Caesar does, the right of free deliberation on this subject, is like a man's propounding a question to another, and telling him, at the same time, that if he does not answer agreeable to the opinion of the propounder, he will exert force to make him of the same sentiment:—to exemplify this, it will be necessary to give you a short history of the rise and progress of the Convention, and the conduct of Congress thereon. The states in Congress suggested, that the articles of confederation had provided for making alterations in the confederation—that there were defects therein, and as a mean to remedy which, a Convention of delegates, appointed by the different states, was resolved expedient to be held for the sole and express purpose of revising it, and reporting to Congress and the different legislatures such alterations and provisions therein as should (when agreed to in Congress and confirmed by the several states) render the foederal constitution adequate to the exigencies of government. This resolution is sent to the different states, and the legislature of this state, with others, appoint, in conformity thereto, delegates for the purpose, and in the words mentioned in that resolve, as by the resolution of Congress, and the concurrent resolutions of the senate and assembly of this state, subjoined, will appear.[7] For the sole and express purpose aforesaid a Convention of delegates is formed at Philadelphia:—what have they done? have they revised the confederation, and has Congress agreed to their report?—neither is the fact.—This Convention have exceeded the authority given to them, and have transmitted to Congress a new political fabric, essentially and fundamentally distinct and different from it, in which the different states do not retain separately their sovereignty and independency, united by a confederated league—but one entire sovereignty—a consolidation of them into one government—in which new provisions and powers are not made and vested in Congress, but in an assembly, senate, and president, who are not know in the articles of confederation.—Congress, without agreeing to, or approving of, this system proferred by the Convention, have sent it to the different legislatures, not for their confirmation, but to submit it to the people; not in conformity to their own resolution, but in conformity to the resolution of the Convention made and provided in that case. Was it then, from the face of the foregoing facts, the intention of Congress, and of this and the other states, that the essence of our present national government should be annihilated, or that it should be retained and only [have] an increase of substantial necessary powers? Congress, sensible of this latter principle, and that the Convention had taken on themselves a power which neither they nor the other states had a right to delegate to them, and that they could not agree to, and approve of this consolidated system, nor the states confirm it—have been silent on its character; and though many have dwelt on their unanimity, it is no less than the unanimity of opinion that it originated in an assumption of power, which your voice alone can sanctify. This new government, therefore, founded in usurpation, is referred to your opinion as the origin of power not heretofore delegated, and, to this end, the exercise of the prerogative of free examination is essentially necessary; and yet you are unhesitatingly to acquiesce, and if you do not, the American Fabius, if we may believe Caesar, is to command an army to impose it. It is not my view to rouse your passions, I only wish to excite you to, and assist you in, a cool and deliberate discussion of the subject, to urge you to behave like sensible freemen. Think, speak, act, and assert your opinions and rights—let the same good sense govern you with respect to the adoption of a future system for the administration of your public affairs that influenced you in the formation of the present.—Hereafter I do not intend to be diverted by either Caesar, or any other—My object is to take up this new form of national government—compare it with the experience and the opinions of the most sensible and approved political authors—and to shew, that its principles, and the exercise of them, will be dangerous to your liberty and happiness.

Cato.

III

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

In the close of my last introductory address, I told you, that my object in future would be to take up this new form of national government, to compare it with the experience and opinions of the most sensible and approved political authors, and to show you that its principles, and the exercise of them [,] will be dangerous to your liberty and happiness. 2.6.10

Although I am conscious that this is an arduous undertaking, yet I will perform it to the best of my ability.

The freedom, equality, and independence which you enjoyed by nature, 2.6.11 induced you to consent to a political power. The same principles led you to examine the errors and vices of a British superintendence, to divest yourselves of it, and to reassume a new political shape. It is acknowledged that there are defects in this, and another is tendered to you for acceptance; the great question then, that arises on this new political principle, is, whether it will answer the ends for which it is said to be offered to you, and for which all men engage in political society, to wit, the mutual preservation of their lives, liberties, and estates.

2.6.12 The recital, or premises on which this new form of government is erected, declares a consolidation or union of all the thirteen parts, or states, into one great whole, under the firm [form?] of the United States, for all the various and important purposes therein set forth.—But whoever seriously considers the immense extent of territory comprehended within the limits of the United States, together with the variety of its climates, productions, and commerce, the difference of extent, and number of inhabitants in all; the dissimilitude of interest, morals, and policies, in almost every one, will receive it as an intuitive truth, that a consolidated republican form of government therein, can never form a perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to you and your posterity, for to these objects it must be directed: this unkindred legislature therefore, composed of interests opposite and dissimilar in their nature, will in its exercise, emphatically be, like a house divided against itself.

2.6.13 The governments of Europe have taken their limits and form from adventitious circumstances, and nothing can be argued on the motive of agreement from them; but these adventitious political principles, have nevertheless produced effects that have attracted the attention of philosophy, which has established axioms in the science of politics therefrom, as irrefragable as any in Euclid. It is natural, says Montesquieu, to a republic to have only a small territory, otherwise it cannot long subsist: in a large one, there are men of large fortunes, and consequently of less moderation; there are too great deposits to intrust in the hands of a single subject, an ambitious person soon becomes sensible that he may be happy, great, and glorious by oppressing his fellow citizens, and that he might raise himself to grandeur, on the ruins of his country. In large republics, the public good is sacrificed to a thousand views; in a small one the interest of the public is easily perceived, better understood, and more within the reach of every citizen; abuses have a less extent, and of course are less protected—he also shews you, that the duration of the republic of Sparta, was owing to its having continued with the same extent of territory after all its wars; and that the ambition of Athens and Lacedemon to command and direct the union, lost them their liberties, and gave them a monarchy.[8]

2.6.14 From this picture, what can you promise yourselves, on the score of consolidation of the United States, into one government—impracticability in the just exercise of it—your freedom insecure—even this form of government limited in its continuance—the employments of your country disposed of to the opulent, to whose contumely you will continually be an object—you must risque much, by indispensably placing trusts of the greatest magnitude, into the hands of individuals, whose ambition for power, and aggrandizement, will oppress and grind you—where, from the vast extent of your territory, and the complication of interests, the science of government will become intricate and perplexed, and too misterious for you to understand, and observe; and by which you are to be conducted into a monarchy, either limited or despotic; the latter, Mr. Locke remarks, is a government derived from neither nature, nor compact.[9]

Political liberty, the great Montesquieu again observes, consists in security, or at least in the opinion we have of security;[10] and this security therefore, or the opinion, is best obtained in moderate governments, where the mildness of the laws, and the equality of the manners, beget a confidence in the people, which produces this security, or the opinion. This moderation in governments, depends in a great measure on their limits, connected with their political distribution. 2.6.15

The extent of many of the states in the Union, is at this time, almost too great for the superintendence of a republican form of government, and must one day or other, revolve into more vigorous ones, or by separation be reduced into smaller, and more useful, as well as moderate ones.[11] You have already observed the feeble efforts of Massachusetts against their insurgents; with what difficulty did they quell that insurrection; and is not the province of Main at this moment, on the eve of separation from her. The reason of these things is, that for the security of the property of the community, in which expressive term Mr. Lock makes life, liberty, and estate, to consist[12]—the wheels of a free republic are necessarily slow in their operation; hence in large free republics, the evil sometimes is not only begun, but almost completed, before they are in a situation to turn the current into a contrary progression: the extremes are also too remote from the usual seat of government, and the laws therefore too feeble to afford protection to all its parts, and insure domestic tranquility without the aid of another principle. If, therefore, this state, and that of N. Carolina, had an army under their controul, they never would have lost Vermont, and Frankland, nor the state of Massachusetts suffer an insurrection, or the dismemberment of her fairest district, but the exercise of a principle which would have prevented these things, if we may believe the experience of ages, would have ended in the destruction of their liberties. 2.6.16

Will this consolidated republic, if established, in its exercise beget such confidence and compliance, among the citizens of these states, as to do without the aid of a standing army—I deny that it will.—The mal-contents in 2.6.17 each state, who will not be a few, nor the least important, will be exciting factions against it—the fear of a dismemberment of some of its parts, and the necessity to enforce the execution of revenue laws (a fruitful source of oppression) on the extremes and in the other districts of the government, will incidentally, and necessarily require a permanent force, to be kept on foot—will not political security, and even the opinion of it, be extinguished? can mildness and moderation exist in a government, where the primary incident in its exercise must be force? will not violence destroy confidence, and can equality subsist, where the extent, policy, and practice of it, will naturally lead to make odious distinctions among citizens?

2.6.18 The people, who may compose this national legislature from the southern states, in which, from the mildness of the climate, the fertility of the soil, and the value of its productions, wealth is rapidly acquired, and where the same causes naturally lead to luxury, dissipation, and a passion for aristocratic distinctions; where slavery is encouraged, and liberty of course, less respected, and protected; who know not what it is to acquire property by their own toil, nor to oeconomise with the savings of industry—will these men therefore be as tenacious of the liberties and interests of the more northern states, where freedom, independence, industry, equality, and frugality, are natural to the climate and soil, as men who are your own citizens, legislating in your own state, under your inspection, and whose manners, and fortunes, bear a more equal resemblance to your own?[13]

2.6.19 It may be suggested, in answer to this, that whoever is a citizen of one state, is a citizen of each, and that therefore he will be as interested in the happiness and interest of all, as the one he is delegated from; but the argument is fallacious, and, whoever has attended to the history of mankind, and the principles which bind them together as parents, citizens, or men, will readily perceive it. These principles are, in their exercise, like a pebble cast on the calm surface of a river, the circles begin in the center, and are small, active, and forcible, but as they depart from that point, they lose their force, and vanish into calmness.

2.6.20 The strongest principle of union resides within our domestic walls. The ties of the parent exceed that of any other; as we depart from home, the next general principle of union is amongst citizens of the same state, where acquaintance, habits, and fortunes, nourish affection, and attachment; enlarge the circle still further, and, as citizens of different states, though we acknowledge the same national denomination, we lose the ties of acquaintance, habits, and fortunes, and thus, by degrees, we lessen in our attachments, till, at length, we no more than acknowledge a sameness of species. Is it therefore, from certainty like this, reasonable to believe, that inhabitants of Georgia, or New-Hampshire, will have the same obligations towards you as your own, and preside over your lives, liberties, and property, with the same care and attachment? Intuitive reason, answers in the negative.[14]

In the course of my examination of the principals of consolidation of the states into one general government, many other reasons against it have occurred, but I flatter myself, from those herein offered to your consideration, I have convinced you that it is both presumptuous and impracticable consistent with your safety. To detain you with further remarks, would be useless—I shall however, continue in my following numbers, to anilise this new government, pursuant to my promise. 2.6.21

Cato.

IV

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

Admitting, however, that the vast extent of America, together with the various other reasons which I offered you in my last number, against the practicability of the just exercise of the new government are insufficient to convince you; still it is an undeniable truth, that its several parts are either possessed of principles, which you have heretofore considered as ruinous, and that others are omitted which you have established as fundamental to your political security, and must in their operation, I will venture to assert—fetter your tongues and minds, enchain your bodies, and ultimately extinguish all that is great and noble in man. 2.6.22

In pursuance of my plan, I shall begin with observations on the executive branch of this new system; and though it is not the first in order, as arranged therein, yet being the chief, is perhaps entitled by the rules of rank to the first consideration. The executive power as described in the 2d article, consists of a president and vice-president, who are to hold their offices during the term of four years; the same article has marked the manner and time of their election, and established the qualifications of the president; it also provides against the removal, death, or inability of the president and vice-president—regulates the salary of the president, delineates his duties and powers; and lastly, declares the causes for which the president and vice-president shall be removed from office. 2.6.23

Notwithstanding the great learning and abilities of the gentlemen who composed the convention, it may be here remarked with deference, that the construction of the first paragraph of the first section of the second article, is vague and inexplicit, and leaves the mind in doubt, as to the election of a president and vice-president, after the expiration of the election for the first term of four years—in every other case, the election of these great officers is expressly provided for; but there is no explicit provision for their election in case of the expiration of their offices, subsequent to the election which is to 2.6.24 set this political machine in motion—no certain and express terms as in your state constitution, that statedly once in every four years, and as often as these offices shall become vacant, by expiration or otherwise, as is therein expressed, an election shall be held as follows, etc.—this inexplicitness perhaps may lead to an establishment for life.

2.6.25 It is remarked by Montesquieu, in treating of republics, that in all magistracies, the greatness of the power must be compensated by the brevity of the duration; and that a longer time than a year, would be dangerous.[15] It is therefore obvious to the least intelligent mind, to account why, great power in the hands of a magistrate, and that power connected, with a considerable duration, may be dangerous to the liberties of a republic—the deposit of vast trusts in the hands of a single magistrate, enables him in their exercise, to create a numerous train of dependants—this tempts his ambition, which in a republican magistrate is also remarked, to be pernicious and the duration of his office for any considerable time favours his views, gives him the means and time to perfect and execute his designs—he therefore fancies that he may be great and glorious by oppressing his fellow citizens, and raising himself to permanent grandeur on the ruins of his country.[16]—And here it may be necessary to compare the vast and important powers of the president, together with his continuance in office with the foregoing doctrine—his eminent magisterial situation will attach many adherents to him, and he will be surrounded by expectants and courtiers—his power of nomination and influence on all appointments—the strong posts in each state comprised within his superintendance, and garrisoned by troops under his direction—his controul over the army, militia, and navy—the unrestrained power of granting pardons for treason, which may be used to screen from punishment, those whom he had secretly instigated to commit the crime, and thereby prevent a discovery of his own guilt—his duration in office for four years: these, and various other principles evidently prove the truth of the position—that if the president is possessed of ambition, he has power and time sufficient to ruin his country.[17]

2.6.26 Though the president, during the sitting of the legislature, is assisted by the senate, yet he is without a constitutional council in their recess—he will therefore be unsupported by proper information and advice, and will generally be directed by minions and favorites, or a council of state will grow out of the principal officers of the great departments, the most dangerous council in a free country.

2.6.27 The ten miles square, which is to become the seat of government, will of course be the place of residence for the president and the great officers of state—the same observations of a great man will apply to the court of a president possessing the powers of a monarch, that is observed of that of a monarch—ambition with idleness—baseness with pride—the thirst of riches without labour—aversion to truth—flattery—treason—perfidy—violation of engagements—contempt of civil duties—hope from the magistrate's weakness; but above all, the perpetual ridicule of virtue—these, he remarks, are the characteristics by which the courts in all ages have been distinguished.[18]

2.6.28 The language and the manners of this court will be what distinguishes them from the rest of the community, not what assimilates them to it, and in being remarked for a behaviour that shews they are not meanly born, and in adulation to people of fortune and power.

2.6.29 The establishment of a vice-president is as unnecessary as it is dangerous. This officer, for want of other employment, is made president of the senate, thereby blending the executive and legislative powers, besides always giving to some one state, from which he is to come, an unjust pre-eminence.

2.6.30 It is a maxim in republics, that the representative of the people should be of their immediate choice; but by the manner in which the president is chosen he arrives to this office at the fourth or fifth hand, nor does the highest vote, in the way he is elected, determine the choice—for it is only necessary that he should be taken from the highest of five, who may have a plurality of votes.

2.6.31 Compare your past opinions and sentiments with the present proposed establishment, and you will find, that if you adopt it, that it will lead you into a system which you heretofore reprobated as odious. Every American whig, not long since, bore his emphatic testimony against a monarchical government, though limited, because of the dangerous inequality that it created among citizens as relative to their rights and property;[19] and wherein does this president, invested with his powers and prerogatives, essentially differ from the king of Great-Britain (save as to name, the creation of nobility and some immaterial incidents, the offspring of absurdity and locality)[. T]he direct prerogatives of the president, as springing from his political character, are among the following:—It is necessary, in order to distinguish him from the rest of the community, and enable him to keep, and maintain his court, that the compensation for his services; or in other words, his revenue should be such as to enable him to appear with the splendor of a prince; he has the power of receiving embassadors from, and a great influence on their appointments to foreign courts; as also to make treaties, leagues, and alliances with foreign states, assisted by the senate, which when made, become the supreme law of the land: he is a constituent part of the legislative power; for every bill which shall pass the house of representatives and senate, is to be presented to him for approbation; if he approves of it, he is to sign it, if he disapproves, he is to return it with objections, which in many cases will amount to a compleat negative; and in this view he will have a great share in the power of making peace, coining money, etc. and all the various objects of legislation, expressed or implied in this Constitution: for though it may be asserted that the king of Great-Britain has the express power of making peace or war, yet he never thinks it prudent so to do without the advice of his parliament from whom he is to derive his support, and therefore these powers, in both president and king, are substantially the same: he is the generalissimo of the nation, and of course, has the command and controul of the army, navy and militia; he is the general conservator of the peace of the union—he may pardon all offences, except in cases of impeachment, and the principal fountain of all offices and employments. Will not the exercise of these powers therefore tend either to the establishment of a vile and arbitrary aristocracy, or monarchy? The safety of the people in a republic depends on the share or proportion they have in the government; but experience ought to teach you, that when a man is at the head of an elective government invested with great powers, and interested in his re-election, in what circle appointments will be made; by which means an imperfect aristocracy bordering on monarchy may be established.

2.6.32 You must, however, my countrymen, beware, that the advocates of this new system do not deceive you, by a fallacious resemblance between it and your own state government, which you so much prize;[20] and if you examine, you will perceive that the chief magistrate of this state, is your immediate choice, controuled and checked by a just and full representation of the people, divested of the prerogative of influencing war and peace, making treaties, receiving and sending embassies, and commanding standing armies and navies, which belong to the power of the confederation, and will be convinced that this government is no more like a true picture of your own, than an Angel of darkness resembles an Angel of light.

Cato.

V

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

2.6.33 In my last number I endeavored to prove that the language of the article relative to the establishment of the executive of this new government was vague and inexplicit, that the great powers of the President, connected with his duration in office would lead to oppression and ruin. That he would be governed by favorites and flatterers, or that a dangerous council would be collected from the great officers of state;—that the ten miles square, if the remarks of one of the wisest men, drawn from the experience of mankind, may be credited, would be the asylum of the base, idle, avaricious and ambitious, and that the court would possess a language and manners different from yours; that a vice-president is as unnecessary, as he is dangerous in his influence—that the president cannot represent you because he is not of your own immediate choice, that if you adopt this government, you will incline to an arbitrary and odious aristocracy or monarchy—that the president possessed of the power, given him by this frame of government differs but very immaterially from the establishment of monarchy in Great Britain, and I warned you to beware of the fallacious resemblance that is held out to you by the advocates of this new system between it and your own state governments.

And here I cannot help remarking, that inexplicitness seems to pervade this whole political fabric: certainty in political compacts, which Mr. Coke calls the mother and nurse of repose and quietness,[21] the want of which induced men to engage in political society, has ever been held by a wise and free people as essential to their security; as, on the one hand it fixes barriers which the ambitious and tyrannically disposed magistrate dare not overleap, and on the other, becomes a wall of safety to the community—otherwise stipulations between the governors and governed are nugatory; and you might as well deposit the important powers of legislation and execution in one or a few and permit them to govern according to their disposition and will; but the world is too full of examples, which prove that to live by one man's will became the cause of all men's misery.[22] Before the existence of express political compacts it was reasonably implied that the magistrate should govern with wisdom and justice, but mere implication was too feeble to restrain the unbridled ambition of a bad man, or afford security against negligence, cruelty, or any other defect of mind. It is alledged that the opinions and manners of the people of America, are capable to resist and prevent an extension of prerogative or oppression; but you must recollect that opinion and manners are mutable, and may not always be a permanent obstruction against the encroachments of government; that the progress of a commercial society begets luxury, the parent of inequality, the foe to virtue, and the enemy to restraint; and that ambition and voluptuousness aided by flattery, will teach magistrates, where limits are not explicitly fixed to have separate and distinct interests from the people, besides it will not be denied that government assimilates the manners and opinions of the community to it.[23] Therefore, a general presumption that rulers will govern well is not a sufficient security.—You are then under a sacred obligation to provide for the safety of your posterity, and would you now basely desert their interests, when by a small share of prudence you may transmit to them a beautiful political patrimony, which will prevent the necessity of their travelling through seas of blood to obtain that, which your wisdom might have secured:—It is a duty you owe likewise to your own reputation, for you have a great name to lose; you are characterised as cautious, prudent and jealous in politics; whence is it therefore, that you are about to precipitate yourselves into a sea of uncertainty, and adopt a system so vague, and which has discarded so many of your valuable rights:—Is it because you do not believe that an American can be a tyrant? If this be the case you rest on a weak basis[;] Americans are like other men in similar situations, when the manners and opinions of the community are changed by the causes I mentioned before, and your political compact inexplicit, your posterity will find that great power connected with ambition, luxury, and flattery, will as readily produce a Caesar, Caligula, Nero, and Domitian in America, as the same causes did in the Roman empire.

2.6.34

2.6.35 But the next thing to be considered in conformity to my plan, is the first article of this new government, which comprises the erection of the house of representatives and senate, and prescribes their various powers and objects of legislation. The most general objections to the first article, are that biennial elections for representatives are a departure from the safe democratical principles of annual ones—that the number of representatives are too few; that the apportionment and principles of increase are unjust; that no attention has been paid to either the numbers or property in each state in forming the senate; that the mode in which they are appointed and their duration, will lead to the establishment of an aristocracy; that the senate and president are improperly connected, both as to appointments, and the making of treaties, which are to become the supreme law of the land; that the judicial in some measure, to wit, as to the trial of impeachments[,] is placed in the senate[,] a branch of the legislative, and some times a branch of the executive: that Congress have the improper power of making or altering the regulations prescribed by the different legislatures, respecting the time, place, and manner of holding elections for representatives, and the time and manner of choosing senators; that standing armies may be established, and appropriation of money made for their support for two years; that the militia of the most remote state may be marched into those states situated at the opposite extreme of this continent; that the slave trade is, to all intents and purposes permanently established; and a slavish capitation, or poll-tax, may at any time be levied—these are some of the many evils that will attend the adoption of this government.

2.6.36 But with respect to the first objection, it may be remarked that a well digested democracy has this advantage over all others, to wit, that it affords to many the opportunity to be advanced to the supreme command, and the honors they thereby enjoy fill them with a desire of rendering themselves worthy of them; hence this desire becomes part of their education, is matured in manhood, and produces an ardent affection for their country, and it is the opinion of the great Sidney, and Montesquieu that this is in a great measure produced by annual election of magistrates.[24]

2.6.37 If annual elections were to exist in this government, and learning and information to become more prevalent, you never will want men to execute whatever you could design—Sidney observes that a well governed state is as fruitful to all good purposes as the seven headed serpent is said to have been in evil; when one head is cut off, many rise up in the place of it. He remarks further, that it was also thought, that free cities by frequent elections of magistrates became nurseries of great and able men, every man endeavoring to excel others, that he might be advanced to the honor he had no other title to, than what might arise from his merit, or reputation,[25] but the framers of this perfect government, as it is called, have departed from this democratical principle, and established bi-ennial elections for the house of representatives, who are to be chosen by the people, and sextennial for the senate, who are to be chosen by the legislatures of the different states, and have given to the executive the unprecedented power of making temporary senators, in case of vacancies, by resignation or otherwise,[26] and so far forth establishing a precedent for virtual representation (though in fact, their original appointment is virtual) thereby influencing the choice of the legislatures, or if they should not be so complaisant as to conform to his appointment—offence will be given to the executive and the temporary members will appear ridiculous by rejection; this temporary member, during his time of appointment, will of course act by a power derived from the executive, and for, and under his immediate influence.

It is a very important objection to this government, that the representation consists of so few; too few to resist the influence of corruption, and the temptation to treachery, against which all governments ought to take precautions—how guarded you have been on this head, in your own state constitution, and yet the number of senators and representatives proposed for this vast continent, does not equal those of your own state; how great the disparity, if you compare them with the aggregate numbers in the United States. The history of representation in England, from which we have taken our model of legislation, is briefly this[:] before the institution of legislating by deputies, the whole free part of the community usually met for that purpose; when this became impossible, by the increase of numbers the community was divided into districts, from each of which was sent such a number of deputies as was a complete representation of the various numbers and orders of citizens within them; but can it be asserted with truth, that six men can be a complete and full representation of the numbers and various orders of the people in this state?[27] Another thing [that] may be suggested against the small number of representatives is, that but few of you will have the chance of sharing even in this branch of the legislature; and that the choice will be confined to a very few; the more complete it is, the better will your interests be preserved, and the greater the opportunity you will have to participate in government, one of the principal securities of a free people; but this subject has been so ably and fully treated by a writer under the signature of Brutus,[28] that I shall content myself with referring you to him thereon, reserving further observations on the other objections I have mentioned, for my future numbers. 2.6.38

Cato.

VI

To the People of the State of New-York.

2.6.39 The next objection that arises against this proferred constitution is, that the apportionment of representatives and direct taxes are unjust.—The words as expressed in this article are, "representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included in this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed[,] three fifths of all other persons." In order to elucidate this, it will be necessary to repeat the remark in my last number, that the mode of legislation in the infancy of free communities was by the collective body, and this consisted of free persons, or those whose age admitted them to the rights of mankind and citizenship—whose sex made them capable of protecting the state, and whose birth may be denominated Free Born, and no traces can be found that ever women, children, and slaves, or those who were not sui juris, in the early days of legislation, meeting with the free members of the community to deliberate on public measures; hence is derived this maxim in free governments, that representation ought to bear a proportion to the number of free inhabitants in a community; this principle your own state constitution, and others, have observed in the establishment of a future census, in order to apportion the representatives, and to increase or diminish the representation to the ratio of the increase or diminution of electors. But, what aid can the community derive from the assistance of women, infants, and slaves, in their deliberation, or in their defence? and what motive therefore could the convention have in departing from the just and rational principle of representation, which is the governing principle of this state and of all America.

2.6.40 The doctrine of taxation is a very important one, and nothing requires more wisdom and prudence than the regulation of that portion, which is taken from, and of that which is left to, the subject—and if you anticipate, what will be the enormous expence of this new government added also to your own, little will that portion be which will be left to you. I know there are politicians who believe, that you should be loaded with taxes, in order to make you industrious, and, perhaps, there are some of this opinion in the convention, but it is an erroneous principle—For, what can inspire you with industry, if the greatest measures of your labours are to be swallowed up in taxes? The advocates for this new system hold out an idea, that you will have but little to pay, for, that the revenues will be so managed as to be almost wholly drawn from the source of trade or duties on imports, but this is delusive—for this government to discharge all its incidental expences, besides paying the interests on the home and foreign debts, will require more money than its commerce can afford; and if you reflect one moment, you will find, that if heavy duties are laid on merchandize, as must be the case, if government intend to make this the prime medium to lighten the people of taxes, that the price of the commodities, useful as well as luxurious, must be increased; the consumers will be fewer; the merchants must import less; trade will languish, and this source of revenue in a great measure be dried up; but if you examine this a little further, you will find, that this revenue, managed in this way, will come out of you and be a very heavy and ruinous one, at least—The merchant no more than advances the money for you to the public, and will not, nor cannot pay any part of it himself, and if he pays more duties, he will sell his commodities at a price portionably raised—thus the laborer, mechanic, and farmer, must feel it in the purchase of their utensils and clothing—wages, etc. must rise with the price of things, or they must be ruined. [A]nd that must be the case with the farmer, whose produce will not increase, in the ratio, with labour, utensils, and clothing; for that he must sell at the usual price or lower, perhaps caused by the decrease of trade; the consequence will be, that he must mortgage his farm, and then comes inevitable bankruptcy.

In what manner then will you be eased, if the expences of government are 2.6.41 to be raised solely out of the commerce of this country; do you not readily apprehend the fallacy of this argument. But government will find, that to press so heavily on commerce will not do, and therefore must have recourse to other objects; these will be a capitation or poll-tax, window lights, etc. etc. and a long train of impositions which their ingenuity will suggest; but will you submit to be numbered like the slaves of an arbitrary despot; and what will be your reflections when the taxmaster thunders at your door for the duty on that light which is the bounty of heaven. It will be the policy of the great landholders who will chiefly compose this senate, and perhaps a majority of this house of representatives, to keep their lands free from taxes; and this is confirmed by the failure of every attempt to lay a land-tax in this state; hence recourse must and will be had to the sources I mentioned before. The burdens on you will be insupportable—your complaints will be inefficacious—this will beget public disturbances, and I will venture to predict, without the spirit of prophecy, that you and the government, if it is adopted, will one day be at issue on this point. The force of government will be exerted, this will call for an increase of revenue, and will add fuel to the fire. The result will be, that either you will revolve to some other form, or that government will give peace to the country, by destroying the opposition. If government therefore can, notwithstanding every opposition, raise a revenue on such things as are odious and burdensome to you, they can do any thing.

But why should the number of individuals be the principle to apportion 2.6.42 the taxes in each state, and to include in that number, women, children and slaves. The most natural and equitable principle of apportioning taxes, would be in a ratio to their property, and a reasonable impost in a ratio to their trade; but you are told to look for the reason of these things in accommodation; but this much admired principle, when strip[p]ed of its mistery, will in this case appear to be no less than a basis for an odious poll-tax—the offspring of despotic governments, a thing so detestable, that the state of Maryland, in their bill of rights, declares, "that the levying taxes by the poll, is grievous and oppressive, and ought to be abolished."—A poll-tax is at all times oppressive to the poor, and their greatest misfortune will consist in having more prolific wives than the rich.[29]

2.6.43 In every civilized community, even in those of the most democratic kind, there are principles which lead to an aristocracy—these are superior talents, fortunes, and public employments.[30] But in free governments, the influence of the two former is resisted by the equality of the laws, and the latter by the frequency of elections, and the chance that every one has in sharing in public business; but when this natural and artificial eminence is assisted by principles interwoven in this government—when the senate, so important a branch of the legislature, is so far removed from the people, as to have little or no connexion with them; when their duration in office is such as to have the resemblance of perpetuity, when they are connected with the executive, by the appointment of all officers, and also, to become a judiciary for the trial of officers of their own appointments: added to all this, when none but men of oppulence will hold a seat, what is there left to resist and repel this host of influence and power. Will the feeble efforts of the house of representatives, in whom your security ought to subsist, consisting of about seventy-three, be able to hold the balance against them, when, from the fewness of the number in this house, the senate will have in their power to poison even a majority of that body by douceurs of office for themselves or friends. From causes like this both Montesquieu and Hume have predicted the decline of the British government into that of an absolute one;[31] but the liberties of this country, it is probable if this system is adopted, will be strangled in their birth; for whenever the executive and senate can destroy the independence of the majority in the house of representatives then where is your security?—They are so intimately connected, that their interests will be one and the same; and will the slow increase of numbers be able to afford a repelling principle? but you are told to adopt this government first, and you will always be able to alter it afterwards; this would be first submitting to be slaves and then taking care of your liberty; and when your chains are on, then to act like freemen.

2.6.44 Complete acts of legislation, which are to become the supreme law of the land, ought to be the united act of all the branches of government; but there is one of the most important duties [that] may be managed by the senate and executive alone, and to have all the force of the law paramount without the aid or interference of the house of representatives; that is the power of making treaties. This power is a very important one, and may be exercised in various ways, so as to affect your person and property, and even the domain of the nation. By treaties you may defalcate part of the empire; engagements may be made to raise an army, and you may be transported to Europe, to fight the wars of ambitious princes; money may be contracted for, and you must pay it; and a thousand other obligations may be entered into; all which will become the supreme law of the land, and you are bound by it. If treaties are erroneously or wickedly made who is there to punish—the executive can always cover himself with the plea, that he was advised by the senate; and the senate being a collective body are not easily made accountable for mal-administration. On this account we are in a worse situation than Great-Britain, where they have secured by a ridiculous fiction, the King from accountability, by declaring that he can do no wrong, by which means the nation can have redress against his minister; but with us infalibility pervades every part of the system, and neither the executive nor his council, who are a collective body, and his advisers, can be brought to punishment for mal-administration.

Cato.

VII

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

2.6.45

That the senate and president are further improperly connected, will appear, if it is considered, that their dependence on each other will prevent either from being a check upon the other; they must act in concert, and whether the power and influence of the one or the other is to prevail, will depend on the character and abilities of the men who hold those offices at the time. The senate is vested with such a proportion of the executive, that it would be found necessary that they should be constantly sitting. This circumstance did not escape the convention, and they have provided for the event, in the 2d article, which declares, that the executive may, on extraordinary occasions, convene both houses or either of them. No occasion can exist for calling the assembly without the senate; the words or either of them, must have been intended to apply only to the senate. Their wages are already provided for; and it will be therefore readily observed, that the partition between a perpetuation of their sessions and a perpetuation of their offices, in the progress of the government, will be found to be but thin and feeble. Besides, the senate, who have the sole power to try all impeachments, in case of the impeachment of the president, are to determine, as judges, the propriety of the advice they gave him, as senators. Can the senate in this, therefore, be an impartial judicature? And will they not rather serve as a screen to great public defaulters?

2.6.46 Among the many evils that are incorporated in this new system of government, is that of congress having the power of making or altering the regulations prescribed by the different legislatures, respecting the time, place, and manner of holding elections for representatives, and the time, and manner of choosing senators. If it is enquired, in what manner this regulation may be exercised to your injury—the answer is easy.

2.6.47 By the first article the house of representatives shall consist of members, chosen every second year by the people of the several states, who are qualified to vote for members of their several state assemblies; it can therefore readily be believed, that the different state legislatures, provided such can exist after the adoption of this government, will continue those easy and convenient modes for the election of representatives for the national legislature, that are in use, for the election of members of assembly for their own states; but the congress have, by the constitution, a power to make other regulations, or alter those in practice, prescribed by your own state legislatures; hence, instead of having the places of elections in the precincts, and brought home almost to your own doors, Congress may establish a place, or places, at either the extremes, center, or outer parts of the states; at a time and season too, when it may be very inconvenient to attend; and by these means destroy the rights of election; but in opposition to this reasoning, it is asserted, that it is a necessary power because the states might omit making rules for the purpose, and thereby defeat the existence of that branch of the government; this is what logicians call argumentum absurdum, for the different states, if they will have any security at all in this government, will find it in the house of representatives, and they, therefore, would not be very ready to eradicate a principle in which it dwells, or involve their country in an instantaneous revolution. Besides, if this was the apprehension of the framers, and the ground of that provision, why did not they extend this controuling power to the other duties of the several state legislatures. To exemplify this the states are to appoint senators, and electors for choosing of a president; but the time is to be under the direction of congress. Now, suppose they were to omit the appointment of senators and electors, though congress was to appoint the time, which might [as] well be apprehended as the omission of regulations for the election of members of the house of representatives, provided they had that power; or suppose they were not to meet at all: of course, the government cannot proceed in its exercise. And from this motive, or apprehension, congress ought to have taken these duties entirely in their own hands, and, by a decisive declaration, annihilated them, which they in fact have done by leaving them without the means of support, or at least resting on their bounty. To this, the advocates for this system oppose the common, empty declamation, that there is no danger that congress will abuse this power; but such language, as relative to so important a subject, is mere vapour, and sound without sense. Is it not in their power, however, to make such regulations as may be inconvenient to you?

It must be admitted, because the words are unlimited in their sense. It is a good rule, in the construction of a contract, to suppose, that what may be done will be; therefore, in considering this subject, you are to suppose, that in the exercise of this government, a regulation of congress will be made, for holding an election for the whole state at Poughkeepsie, at New-York, or, perhaps, at Fort-Stanwix: who will then be the actual electors for the house of representatives? Very few more than those who may live in the vicinity of these places. Could any others afford the expence and time of attending? And would not the government by this means have it in their power to put whom they pleased in the house of representatives? You ought certainly to have as much or more distrust with respect to the exercise of these powers by congress, than congress ought to have with respect to the exercise of those duties which ought to be entrusted to the several states, because over them congress can have a legislative controuling power.

Hitherto we have tied up our rulers in the exercise of their duties by positive restrictions—if the cord has been drawn too tight, loosen it to the necessary extent, but do not entirely unbind them.—I am no enemy to placing a reasonable confidence in them; but such an unbounded one as the advocates and framers of this new system advise you to, would be dangerous to your liberties; it has been the ruin of other governments, and will be yours, if you adopt with all its latitudinal powers—unlimited confidence in governors as well as individuals is frequently the parent of deception [despotism?].—What facilitated the corrupt designs of Philip of Macedon, and caused the ruin of Athens, but the unbounded confidence in their statesmen and rulers? Such improper confidence Demosthenes was so well convinced had ruined his country, that in his second Philippic oration he remarks—"that there is one common bulwark with which men of prudence are naturally provided, the guard and security of all people, particularly of free states, against the assaults of tyrants—What is this? Distrust. Of this be mindful; to this adhere; perserve this carefully, and no calamity can affect you.["][32]—Montesquieu observes, that "the course of government is attended with an insensible descent to evil, and there is no reascending to good without very great efforts."[33] The plain inference from this doctrine is, that rulers in all governments will erect an interest separate from the ruled, which will have a tendency to enslave them. There is therefore no other way of interrupting this insensible descent and warding off the evil as long as possible, than by establishing principles of distrust in your constituents, and cultivating the sentiment among yourselves. But let me enquire of you, my countrymen, whether the freedom and independence of elections is a point of magnitude? If it is, what kind of a spirit of amity, deference and concession, is that which has put in the power of congress at one stroke to prevent your interference in government, and do away your liberties forever? Does either the situation or circumstances of things warrant it?[34] 2.6.48

Cato.

1. The compromise motion to transmit the Constitution to the states was not passed by the Congress until 28 September, the day after this essay appeared.

2. Joseph Addison, Cato, A Tragedy, act 3, sc. 1.

3. The essay of Caesar appeared in the New York Daily Advertiser 1 October 1787. It was followed by another essay on 17 October 1787, in response to Cato's second essay. The Caesar essays are reprinted in Ford, Essays 279–91. See above, 2.6 intro. n. 6.

4. " 'Teach the members of the Convention (Cato very modestly goes on) that you are capable of supervision of their conduct; the same medium that gave you this system, if it is erroneous, while the door is now open, can make amendments or give you another.' O excellent thought, and happily advised! Be clamorous, my friends—be discontented—assert your prerogative—forever assert the power and majesty of the people. I am not willing to suspect any man's intentions, when they aim at giving information; but when they come abroad, couched in such majesterial terms, I own I feel some indignation. If this demogogue had talents to throw on the subject of legislation, why did he not offer them when the Convention was in session? If they had been judged useful, no doubt they would have been attended to. But is this now a time for such insinuations? Has not the wisdom of America been drawn, as it were, into a focus, and the proffered constitution sent forth with a unanimity that is unequaled in ancient or modern story? And shall we now wrangle and find fault with the excellent whole because perhaps some of its parts might have been more perfect? There is neither virtue or patriotism in such conduct. . . . I would also advise [Cato] to give his vote (as he will probably be one with the Electors) to the American Fabius; it will be more healthy for this country, and this state, that he should be induced to accept of the small presidency of the new government, than that he should be solicited again to accept of the command of an army." Caesar, Daily Advertiser 1 October 1787; Ford, Essays 284–85. According to one contemporary report, when Washington was about to sign the Constitution, he said, "should the states reject this excellent Constitution, the probability is that an opportunity will never again offer to cancel another in peace—the next will be drawn in blood." A writer in the Pennsylvania Journal 14 November 1787, as quoted by Curtis, Constitutional History I, 622. See American 4.20.1 n. 1.

5. "I venerate the memory of the slaughtered patriots of America, and rejoice as much as Cato that they did not bleed in vain, but I would have America profit by their death in a different manner from him. I believe they sought to obtain liberty for no particular State, but for the whole Union, indissolubly connected under one controlling and supreme head." Caesar, Daily Advertiser 17 October 1787; Ford, Essays 290.

6. Cato here renders Caesar's view more accurately than Cooke, who says that the Caesar letters were filled with an open contempt for the authority of the people, which Caesar would certainly and properly have denied. Jacob E. Cooke, "Alexander Hamilton's Authorship of the 'Caesar' Letters," William and Mary Quarterly January 1960, 78–85. The point is of some importance since, if Caesar had thrown doubt not only on the majesty and the judgment but also on the authority of the people, the case against Hamilton's authorship would be strengthened.

Caesar replied: "I am not one of those who gain an influence by cajoling the unthinking mass (tho' I pity their delusions), and ringing in their ears the gracious sound of their absolute Sovereignty. I despise the trick of such dirty policy. I know there are Citizens, who, to gain their own private ends, enflame the minds of the well-meaning, tho' less intelligent parts of the community, by sating their vanity with that cordial and unfailing specific, that all power is seated in the people. For my part, I am not much attached to the majesty of the multitude, and therefore waive all pretensions (founded on such conduct), to their countenance. I consider them in general as very ill qualified to judge for themselves what government will best suit their peculiar situations; nor is this to be wondered at. The science of government is not easily understood. Cato will admit, I presume, that men of good education and deep reflection, only, are judges of the form of a government. . . . When a new form of government is fabricated, it lies with the people at large to receive or reject it—that is their inherent rights. Now, I would ask (without intending to triumph over the weakness or follies of any men), how are the people to profit by this inherent right? By what conduct do they discover that they are sensible of their own interests in this situation? Is it by the exercise of a well-disciplined reason, and a correspondent education? I believe not. How then? As I humbly conceive, by a tractable and docile disposition, and by honest men endeavouring to keep their minds easy, while others, of the same disposition, with the advantages of genius and learning, are constructing the bark that may, by the blessing of Heaven, carry them to the port of rest and happiness, if they will embark without diffidence and proceed without mutiny. I know this is blunt and ungracious reasoning; it is the best, however, which I am prepared to offer on this momentous business; and since my own heart does not reproach me, I shall not be very solicitous about its reception. If truth, then, is permitted to speak, the mass of the people of America (any more than the mass of other countries) cannot judge with any degree of precision concerning the fitness of this New Constitution to the peculiar situation of America; they have, however, done wisely in delegating the power of framing a government to those every way worthy and well-qualified. . . ." Caesar, Daily Advertiser 17 October 1787; Ford, Essays 287–89. Cf. Centinel I, 2.7.3, who agrees that the science of government is so abstruse that few can judge for themselves; he urges that all who are capable should come forward to help the people judge, else they will rely implicitly on the character of the members of the Philadelphia Convention.

7. Following this number of the Cato letters the editor of the New York Journal printed the Congressional Resolution of 21 February 1787 and the Resolution of the Senate of New York of 6 March 1787, both of which state the convention to be "for the sole and express purpose of revising the articles of confederation, and reporting to Congress, and the several legislatures, such alterations and provisions therein, as shall, when agreed to in Congress, and confirmed by the states"—the New York resolution reads, "several states"—"render the foederal constitution adequate to the exigencies of government and the preservation of the union."

8. The Spirit of Laws VIII, ch. 16. For other arguments in defense of the small republic, see Yates and Lansing 2.3.7; Martin 2.4.44; Centinel I, 2.7.17–19; Federal Farmer II, 2.8.15–19; Brutus I, 2.9.10–21; Old Whig IV, 3.3.20; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.16–17; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.7; Agrippa IV, 4.6.16–17; Columbian Patriot 4.28.4; Mercer 5.5.5–6; Cato Uticensis 5.7.6–9; Henry 5.16.11; Mason, Elliot II, 30 (see also 2.2.2); Monroe 5.21.12–13; Smith 6.12.9; Clinton 6.13.14–18. For Federalist responses, see Agrippa IV, 4.6.16 n. 10.

9. See Second Treatise on Government XV, sec. 172.

10. The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6.

11. Cf. The Federalist no. 9, 52–53: "When Montesquieu recommends a small extent for republics, the standards he had in view were of dimensions far short of the limits of almost every one of these States. . . . If we therefore take his ideas on this point as the criterion of truth, we shall be driven to the alternative either of taking refuge at once in the arms of monarchy, or of splitting ourselves into an infinity of little, jealous, clashing, tumultuous commonwealths, the wretched nurseries of unceasing discord and the miserable objects of universal pity or contempt. Some of the writers who have come forward on the other side of the question seem to have been aware of the dilemma; and have even been bold enough to hint at the division of the larger States as a desirable thing. Such an infatuated policy, such a desperate expedient, might, by the multiplication of petty offices, answer the views of men who possess not qualifications to extend their influence beyond the narrow circles of personal intrigue, but it could never promote the greatness or happiness of the people of America." As Cooke points out (p. 612, n. 6) Publius is probably referring to Cato's use of Montesquieu. For other suggestions that the states are too large, see Martin 2.4.44; Centinel I, 2.7.19; also Ellsworth, Farrand I, 406 (25 June); Martin, Farrand II, 4 (14 July).

12. Second Treatise on Government, IX, sec. 123.

13. The contrast between the frugal, republican, liberty-loving citizens of the North and the luxurious, aristocratic, slave-holding Southerners was a frequent Anti-Federal argument against consolidation, emphasized by the Northerners of course (Agrippa XII, 4.6.48; Symmes 4.5.2–4) but repeated also by some Southern Anti-Federalists (Federal Farmer V, 2.8.61).

14. Hamilton uses exactly this argument in the New York convention to show that the Constitution will not undermine the states, because the attachments of the people will be to the states and "wherever the popular attachments lie, there will rest the political superiority." He goes on to say of the states, "If they are really useful, if they are calculated to promote the essential interests of the people, they must have their confidence and support." Elliot II, 354–55. The qualification is critical and becomes the basis for the next step in this part of Hamilton's argument. See Brutus XI, 2.9.130 and n. 87, and above, n. 11.

15. The Spirit of Laws II, ch. 3.

16. Ibid. VIII, ch. 16.

17. Cf. Publius' argument for reeligibility of the President, which is directly in point: there is no way of withholding from an ambitious President enough power to ruin his country—if he is not given it, he will seize it. The solution must be sought rather in an arrangement that makes his interest coincide with his duties and that encourages him to gratify, with projects for the public benefit, his higher passions rather than his lower ones. The Federalist no. 72; see Federal Farmer XIV, 2.8.178; Cato [South Carolina] 5.10.2.

18. The Spirit of Laws III, ch. 5. For other expressions of a concern with the ridicule of virtue see Columbian Patriot 4.28.8; Smith 6.12.9.

19. See An American Citizen (Tench Coxe), who argues, on the contrary, that the differences with England "did not arise so much from objections to the form of government, though undoubtedly a better one by far is now within our reach. . . ." Ford, Pamphlets 136ff.

20. Cf. The Federalist no. 69, where the presidency is compared with the king of England and the governor of New York. The alleged similarities and differences between the presidency and the British king were of course common themes on both sides. The main references are collected below, Philadelphiensis XII, 3.9.96 n. 37. For a general comparison of the new Constitution and the Constitution of New York, see Sydney 6.9.

21. Sir Edward Coke, Institutes II, proem. See below, Clinton 6.13.10 n. 5. For other examples of this widespread argument that the Constitution is dangerously vague, see Brutus VI, 2.9.77; Bostonian 4.21.1; Columbian Patriot, 4.28.2; Henry 5.16.2; Denatus 5.18.5. Henry told the Virginia ratifying convention, "A constitution, sir, ought to be like a beacon, held up to the public eye, so as to be understood by every man." Elliot III, 579. For Federalist defenses of the language of the Constitution, see A Landholder, Ford, Essays 156; Ames, Elliot II, 155.

22. Richard Hooker, Of the Laws of Ecclesiastical Policy I, ch. 10, sec. 5; quoted by Locke, Second Treatise on Government VIII, sec. 111. Cf. [Thomas Gordon and John Trenchard], Cato's Letters, or Essays on Liberty, Civil and Religious, and Other Important Subjects, 3d ed. (London 1733) II, no. 45 (16 September 1721).

23. See Federal Farmer VIII, 2.8.105 n. 68.

24. See Algernon Sidney, Discourses Concerning Government II, sec. 21; Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws II, ch. 3; Considerations on the Greatness of the Romans and Their Decline ch. 1. John Williams repeats the argument of this paragraph, often in the same words, in the debate of the New York convention, 21 June 1788, Elliot II, 242.

25. Sidney, Discourses II, secs. 23, 28.

26. The Constitution does not of course give the executive any more such power, as Publius shows forcefully in The Federalist no. 67, which is largely devoted to an indignant refutation of this "misrepresentation," which Publius cites "as a sample of the general spirit" of criticism of the provision for the Executive.

27. Part of John Williams' speech of 21 June 1788 in the New York ratifying convention is taken directly from this paragraph. Elliot II, 242.

28. See Brutus III, 2.9.42–44; IV, 2.9.46–48.

29. Publius agrees that poll taxes are undesirable and hopes that they will not be introduced. However, "There may exist certain critical and tempestuous conjunctures of the State, in which a poll tax may become an inestimable resource. And as I know nothing to exempt this portion of the globe from the common calamities that have befallen other parts of it, I acknowledge my aversion to every project that is calculated to disarm the government of a single weapon, which in any possible contingency might be usefully employed for the general defense and security." The Federalist no. 36.

30. For other Anti-Federal discussions of the "natural aristocracy" see Federal Farmer VII, 2.8.97 n. 64.

31. Cf. Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6; and Hume's essay, "Whether the British Government Inclines More to Absolute Monarchy or to a Republic," Essays, Moral, Political, and Literary, ed. T. H. Green and T. H. Grose (London 1882) I. Cato's interpretation of both authors is doubtful.

32. Demosthenes, Second Philippic Oration sec. 24.

33. The Spirit of Laws V, ch. 7.

34. Cato leaves undiscussed three heads of his list in V, 2.6.35: the provisions of the Constitution regarding standing armies, the militia, and the slave trade.

Letters of Centinel

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
and (PHILADELPHIA) FREEMAN'S JOURNAL
October 1787–April 1788

The most prolific and one of the best known of the Anti-Federalist essayists was the Centinel, whose essays appeared in the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer and the Philadelphia Freeman's Journal and were widely reprinted, although not in their entirety.[1] The first two numbers were printed in numerous newspapers and also appeared separately as broadsides.[2] The first nine letters were reprinted in an Anti-Federalist collection, issued in New York in 1788.[3]

There are three groups of Centinel essays. The first eighteen numbers, published between 5 October 1787 and 9 April 1788, discuss the principles of the new Constitution and of its advocates. Papers XIX to XXIV, published in October and November 1788, were aimed at influencing the election of representatives to the new Congress, the Constitution having been adopted; they are concerned chiefly with party politics in Pennsylvania, past and present, and with the financial affairs of Robert Morris and his associates. Finally, in the autumn of 1789, there appeared another dozen essays under the heading "Centinel Revived," which deal with the proposed amendments to the federal Constitution and with the state constitution and state political affairs. Only the first group is reprinted here.

The Centinel letters were generally attributed at the time to Judge George Bryan, a prominent Pennsylvania legislator and judge, who was the principal leader of the Anti-Federalists in his state. However, Judge Bryan's son, Samuel, claimed to be the author in several private letters;[4] and it is now generally thought that he was the author, although reflecting the views of and no doubt working in close collaboration with his father.[5]

Centinel does not present systematic arrangement and development of argument, like, say, the letters of The Federal Farmer, or the essays of Cato or Brutus; his essays are rather like a series of partially spontaneous speeches made over a period of time to a shifting and somewhat inattentive audience. Variations on a set of themes rather than a schematic development of themes is Centinel's style. Typically he starts an essay by going over some of the ground of the last one, sometimes moving on to new matters, sometimes developing themes barely mentioned before, sometimes substantially repeating earlier arguments. Centinel tends to lay his heaviest emphasis on rather shallow statements of certain standard themes—the importance of resisting the influence of great names, the critical position of the press and the attempts by Federalists to stifle it, the various nefarious practices indulged in by the friends of the Constitution, etc. The more significant and substantial arguments typically spin out from these primary themes.

Except for their length and their notoriety, it can hardly be maintained, as Konkle attempts to do, that "these papers at once took rank, on their side, with The Federalist papers on the other."[6] There are substantial and important arguments, in addition to information of a historical interest, scattered throughout the papers; but the papers do not, taken as a whole, compare in quality with the best Anti-Federalist writing, to say nothing of The Federalist. The first essay is indeed of major importance in the corpus of Anti-Federalist writings; the second essay is important; the fourth, fifth, sixth, and eleventh contain material of interest to the student of Anti-Federalist ideas; the remaining essays will properly be passed over by most nonspecialist readers. There follows a brief description of the content of each essay.

In his first essay, Centinel, after urging the need for dispassionate and deliberate examination, turns to a discussion of John Adams' principle of balanced government. Centinel objects that, first, there is not human wisdom enough to construct such a government; second, it would not last; third, it would not, in any case, answer the purpose of preserving liberty. The correct principle of free government is responsibility of the government to the people where the people are virtuous and property is pretty equally distributed. Thus the best government has a simple structure, short terms of office, rotation, etc. The proposed Constitution is neither balanced, as Adams wants, nor responsible, as Centinel thinks best. Centinel next turns to the powers of the Congress under the new Constitution, concluding with the warning that it is the opinion of all writers that a very extensive country cannot be governed on democratic principles except by a confederation of a number of smaller republics (2.7.11–19). He then discusses the structure of the new government, concluding that the Senate will be the great efficient body and that the government will be in practice an irresponsible aristocracy. Finally Centinel objects that no provision has been made for the liberty of the press or for jury trial.

Repeating the need for fundamental and free discussion, free of the "splendor of names," Centinel turns in his second essay to a point-by-point refutation of one of the most influential Federalist statements, James Wilson's brief address to the citizens of Philadelphia on 6 October.[7] Centinel argues that the powers of the federal government, particularly in the area of taxation and the judiciary, will destroy the states and endanger the freedom of the press and personal liberty, which are unprotected by a bill of rights.

He argues that no standing army should be permitted in time of peace except with the vote of two-thirds of the legislature, that the Senate will become the nucleus of a permanent aristocracy, that the provisions for amendment are illusory, and that the opposition to the Constitution, far from consisting of interested men, includes the respectable yeomen, a number of the members of the Philadelphia Convention, and the majority of the Congress.

The third essay begins with repetition of earlier arguments about the importance of the decision to be made, the need for fundamental investigation, and the dubious motives of the Federalists. Centinel describes the events leading to the Constitution and its ratification in Pennsylvania, which show an intention to establish a new permanent aristocracy, hidden by the old forms. He goes on to criticize the power given to the Congress to alter state regulations regarding the times, places, and manner of holding elections for the federal congress, for calling forth the militia, and for protecting the slave trade for a period of twenty years—this last being the only significant contribution of this paper (2.7.76). He concludes with an expression of surprise at Quaker support of the Constitution and a reference to Brutus' discussion of the impracticability of maintaining a free government over so extensive a territory.

The fourth essay is more substantial. Here Centinel contends that the present difficulties of the United States are due to the enormous demands of financing the Revolution rather than to intrinsic deficiencies in the Articles of Confederation. Warning against the danger of governing overmuch and thus weakening the people's sense of obligation and duty, so important in free government, Centinel argues that the only amendment necessary is one giving Congress the power to lay an impost on commerce and to regulate trade. He concludes by yet again discoursing on the secrecy with which the Constitution was formulated, the stifling of discussion, the reliance on great names, the exaggeration of present distresses, the attempt to represent the new government as the only alternative, the weight of the opposition, and the need for reconsideration.

The fifth essay is cast in the form of a reply to a remark by James Wilson in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention that a consolidation of the United States would be improper. It is largely a repetition of arguments made in numbers I and II about the extensive powers of the general government under the new Constitution, but Centinel discusses the "necessary and proper" clause for the first time and rebuts Wilson's argument that the Constitution requires the preservation of the states by showing that the states might become mere boards of election and eventually (by means of Congress's ultimate power to provide for elections) be eliminated altogether. This paper contains brief but interesting remarks on dual sovereignty (2.7.99–100) and on the object of government being to check and control the ambitious and designing (2.7.101).

Commenting on the "incredible transition" of a people once full of zest for liberty now about to sacrifice it, ignoring acknowledged danger in the new Constitution "in order to reap the golden harvest of regulated commerce," Centinel expatiates in his sixth essay on the lust of dominion and the need to guard against it in establishing political systems: "the great end of civil government is to protect the weak from the oppression of the powerful to put every man upon the level of equal liberty. . . ." (2.7.107).

The seventh essay contains nothing of substance. Centinel goes beyond his earlier remarks only in the strength of his denunciation of the Pennsylvania Federalists and in his suggestion that, despite the favorable action of the Pennsylvania convention, the people, aroused by "the enlightened pen of patriotism," will "assert their liberty, if necessary, by the sword" (2.7.116). He ends by calling for a second convention.

The eighth essay contains further reflections on the benefits of freedom, the dangers of the new Constitution, the corrupt character and treasonable activities of the advocates of the Constitution, concealed behind such respected names as Washington. The essay adds little to previous discussions except violence of language and a remark on the character of the merchant who, immersed in his narrow schemes of wealth, is the last to see a threat to public liberty (2.7.126).

Essay IX opens with praise of the Pennsylvania constitution as the triumph of patriotism over ambition, a victory which the well-born few seek to overturn. The Constitution contains a mere pretense of reservations in favor of liberty and is in fact a surrender at will and pleasure to our rulers. The illicit activities of the Federalists are further traced.

The tenth essay describes the success of the press in rousing the people to the dangers of the Constitution and the reaction of James Wilson and the Federalists in establishing a committee to collect funds to increase the stream of Federalist propaganda and to prepare for the use of force if necessary.

In his eleventh essay Centinel returns to more systematic argument. There are three arguments chiefly relied upon by the advocates of the Constitution: (1) the distresses of the community, (2) the evils of anarchy, (3) and the horrible consequences of the dissolution of the Union. The first having been treated in previous papers, Centinel here discusses the second and third, arguing that even anarchy is preferable to certain despotism because good government may grow out of it, that in any case anarchy is more likely if the Constitution is adopted than if it is not, that the event of separate confederacies is improbable—is in fact a hobgoblin sprung from the brain of the author of The Federalist—and that, even admitting that disunion would be the result of rejection of the Constitution, occasional wars are preferable to despotism. Centinel closes with a complaint about the Post Office suppression of the circulation of newspapers from state to state.

In the twelfth essay Centinel defends his contention that the activities of the proponents of the Constitution constitute a conspiracy, by exposing their sensitiveness to the charge, their reliance on the authority of names, their precipitation in such places as Massachusetts, and their attempt to shackle the press, particularly in Pennsylvania.

The thirteenth essay contains further denunciations of the activity of the "conspirators," ending with a call for the establishment of local societies by and communication among the "patriots" to "frustrate the machinations of an ambitious junto" (2.7.160).

In his fourteenth essay Centinel presents extensive extracts from Luther Martin's Genuine Information to prove that the new Constitution does not and was not intended to establish a federal government but provides instead for a consolidation. He ends with further discussion of the suppression of the circulation of Anti-Federalist newspapers.

Returning to the theme of the first essay, Centinel observes in his fifteenth paper that, the science of government being most difficult and abstruse, men are likely to be imposed on by the artful and designing, particularly at times like the present, when the healthy distrust of innovation has been lost. The bulk of the paper is devoted to a consideration of the Massachusetts ratification, showing that circumstances in Massachusetts led many men of property to join the Federalist conspiracy, that the elections were held in the heat of enthusiasm, and that few able Anti-Federalists were elected, and that even so, the Constitution was ratified by a bare majority and with qualifying amendments.

In his sixteenth essay Centinel argues that the ex post facto provision precludes the new Congress from taking measures to compel public defaulters to render an account. If Congress should desire nevertheless to secure the money for the government, the members would be precluded by their oath to support the Constitution; and if they proceeded nevertheless, they would be restrained by the Supreme Court, which (Centinel argues here) will have the power to construe the Constitution in last resort. The failure to secure the old debts due to the United States would also be unjust to certain states, like Pennsylvania, which had made unusual exertions to meet their obligations, and would give unfair advantage to the delinquent states.

Centinel devotes the first part of his seventeenth essay to a continuation of his argument that the Constitution was intended to screen public defaulters, discussing particularly the financial affairs of Robert Morris and of General Thomas Mifflin, the quartermaster general. He alludes again to the Post Office "suppression" of "patriotic" newspapers and concludes with a defense of Anti-Federalist writer, Benjamin Workman, against the attack of Francis Hopkinson.

The eighteenth and last essay contains further discussion of the insidious measures taken to promote the establishment of the Constitution, particularly the propagation of false information of unanimous Federalist sentiment in various parts of the country and the muzzling of the press. The strength of Anti-Federalist sentiment in Pennsylvania is described. The Centinel retains his anonymity in order to avoid mere personal attacks, which would deflect attention from the proper object.

1. With the exception of the second essay, the essays appeared first in the Independent Gazetteer. Most but not all were printed shortly thereafter in the Freeman's Journal.

2. It was these broadsides, presumably, that were distributed by the New York Federal Republican Committee. See Main, Antifederalists 235.

3. Observations on the Proposed Constitution for the United States of America, Clearly Shewing It To Be a Complete System of Aristocracy and Tyranny and Destructive of the Rights and Liberties of the People (New York 1788. Contains, in addition to the Centinel essays, the Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Pennsylvania Convention [below, 3.11], Edmund Randolph's letter of 10 October 1787 to the Speaker of the Virginia House of Delegates [above, 2.5] and the proposed Constitution).

4. According to McMaster and Stone, whose source is a private communication from the historian Paul Leicester Ford, Samuel Bryan wrote to George Clinton, saying, "I have not the honor of being personally known to your Excellency, but . . . I flatter myself that in the character of Centinel I have been honored with your approbation and esteem." McMaster and Stone 6–7n. Burton Konkle's version of the letter is significantly different: ". . . I flatter myself that in the character of Centinel I, I have been honored with your approbation and esteem." Burton Alva Konkle, George Bryan and the Constitution of Pennsylvania, 1731–1791 (Philadelphia 1922) 309. The correct version is probably McMaster and Stone's, which Konkle seems to have misread. The original letter has been lost. Samuel Bryan also claimed authorship of Centinel in letters to Thomas Jefferson, 27 February 1801 and 24 July 1807, and to Albert Gallatin, 18 December 1790. Files of Ratification of the Constitution Project, National Archives. See Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.2 n. 2.

5. McMaster and Stone 6–7. A contemporary critic referred to "the author (I should have said authors) of illiberal and scandalous performance. . . ." A Federalist, Independent Gazetteer 25 October 1787, McMaster and Stone 166.

Konkle reflects all the uncertainties involved. First he contends that "there can be as little doubt that Samuel Bryan was the author of them all, as that they expressed in fullness and accuracy the sentiments and convictions of Justice Bryan." George Bryan 309. Or perhaps the father wrote them: "No one familiar with Justice Bryan's writing but can see the Bryanesque ear-marks in both style and verbal expression in this paper [I], as well as the rest." Ibid. 310–11; cf. 320. The father must have written one of them: "There is a wealth of legal knowledge in this paper [II] that sounds very much like Justice Bryan, rather than the son, so that one is inclined to feel that, even though the son wrote 'No. I,' the father must have written 'No. II.' " Ibid. 313.

6. Ibid. 309.

7. See below, 2.7.35 n. 14. Konkle suggests, "It would seem as though Mr. Wilson's speech of the 6th had Centinel's paper of the 5th in contemplation, as Centinel No. II did his of the 6th of October." Ibid. p. 313. But the supposition is unlikely. Wilson would barely have had time to read the first number of Centinel and formulate his reply, and according to his biographer, Wilson spent much time and thought in preparing the address. Charles Page Smith, James Wilson, Founding Father, 1742–1798 (Chapel Hill 1956) 264–65. Moreover, Wilson does not reply to the most interesting part of Centinel's argument, that dealing with responsibility, and he does not follow Centinel's more detailed argument. It is more likely that Wilson was replying to arguments made in the legislature, at the early sessions of the state ratifying convention, and particularly by the sixteen seceders from the Pennsylvania Assembly. See below, 3.2.

I

MR. OSWALD,

As the Independent Gazetteer seems free for the discussion of all public matters, I expect you will give the following a place in your next.

To the Freemen of Pennsylvania.

Friends, Countrymen and Fellow Citizens,

2.7.1 Permit one of yourselves to put you in mind of certain liberties and privileges secured to you by the constitution of this commonwealth, and to beg your serious attention to his uninterested opinion upon the plan of federal government submitted to your consideration, before you surrender these great and valuable privileges up forever. Your present frame of government, secures to you a right to hold yourselves, houses, papers and possessions free from search and seizure, and therefore warrants granted without oaths or affirmations first made, affording sufficient foundation for them, whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded or required to search your houses or seize your persons or property, not particularly described in such warrant, shall not be granted. Your constitution further provides "that in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the parties have a right to trial by jury, which ought to be held sacred." It also provides and declares, "that the people have a right of FREEDOM OF SPEECH, and of WRITING and PUBLISHING their sentiments, therefore THE FREEDOM OF THE PRESS OUGHT NOT TO BE RESTRAINED."[1] The constitution of Pennsylvania is yet in existence, as yet you have the right to freedom of speech, and of publishing your sentiments. How long those rights will appertain to you, you yourselves are called upon to say, whether your houses shall continue to be your castles; whether your papers, your persons and your property, are to be held sacred and free from general warrants, you are now to determine. Whether the trial by jury is to continue as your birth-right, the freemen of Pennsylvania, nay, of all America, are now called upon to declare.

2.7.2 Without presuming upon my own judgement, I cannot think it an unwarrantable presumption to offer my private opinion, and call upon others for their's; and if I use my pen with the boldness of a freeman, it is because I know that the liberty of the press yet remains unviolated, and juries yet are judges.

2.7.3 The late Convention have submitted to your consideration a plan of a new federal government—The subject is highly interesting to your future welfare—Whether it be calculated to promote the great ends of civil society, viz. the happiness and prosperity of the community; it behoves you well to consider, uninfluenced by the authority of names. Instead of that frenzy of enthusiasm, that has actuated the citizens of Philadelphia, in their approbation of the proposed plan, before it was possible that it could be the result of a rational investigation into its principles; it ought to be dispassionately and deliberately examined, and its own intrinsic merit the only criterion of your patronage. If ever free and unbiassed discussion was proper or necessary, it is on such an occasion.—All the blessings of liberty and the dearest privileges of freemen, are now at stake and dependent on your present conduct. Those who are competent to the task of developing the principles of government, ought to be encouraged to come forward, and thereby the better enable the people to make a proper judgment; for the science of government is so abstruse, that few are able to judge for themselves; without such assistance the people are too apt to yield an implicit assent to the opinions of those characters, whose abilities are held in the highest esteem, and to those in whose integrity and patriotism they can confide; not considering that the love of domination is generally in proportion to talents, abilities, and superior acquirements; and that the men of the greatest purity of intention may be made instruments of despotism in the hands of the artful and designing. If it were not for the stability and attachment which time and habit gives to forms of government, it would be in the power of the enlightened and aspiring few, if they should combine, at any time to destroy the best establishments, and even make the people the instruments of their own subjugation.

The late revolution having effaced in a great measure all former habits, and the present institutions are so recent, that there exists not that great reluctance to innovation, so remarkable in old communities, and which accords with reason, for the most comprehensive mind cannot foresee the full operation of material changes on civil polity; it is the genius of the common law to resist innovation. 2.7.4

The wealthy and ambitious, who in every community think they have a right to lord it over their fellow creatures, have availed themselves, very successfully, of this favorable disposition; for the people thus unsettled in their sentiments, have been prepared to accede to any extreme of government; all the distresses and difficulties they experience, proceeding from various causes, have been ascribed to the impotency of the present confederation, and thence they have been led to expect full relief from the adoption of the proposed system of government; and in the other event, immediately ruin and annihilation as a nation. These characters flatter themselves that they have lulled all distrust and jealousy of their new plan, by gaining the concurrence of the two men in whom America has the highest confidence, and now triumphantly exult in the completion of their long meditated schemes of power and aggrandisement. I would be very far from insinuating that the two illustrious personages alluded to, have not the welfare of their country at heart; but that the unsuspecting goodness and zeal of the one, has been imposed on, in a subject of which he must be necessarily 2.7.5

inexperienced, from his other arduous engagements; and that the weakness and indecision attendant on old age, has been practised on in the other.[2]

2.7.6 I am fearful that the principles of government inculcated in Mr. Adams's treatise,[3] and enforced in the numerous essays and paragraphs in the newspapers, have misled some well designing members of the late Convention.—But it will appear in the sequel, that the construction of the proposed plan of government is infinitely more extravagant.

2.7.7 I have been anxiously expecting that some enlightened patriot would, ere this, have taken up the pen to expose the futility, and counteract the baneful tendency of such principles. Mr. Adams's sine qua non of a good government is three balancing powers, whose repelling qualities are to produce an equilibrium of interests, and thereby promote the happiness of the whole community. He asserts that the administrators of every government, will ever be actuated by views of private interest and ambition, to the prejudice of the public good; that therefore the only effectual method to secure the rights of the people and promote their welfare, is to create an opposition of interests betweeen the members of two distinct bodies, in the exercise of the powers of government, and balanced by those of a third.[4] This hypothesis supposes human wisdom competent to the task of instituting three co-equal orders in government, and a corresponding weight in the community to enable them respectively to exercise their several parts, and whose views and interests should be so distinct as to prevent a coalition of any two of them for the destruction of the third. Mr. Adams, although he has traced the constitution of every form of government that ever existed, as far as history affords materials, has not been able to adduce a single instance of such a government; he indeed says that the British constitution is such in theory, but this is rather a confirmation that his principles are chimerical and not to be reduced to practice. If such an organization of power were practicable, how long would it continue? not a day—for there is so great a disparity in the talents, wisdom and industry of mankind, that the scale would presently preponderate to one or the other body, and with every accession of power the means of further increase would be greatly extended. The state of society in England is much more favorable to such a scheme of government than that of America. There they have a powerful hereditary nobility, and real distinctions of rank and interests; but even there, for want of that perfect equallity of power and distinction of interests, in the three orders of government, they exist but in name; the only operative and efficient check, upon the conduct of administration, is the sense of the people at large.

2.7.8 Suppose a government could be formed and supported on such principles, would it answer the great purposes of civil society; if the administrators of every government are actuated by views of private interest and ambition, how is the welfare and happiness of the community to be the result of such jarring adverse interests?

2.7.9 Therefore, as different orders in government will not produce the good of the whole, we must recur to other principles. I believe it will be found that the form of government, which holds those entrusted with power, in the greatest responsibility to their constitutents, the best calculated for freemen.[5] A republican, or free government, can only exist where the body of the people are virtuous, and where property is pretty equally divided[;] in such a government the people are the sovereign and their sense or opinion is the criterion of every public measure; for when this ceases to be the case, the nature of the government is changed, and an aristocracy, monarchy or despotism will rise on its ruin. The highest responsibility is to be attained, in a simple structure of government, for the great body of the people never steadily attend to the operations of government, and for want of due information are liable to be imposed on—If you complicate the plan by various orders, the people will be perplexed and divided in their sentiments about the source of abuses or misconduct, some will impute it to the senate, others to the house of representatives, and so on, that the interposition of the people may be rendered imperfect or perhaps wholly abortive. But if, imitating the constitution of Pennsylvania, you vest all the legislative power in one body of men (separating the executive and judicial) elected for a short period, and necessarily excluded by rotation from permanency, and guarded from precipitancy and surprise by delays imposed on its proceedings, you will create the most perfect responsibility for then, whenever the people feel a grievance they cannot mistake the authors, and will apply the remedy with certainty and effect, discarding them at the next election. This tie of responsibility will obviate all the dangers apprehended from a single legislature, and will the best secure the rights of the people.

Having premised this much, I shall now proceed to the examination of the proposed plan of government, and I trust, shall make it appear to the meanest capacity, that it has none of the essential requisites of a free government; that it is neither founded on those balancing restraining powers, recommended by Mr. Adams and attempted in the British constitution, or possessed of that responsibility to its constituents, which, in my opinion, is the only effectual security for the liberties and happiness of the people; but on the contrary, that it is a most daring attempt to establish a despotic aristocracy among freemen, that the world has ever witnessed. 2.7.10

I shall previously consider the extent of the powers intended to be vested in Congress, before I examine the construction of the general government. 2.7.11

It will not be controverted that the legislative is the highest delegated power in government, and that all others are subordinate to it. The celebrated Montesquieu establishes it as a maxim, that legislation necessarily follows the power of taxation.[6] By sect. 8, of the first article of the proposed plan of government, "the Congress are to have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but all duties, imposts and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States." Now what can be more comprehensive than these words; not content by other sections of this plan, to grant all the great executive powers of a confederation, and a STANDING ARMY IN TIME OF PEACE, that grand engine of oppression, and moreover the absolute controul over the commerce of the United States and all external objects of revenue, such as unlimited imposts upon imports, etc.—they are to be vested with every species of internal taxation; —whatever taxes, duties and excises that they may deem requisite for the general welfare, may be imposed on the citizens of these states, levied by the officers of Congress, distributed through every district in America; and the collection would be enforced by the standing army, however grievous or improper they may be. The Congress may construe every purpose for which the state legislatures now lay taxes, to be for the general welfare, and thereby seize upon every object of revenue.

2.7.12 The judicial power by 1st sect. of article 3 ["]shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls; to all cases of admirality and maritime jurisdiction, to controversies to which the United States shall be a party, to controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, between citizens of different states, between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states, and between a state, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects."

2.7.13 The judicial power to be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such Inferior Courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.

2.7.14 The objects of jurisdiction recited above, are so numerous, and the shades of distinction between civil causes are oftentimes so slight, that it is more than probable that the state judicatories would be wholly superceded; for in contests about jurisdiction, the federal court, as the most powerful, would ever prevail. Every person acquainted with the history of the courts in England, knows by what ingenious sophisms they have, at different periods, extended the sphere of their jurisdiction over objects out of the line of their institution, and contrary to their very nature; courts of a criminal jurisdiction obtaining cognizance in civil causes.

2.7.15 To put the omnipotency of Congress over the state government and judicatories out of all doubt, the 6th article ordains that "this constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

2.7.16 By these sections the all-prevailing power of taxation, and such extensive legislative and judicial powers are vested in the general government, as must in their operation, necessarily absorb the state legislatures and judicatories; and that such was in the contemplation of the framers of it, will appear from the provision made for such event, in another part of it; (but that, fearful of alarming the people by so great an innovation, they have suffered the forms of the separate governments to remain, as a blind.) By sect. 4th of the 1st article, "the times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of chusing senators." The plain construction of which is, that when the state legislatures drop out of sight, from the necessary operation of this government, then Congress are to provide for the election and appointment of representatives and senators.

2.7.17 If the foregoing be a just comment—if the United States are to be melted down into one empire, it becomes you to consider, whether such a government, however constructed, would be eligible in so extended a territory; and whether it would be practicable, consistent with freedom? It is the opinion of the greatest writers, that a very extensive country cannot be governed on democratical principles, on any other plan, than a confederation of a number of small republics, possessing all the powers of internal government, but united in the management of their foreign and general concerns.

2.7.18 It would not be difficult to prove, that any thing short of despotism, could not bind so great a country under one government; and that whatever plan you might, at the first setting out, establish, it would issue in a depotism.

2.7.19 If one general government could be instituted and maintained on principles of freedom, it would not be so competent to attend to the various local concerns and wants, of every particular district[,] as well as the peculiar governments, who are nearer the scene, and possessed of superior means of information[;] besides, if the business of the whole union is to be managed by one government, there would not be time. Do we not already see, that the inhabitants in a number of larger states, who are remote from the seat of government, are loudly complaining of the inconveniencies and disadvantages they are subjected to on this account, and that, to enjoy the comforts of local government, they are separating into smaller divisions.[7]

2.7.20 Having taken a review of the powers, I shall now examine the construction of the proposed general government.

Art. 1. sect. 1. "All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a senate and house of representatives." By another section, the president (the principal executive officer) has a conditional controul over their proceedings.

Sect. 2. "The house of representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year, by the people of the several states. The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every 30,000 inhabitants."

The senate, the other constituent branch of the legislature, is formed by the legislature of each state appointing two senators, for the term of six years.

2.7.21 The executive power by Art. 2, sec. 1. is to be vested in a president of the United States of America, elected for four years: Sec. 2. gives him "power, by and with the consent of the senate to make treaties, provided two thirds of the senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law, etc. And by another section he has the absolute power of granting reprieves and pardons for treason and all other high crimes and misdemeanors, except in case of impeachment.

The foregoing are the outlines of the plan.

2.7.22 Thus we see, the house of representatives, are on the part of the people to balance the senate, who I suppose will be composed of the better sort, the well born, etc. The number of the representatives (being only one for every 30,000 inhabitants) appears to be too few, either to communicate the requisite information, of the wants, local circumstances and sentiments of so extensive an empire, or to prevent corruption and undue influence, in the exercise of such great powers; the term for which they are to be chosen, too long to preserve a due dependence and accountability to their constituents; and the mode and places of their election not sufficiently ascertained, for as Congress have the controul over both, they may govern the choice, by ordering the representatives of a whole state, to be elected in one place, and that too may be the most inconvenient.

2.7.23 The senate, the great efficient body in this plan of government, is constituted on the most unequal principles. The smallest state in the union has equal weight with the great states of Virginia, Massachusetts, or Pennsylvania—The Senate, besides its legislative functions, has a very considerable share in the Executive; none of the principal appointments to office can be made without its advice and consent. The term and mode of its appointment, will lead to permanency; the members are chosen for six years, the mode is under the controul of Congress, and as there is no exclusion by rotation, they may be continued for life, which, from their extensive means of influence, would follow of course. The President, who would be a mere pageant of state, unless he coincides with the views of the Senate, would either become the head of the aristocratic junto in that body, or its minion; besides, their influence being the most predominant, could the best secure his re-election to office. And from his power of granting pardons, he might skreen from punishment the most treasonable attempts on the liberties of the people, when instigated by the Senate.

2.7.24 From this investigation into the organization of this government, it appears that it is devoid of all responsibility or accountability to the great body of the people, and that so far from being a regular balanced government, it would be in practice a permanent ARISTOCRACY.

2.7.25 The framers of it[,] actuated by the true spirit of such a government, which ever abominates and suppresses all free enquiry and discussion, have made no provision for the liberty of the press, that grand palladium of freedom, and scourge of tyrants; but observed a total silence on that head. It is the opinion of some great writers, that if the liberty of the press, by an institution of religion, or otherwise, could be rendered sacred, even in Turkey, that despotism would fly before it.[8] And it is worthy of remark, that there is no declaration of personal rights, premised in most free constitutions; and that trial by jury in civil cases is taken away; for what other construction can be put on the following, viz. Article III. Sect. 2d. "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases above mentioned, the Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact?" It would be a novelty in jurisprudence, as well as evidently improper to allow an appeal from the verdict of a jury, on the matter of fact; therefore, it implies and allows of a dismission of the jury in civil cases, and especially when it is considered, that jury trial in criminal cases is expresly stipulated for, but not in civil cases.

But our situation is represented to be so critically dreadful, that, however 2.7.26 reprehensible and exceptionable the proposed plan of government may be, there is no alternative, between the adoption of it and absolute ruin.—My fellow citizens, things are not at that crisis, it is the argument of tyrants; the present distracted state of Europe secures us from injury on that quarter, and as to domestic dissentions, we have not so much to fear from them, as to precipitate us into this form of government, without it is a safe and a proper one. For remember, of all possible evils, that of despotism is the worst and the most to be dreaded.

Besides, it cannot be supposed, that the first essay on so difficult a sub- 2.7.27 ject, is so well digested, as it ought to be,—if the proposed plan, after a mature deliberation, should meet the approbation of the respective States, the matter will end; but if it should be found to be fraught with dangers and inconveniencies, a future general Convention being in possession of the objections, will be the better enabled to plan a suitable government.

Who's here so base, that would a bondman be?
If any, speak; for him have I offended.
Who's here so vile, that will not love his country?
If any, speak; for him have I offended.[9]

Centinel.

II[10]

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Friends, Countrymen, and Fellow-Citizens, 2.7.28

As long as the liberty of the press continues unviolated, and the people have the right of expressing and publishing their sentiments upon every public measure, it is next to impossible to enslave a free nation. The state of society must be very corrupt and base indeed, when the people in possession of such a monitor as the press, can be induced to exchange the heaven-born blessings of liberty for the galling chains of despotism.—Men of an aspiring and tyrannical disposition, sensible of this truth, have ever been inimical to the press, and have considered the shackling of it, as the first step towards the accomplishment of their hateful domination, and the entire suppression of all liberty of public discussion, as necessary to its support.—For even a standing army, that grand engine of oppression, if it were as numerous as the abilities of any nation could maintain, would not be equal to the purposes of despotism over an enlightened people.

2.7.29 The abolition of that grand palladium of freedom, the liberty of the press, in the proposed plan of government, and the conduct of its authors, and patrons, is a striking exemplification of these observations. The reason assigned for the omission of a bill of rights, securing the liberty of the press, and other invaluable personal rights, is an insult on the understanding of the people.

2.7.30 The injunction of secrecy imposed on the members of the late Convention during their deliberations, was obviously dictated by the genius of Aristocracy; it was deemed impolitic to unfold the principles of the intended government to the people, as this would have frustrated the object in view.

2.7.31 The projectors of the new plan, supposed that an ex parte discussion of the subject, was more likely to obtain unanimity in the Convention; which would give it such a sanction in the public opinion, as to banish all distrust, and lead the people into an implicit adoption of it without examination.

2.7.32 The greatest minds are forcibly impressed by the immediate circumstances with which they are connected; the particular sphere men move in, the prevailing sentiments of those they converse with, have an insensible and irresistible influence on the wisest and best of mankind; so that when we consider the abilities, talents, ingenuity and consummate address of a number of the members of the late Convention, whose principles are despotic, can we be surprised that men of the best intentions have been misled in the difficult science of government? Is it derogating from the character of the illustrious and highly revered WASHINGTON, to suppose him fallible on a subject that must be in a great measure novel to him?—As a patriotic hero, he stands unequalled in the annals of time.

2.7.33 The new plan was accordingly ushered to the public with such a splendor of names, as inspired the most unlimited confidence; the people were disposed to receive upon trust, without any examination on their part, what would have proved either a blessing or a curse to them and their posterity.—What astonishing infatuation! to stake their happiness on the wisdom and integrity of any set of men! In matters of infinitely smaller concern, the dictates of prudence are not disregarded! The celebrated Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, says, that "slavery is ever preceded by sleep."[11] And again, in his account of the rise and fall of the Roman Empire, page 97, "That it may be advanced as a general rule, that in a free State, whenever a perfect calm is visible, the spirit of liberty no longer subsists."[12] And Mr. Dickinson, in his Farmer's Letters, No. XI. lays it down as a maxim, that "A perpetual jealousy respecting liberty is absolutely requisite in all free States."

"Happy are the men, and happy the people, who grow wise by the misfortunes of others. Earnestly, my dear countrymen, do I beseech the author of all good gifts, that you may grow wise in this manner, and I beg leave to recommend to you in general, as the best method of obtaining this wisdom, diligently to study the histories of other countries. You will there find all the arts, that can possibly be practised by cunning rulers, or false patriots among yourselves, so fully delineated, that changing names, the account would serve for your own times."[13]

A few citizens of Philadelphia (too few, for the honour of human nature) 2.7.34 who had the wisdom to think consideration ought to precede approbation, and the fortitude to avow that they would take time to judge for themselves on so momentous an occasion, were stigmatized as enemies to their country; as monsters, whose existence ought not to be suffered, and the destruction of them and their houses recommended, as meritorious.—The authors of the new plan, conscious that it would not stand the test of enlightened patriotism, tyrannically endeavoured to preclude all investigation.—If their views were laudable[,] if they were honest,—the contrary would have been their conduct, they would have invited the freest discussion. Whatever specious reasons may be assigned for secrecy during the framing of the plan, no good one can exist, for leading the people blindfolded into the implicit adoption of it. Such an attempt does not augur the public good—It carries on the face of it an intention to juggle the people out of their liberties.

The virtuous and spirited exertions of a few patriots, have at length 2.7.35 roused the people from their fatal infatuation to a due sense of the importance of the measure before them. The glare and fascination of names is rapidly abating, and the subject begins to be canvassed on its own merits; and so serious and general has been the impression of the objections urged against the new plan, on the minds of the people, that its advocates, finding mere declamation and scurrility will no longer avail, are reluctantly driven to defend it on the ground of argument. Mr. Wilson, one of the deputies of this State in the late Convention, has found it necessary to come forward.[14] From so able a lawyer, and so profound a politician, what might not be expected, if this act of Convention be the heavenly dispensation which some represent it. Its divinity would certainly be illustrated by one of the principal instruments of the Revelation; for this gentleman has that transcendent merit!—But if, on the other hand, this able advocate has failed to vindicate it from the objections of its adversaries, must we not consider it as the production of frail and interested men.

2.7.36 Mr. Wilson has recourse to the most flimsey sophistry in his attempt to refute the charge that the new plan of general government will supersede and render powerless the state governments. His quibble upon the term Corporation, as sometimes equivalent to communities which possess sovereignty, is unworthy of him.[15] The same comparison in the case of the British parliament assuming to tax the colonies, is made in the Xth of the Farmer's Letters, and was not misunderstood in 1768 by any. He says that the existence of the proposed federal plan depends on the existence of the State governments, as the senators are to be appointed by the several legislatures, who are also to nominate the electors who chuse the President of the United States; and that hence all fears of the several States being melted down into one empire, are groundless and imaginary.[16]—But who is so dull as not to comprehend, that the semblance and forms of an ancient establishment, may remain, after the reality is gone.—Augustus, by the aid of a great army, assumed despotic power, and notwithstanding this, we find even under Tiberius, Caligula and Nero, princes who disgraced human nature by their excesses, the shadows of the ancient constitution held up to amuse the people. The senate sat as formerly; consuls, tribunes of the people, censors and other officers were annually chosen as before, and the forms of republican government continued. Yet all this was in appearance only.—Every senatus consultum was dictated by him or his ministers, and every Roman found himself constrained to submit in all things to the despot.

2.7.37 Mr. Wilson asks, "What controul can proceed from the federal government to shackle or destroy that sacred palladium of national freedom, the liberty of the press?"[17] What!—Cannot Congress, when possessed of the immense authority proposed to be devolved, restrain the printers, and put them under regulation.—Recollect that the omnipotence of the federal legislature over the State establishments is recognized by a special article, viz.—"that this Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any thing in the Constitutions or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding."—After such a declaration, what security does the Constitutions of the several States afford for the liberty of the press and other invaluable personal rights, not provided for by the new plan?—Does not this sweeping clause subject every thing to the controul of Congress?

2.7.38 In the plan of Confederation of 1778,[18] now existing, it was thought proper by Article the 2d, to declare that "each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence[,] and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this Confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." Positive grant was not then thought sufficiently descriptive and restraining upon Congress, and the omission of such a declaration now, when such great devolutions of power are proposed, manifests the design of reducing the several States to shadows. But Mr. Wilson tells you, that every right and power not specially granted to Congress is considered as withheld.[19] How does this appear? Is this principle established by the proper authority? Has the Convention made such a stipulation? By no means. Quite the reverse; the laws of Congress are to be "the supreme law of the land, any thing in the Constitutions or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding;" and consequently, would be paramount to all State authorities. The lust of power is so universal, that a speculative unascertained rule of construction would be a poor security for the liberties of the people.

Such a body as the intended Congress, unless particularly inhibited and restrained, must grasp at omnipotence, and before long swallow up the Legislative, the Executive, and the Judicial powers of the several States. 2.7.39

In addition to the respectable authorities quoted in my first number, to shew that the right of taxation includes all the powers of government, I beg leave to adduce the Farmer's Letters, see particularly letter 9th, in which Mr. Dickinson has clearly proved, that if the British Parliament assumed the power of taxing the colonies, internally, as well as externally, and it should be submitted to, the several colony legislatures would soon become contemptible, and before long fall into disuse.—Nothing, says he, would be left for them to do, higher than to frame bye-laws for empounding of cattle or the yoking of hogs. 2.7.40

By the proposed plan, there are divers cases of judicial authority to be given to the courts of the United States, besides the two mentioned by Mr. Wilson.[20]—In maritime causes about property, jury trial has not been usual; but in suits in equity, with all due deference to Mr. Wilson's professional abilities, (which he calls to his aid) jury trial, as to facts, is in full exercise. Will this jurisperitus say that if the question in equity should be, did John Doe make a will, that the chancellor of England would decide upon it? He well knows that in this case, there being no mode of jury trial before the chancellor, the question would be referred to the court of king's bench for discussion [decision?] according to the common law, and when the judge in equity should receive the verdict, the fact so established, could never be re-examined or controverted. Maritime causes and those appertaining to a court of equity, are, however, but two of the many and extensive subjects of federal cognizance mentioned in the plan. This jurisdiction will embrace all suits arising under the laws of impost, excise and other revenue of the United States. In England if goods be seized, if a ship be prosecuted for non-compliance with, or breach of the laws of the customs, or those for regulating trade, in the court of exchequer, the claimant is secured of the transcendent privilege of Englishmen, trial by a jury of his peers. Why not in the United States of America? This jurisdiction also goes to all cases under the laws of the United States, that is to say, under all statutes and ordinances of Congress. How far this may extend, it is easy to forsee; for upon 2.7.41 the decay of the state powers of legislation, in consequence of the loss of the purse strings, it will be found necessary for the federal legislature to make laws upon every subject of legislation. Hence the state courts of justice, like the barony and hundred courts of England, will be eclipsed and gradually fall into disuse.

2.7.42 The jurisdiction of the federal court goes, likewise, to the laws to be created by treaties, made by the President and Senate, (a species of legislation) with other nations; "to all cases affecting foreign ministers and consuls; to controversies wherein the United States shall be a party; to controversies between citizens of different states," as when an inhabitant of New-York has a demand on an inhabitant of New-Jersey.—This last is a very invidious jurisdiction, implying an improper distrust of the impartiality and justice of the tribunals of the states. It will include all legal debates between foreigners in Britain, or elsewhere, and the people of this country.—A reason hath been assigned for it, viz. "That large tracts of land, in neighbouring states, are claimed under royal or other grants, disputed by the states where the lands lie, so that justice cannot be expected from the state tribunals."[21]—Suppose it were proper indeed to provide for such case, why include all cases, and for all time to come? Demands as to land for 21 years would have satisfied this. A London merchant shall come to America, and sue for his supposed debt, and the citizen of this country shall be deprived of jury trial, and subjected to an appeal (tho' nothing but the fact is disputed) to a court 500 or 1000 miles from home; when if this American has a claim upon an inhabitant of England, his adversary is secured of the privilege of jury trial.—This jurisdiction goes also to controversies between any state and its citizens; which, though probably not intended, may hereafter be set up as a ground to divest the states, severally, of the trial of criminals; inasmuch as every charge of felony or misdemeanour, is a controversy between the state and a citizen of the same: that is to say, the state is plaintiff and the party accused is defendant in the prosecution.[22] In all doubts about jurisprudence, as was observed before, the paramount courts of Congress will decide, and the judges of the state, being sub graviore lege, under the paramount law, must acquiesce.

2.7.43 Mr. Wilson says, that it would have been impracticable to have made a general rule for jury trial in the civil cases assigned to the federal judiciary, because of the want of uniformity in the mode of jury trial, as practised by the several states.[23] This objection proves too much, and therefore amounts to nothing. If it precludes the mode of common law in civil cases, it certainly does in criminal. Yet in these we are told "the oppression of government is effectually barred by declaring that in all criminal cases trial by jury shall be preserved." Astonishing, that provision could not be made for a jury in civil controversies, of 12 men, whose verdict should be unanimous, to be taken from the vicinage; a precaution which is omitted as to trial of crimes, which may be any where in the state within which they have been committed. So that an inhabitant of Kentucky may be tried for treason at Richmond.

2.7.44 The abolition of jury trial in civil cases, is the more considerable, as at length the courts of Congress will supersede the state courts, when such mode of trial will fall into disuse among the people of the United States.

The northern nations of the European continent, have all lost this invaluable privilege: Sweden, the last of them, by the artifices of the aristocratic senate, which depressed the king and reduced the house of commons to insignificance. But the nation a few years ago, preferring the absolute authority of a monarch to the vexatious domination of the well-born few, an end was suddenly put to their power.

"The policy of this right of juries, (says judge Blackstone) to decide upon fact, is founded on this: That if the power of judging were entirely trusted with the magistrates, or any select body of men, named by the executive authority, their decisions, in spite of their own natural integrity, would have a biass towards those of their own rank and dignity; for it is not to be expected, that the few should be attentive to the rights of the many. This therefore preserves in the hands of the people, that share which they ought to have in the administration of justice, and prevents the encroachments of the more powerful and wealthy citizens."[24]

2.7.45 The attempt of governor Colden, of New-York, before the revolution to re-examine the facts and re-consider the damages, in the case of Forsey against Cunningham, produced about the year 1764, a flame of patriotic and successful opposition, that will not be easily forgotten.[25]

2.7.46 To manage the various and extensive judicial authority, proposed to be vested in Congress, there will be one or more inferior courts immediately requisite in each state; and laws and regulations must be forthwith provided to direct the judges—here is a wide door for inconvenience to enter. Contracts made under the acts of the states respectively, will come before courts acting under new laws and new modes of proceeding, not thought of when they were entered into.—An inhabitant of Pennsylvania residing at Pittsburgh, finds the goods of his debtor, who resides in Virginia, within the reach of his attachment; but no writ can be had to authorise the marshal, sheriff, or other officer of Congress, to seize the property, about to be removed, nearer than 200 miles: suppose that at Carlisle, for instance, such a writ may be had, mean while the object escapes. Or if an inferior court, whose judges have ample salaries, be established in every county, would not the expence be enormous? Every reader can extend in his imagination, the instances of difficulty which would proceed from this needless interference with the judicial rights of the separate states, and which as much as any other circumstance in the new plan, implies that the dissolution of their forms of government is designed.

2.7.47 Mr. Wilson skips very lightly over the danger apprehended from the standing army allowed by the new plan.[26] This grand machine of power and oppression, may be made a fatal instrument to overturn the public liberties, especially as the funds to support the troops may be granted for two years, whereas in Britain, the grants ever since the revolution in 1688, have been from year to year. A standing army with regular provision of pay and contingencies, would afford a strong temptation to some ambitious man to step up into the throne, and to seize absolute power. The keeping on foot a hired military force in time of peace, ought not to be gone into, unless two thirds of the members of the federal legislature agree to the necessity of the measure, and adjust the numbers employed. Surely Mr. Wilson is not serious when he adduces the instance of the troops now stationed on the Ohio, as a proof of the propriety of a standing army.—They are a mere occasional armament for the purpose of restraining divers hostile tribes of savages. It is contended that under the present confederation, Congress possess the power of raising armies at pleasure; but the opportunity which the states severally have of withholding the supplies necessary to keep these armies on foot, is a sufficient check on the present Congress.

2.7.48 Mr. Wilson asserts, that never was charge made with less reason, than that which predicts the institution of a baneful aristocracy in the federal Senate.[27]—In my first number, I stated that this body would be a very unequal representation of the several states, that the members being appointed for the long term of six years, and there being no exclusion by rotation, they might be continued for life, which would follow of course from their extensive means of influence, and that possessing a considerable share in the executive as well as legislative, it would become a permanent aristocracy, and swallow up the other orders in the government.[28]

2.7.49 That these fears are not imaginary, a knowledge of the history of other nations, where the powers of government have been injudiciously placed, will fully demonstrate. Mr. Wilson says, "the senate branches into two characters; the one legislative and the other executive. In its legislative character it can effect no purpose, without the co-operation of the house of representatives, and in its executive character it can accomplish no object without the concurrence of the president. Thus fettered, I do not know any act which the senate can of itself perform, and such dependence necessarily precludes every idea of influence and superiority." This I confess is very specious, but experience demonstrates, that checks in government, unless accompanied with adequate power and independently placed, prove merely nominal, and will be inoperative. Is it probable, that the president of the United States, limited as he is in power, and dependent on the will of the senate, in appointments to office, will either have the firmness or inclination to exercise his prerogative of a conditional controul upon the proceedings of that body, however injurious they may be to the public welfare: it will be his interest to coincide with the views of the senate, and thus become the head of the aristocratic junto. The king of England is a constitutent part in the legislature, but although an hereditary monarch, in possession of the whole executive power, including the unrestrained appointment to offices, and an immense revenue, enjoys but in name the prerogative of a negative upon the parliament. Even the king of England, circumstanced as he is, has not dared to exercise it for near a century past. The check of the house of representatives upon the senate will likewise be rendered nugatory for want of due weight in the democratic branch, and from their constitution they may become so independent of the people as to be indifferent of its interests: nay as Congress would have the controul over the mode and place of their election, by ordering the representatives of a whole state to be elected at one place, and that too the most inconvenient, the ruling power may govern the choice, and thus the house of representatives may be composed of the creatures of the senate. Still the semblance of checks, may remain but without operation.

This mixture of the legislative and executive moreover highly tends to corruption. The chief improvement in government, in modern times, has been the compleat separation of the great distinctions of power; placing the legislative in different hands from those which hold the executive; and again severing the judicial part from the ordinary administrative. "When the legislative and executive powers (says Montesquieu) are united in the same person, or in the same body of magistrates, there can be no liberty."[29] 2.7.50

Mr. Wilson confesses himself, not satisfied with the organization of the federal senate, and apologizes for it, by alledging a sort of compromise. It is well known, that some members of convention, apprized of the mischiefs of such a compound of authority, proposed to assign the supreme executive powers to the president and a small council, made personally responsible for every appointment to office, made personally responsible for every appointment to office, or other act, by having their opinions recorded; and that without the concurrence of the majority of the quorum of this council, the president should not be capable of taking any step. Such a check upon the chief magistrate would admirably secure the power of pardoning, now proposed to be exercised by the president alone, from abuse. For as it is placed he may shelter the traitors whom he himself or his coadjutors in the senate, have excited to plot against the liberties of the nation. 2.7.51

The delegation of the power of taxation to Congress, as far as duties on imported commodities, has not been objected to. But to extend this to excises, and every species of internal taxation, would necessarily require so many ordinances of Congress, affecting the body of the people, as would perpetually interfere with the State laws and personal concerns of the people. This alone would directly tend to annihilate the particular governments; for the people fatigued with the operations of two masters would be apt to rid themselves of the weaker. But we are cautioned against being alarmed with imaginary evils, for Mr. Wilson has predicted that the great revenue of the United States, will be raised by impost.[30] Is there any ground for this? Will the impost supply the sums necessary to pay the interest and principal of the foreign loan, to defray the great additional expence of the new constitution; for the policy of the new government will lead it to institute numerous and lucrative civil offices, to extend its influence and pro- 2.7.52

vide for the swarms of expectants; (the people having in fact no controul upon its disbursements) and to afford pay and support for the proposed standing army, that darling and long wished for object of the well-born of America; and which, if we may judge from the principles of the intended government, will be no trifling establishment, for cantonments of troops in every district of America, will be necessary to compel the submission of the people to the arbitrary dictates of the ruling powers? I say will the impost be adequate? By no means.—To answer these there must be excises and other indirect duties imposed, and as land taxes will operate too equally to be agreeable to the wealthy aristocracy in the senate who will be possessed of the government, poll taxes will be substituted as provided for in the new plan; for the doctrine then will be, that slaves ought to pay for wearing their heads.[31]

2.7.53 As the taxes necessary for these purposes, will drain your pockets of every penny, what is to become of that virtuous and meritorious class of citizens the public creditors. However well disposed the people of the United States may be to do them justice, it would not be in their power; and, after waiting year after year, without prospect of the payment of the interest or principal of the debt, they will be constrained to sacrifice their certificates in the purchase of waste lands in the far distant wilds of the western territory.

2.7.54 From the foregoing illustration of the powers proposed to be devolved to Congress, it is evident, that the general government would necessarily annihilate the particular governments, and that the security of the personal rights of the people by the state constitutions is superseded and destroyed; hence results the necessity of such security being provided for by a bill of rights to be inserted in the new plan of federal government. What excuse can we then make for the omission of this grand palladium, this barrier between liberty and oppression. For universal experience demonstrates the necessity of the most express declarations and restrictions, to protect the rights and liberties of mankind, from the silent, powerful and ever active conspiracy of those who govern.

2.7.55 The new plan, it is true, does propose to secure the people of the benefit of personal liberty by the habeas corpus; and trial by jury for all crimes, except in case of impeachment: but there is no declaration, that all men have a natural and unalienable right to worship Almighty God, according to the dictates of their own consciences and understanding; and that no man ought, or of right can be compelled to attend any religious worship, or erect or support any place of worship, or maintain any ministry, contrary to, or against his own free will and consent; and that no authority can or ought to be vested in, or assumed by any power whatever, that shall in any case interfere with, or in any manner controul, the right of conscience in the free exercise of religious worship: that the trial by jury in civil causes as well as criminal, and the modes prescribed by the common law for safety of life in criminal prosecutions shall be held sacred; that the requiring of excessive bail, imposing of excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishments be forbidden; that monoplies in trade or arts, other than to authors of books or inventors of useful arts, for a reasonable time, ought not to be suffered; that the right of the people to assemble peaceably for the purpose of consulting about public matters, and petitioning or remonstrating to the federal legislature ought not to be prevented; that the liberty of the press be held sacred; that the people have a right to hold themselves, their houses, papers and possessions free from search or seizure; and that therefore warrants without oaths or affirmations first made, affording a sufficient foundation for them, and whereby any officer or messenger may be commanded or required to search suspected places, or to seize any person or his property, not particularly described, are contrary to that right and ought not to be granted; and that standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, and ought not to be permitted but when absolutely necessary; all which is omitted to be done in the proposed government.

2.7.56 But Mr. Wilson says, the new plan does not arrogate perfection, for it provides a mode of alteration and correction, if found necessary.[32] This is one among the numerous deceptions attempted on this occasion. True, there is a mode prescribed for this purpose. But it is barely possible that amendments may be made. The fascination of power must first cease, the nature of mankind undergo a revolution, that is not to be expected on this side of eternity. For to effect this (Art. 6.) it is provided, that if two thirds of both houses of the federal legislature shall propose them; or when two thirds of the several states by their legislatures, shall apply for them, the federal assembly shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which when ratified by three fourths of the state legislatures, or conventions, as Congress shall see best, shall controul and alter the proposed confederation. Does history abound with examples of a voluntary relinquishment of power, however injurious to the community? No; it would require a general and successful rising of the people to effect anything of this nature.—This provision therefore is mere sound.

2.7.57 The opposition to the new plan (says Mr. Wilson) proceeds from interested men, viz. the officers of the state governments.[33] He had before denied that the proposed transfer of powers to Congress would annihilate the state governments. But he here lays aside the masque, and avows the fact. For, the truth of the charge against them must entirely rest on such consequence of the new plan. For if the state establishments are to remain unimpaired, why should officers peculiarly connected with them, be interested to oppose the adoption of the new plan? Except the collector of the impost, judge of the admiralty, and the collectors of excise (none of whom have been reckoned of the opposition) they would otherwise have nothing to apprehend.—But the charge is unworthy and may with more propriety be retorted on the expectants of office and emolument under the intended government.

2.7.58 The opposition is not so partial and interested as Mr. Wilson asserts. It consists of a respectable yeomanry throughout the union, of characters far removed above the reach of his unsupported assertions. It comprises many worthy members of the late convention, and a majority of the present Congress, for a motion made in that honorable body, for their approbation and recommendation of the new plan, was after two days animated discussion, prudently withdrawn by its advocates, and a simple *transmission of the plan to the several states could only be obtained; yet this has been palmed upon the people as the approbation of Congress; and to strengthen the deception, the bells of the city of Philadelphia were rung for a whole day.

2.7.59 Are Mr. W——n, and many of his coadjutors in the late C——n, the disinterested patriots they would have us believe? Is their conduct any recommendation of their plan of government? View them the foremost and loudest on the floor of Congress, in our Assembly, at town meetings, in sounding its eulogiums:—View them preventing investigation and discussion, and in that most despotic manner endeavouring to compel its adoption by the people, with such precipitancy as to preclude the possibility of a due consideration, and then say whether the motives of these men can be pure.

My fellow citizens, such false detestable patriots in every nation, have led their blind confiding country, shouting their applauses, into the jaws of despotism and ruin. May the wisdom and virtue of the people of America, save them from the usual fate of nations.

Centinel.

III[34]

To the People of Pennsylvania.

John iii. ver. 20th—"For every one that doeth evil, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved."—But "there is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; neither hid that shall not be known. Therefore whatsoever ye have spoken in darkness, shall be heard in the light: and that which ye have spoken in the ear in closets, shall be proclaimed on the house tops." St. Luke, chap. xii. 2d and 3d verses.

*Upon the last motion being made, those who had strenuously and successfully opposed Congress giving any countenance of approbation or recommendation to this system of oppression, said,—"We have no objection to transmit the new plan of government to the several states, that they may have an opportunity of judging for themselves on so momentous a subject." Whereupon it was unanimously agreed to, in the following words, viz. "Congress having received the report of the Convention lately assembled in Philadelphia, Resolved unanimously, That the said report, with the resolutions and letter accompanying the same, be transmitted to the several legislatures, in order to be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each state by the people thereof, in conformity to the resolves of the Convention, made and provided in that case."

Friends, Countrymen, and Fellow-Citizens!

2.7.60 The formation of a good government, is the greatest effort of human wisdom, actuated by disinterested patriotism; but such is the cursed nature of ambition, so prevalent in the minds of men, that it would sacrifice every thing to its selfish gratification; hence the fairest opportunities of advancing the happiness of humanity, are so far from being properly improved, that they are too often converted by the votaries of power and domination, into the means of obtaining their nefarious ends. It will be the misfortune of America of adding to the examples of this kind, if the proposed plan of government should be adopted; but I trust, short as the time allowed you for consideration is, you will be so fully convinced of the truth of this, as to escape the impending danger: it is only necessary to strip the monster of its assumed garb, and to exhibit it in its native colours, to excite the universal abhorrence and rejection of every virtuous and patriotic mind.

2.7.61 For the sake of my dear country, for the honor of human nature, I hope and am persuaded, that the good sense of the people will enable them to rise superior to the most formidable conspiracy against the liberties of a free and enlightened nation, that the world has ever witnessed. How glorious would be the triumph! How it would immortalize the present generation in the annals of freedom!

2.7.62 The establishment of a government, is a subject of such momentous and lasting concern, that it should not be gone into without the clearest conviction of its propriety; which can only be the result of the fullest discussion, the most thorough investigation and dispassionate consideration of its nature, principles and construction. You are now called upon to make this decision, which involves in it, not only your fate, but that of your posterity for ages to come. Your determination will either ensure the possession of those blessings, which render life desireable, or entail those evils which make existence a curse: that such are the consequences of a wise or improper organization of government, the history of mankind abundantly testifies. If you viewed the magnitude of the object in its true light, you would join with me in sentiment, that the new government ought not to be implicitly admitted. Consider then duly before you leap, for after the Rubicon is once passed, there will be no retreat.

2.7.63 If you were even well assured that the utmost purity of intention predominated in the production of the proposed government, such is the imperfection of human reason and knowledge, that it would not be wise in you to adopt it with precipitation in toto, for all former experience must teach you the propriety of a revision on such occasions, to correct the errors, and supply the deficiences, that may appear necessary. In every government whose object is the public welfare, the laws are subjected to repeated revisions, in some by different orders in the governments, in others by an appeal to the judgements of the people and deliberative forms of procedure. A knowledge of this, as well as of other states, will show that in every instance where a law has been passed without the usual precautions, it has been productive of great inconvenience and evils, and frequently has not answered the end in view, a supplement becoming necessary to supply its deficiences.

2.7.64 What then are we to think of the motives and designs of those men who are urging the implicit and immediate adoption of the proposed government? are they fearful, that if you exercise your good sense and discernment, you will discover the masqued aristocracy, that they are attempting to smuggle upon you, under the suspicious garb of republicanism?—When we find that the principal agents in this business, are the very men who fabricated the form of government, it certainly ought to be conclusive evidence of their insidious design to deprive us of our liberties—The circumstances attending this matter, are such as should in a peculiar manner excite your suspicion; it might not be useless to take a review of some of them.

2.7.65 In many of the states, particularly in this and the northern states, there are aristocratic junto's of the well-born few, who had been zealously endeavoring since the establishment of their constitutions, to humble that offensive upstart, equal liberty; but all their efforts were unavailing, the ill-bred churl obstinately kept his assumed station.

2.7.66 However, that which could not be accomplished in the several states, is now attempting through the medium of the future Congress.—Experience having shewn great defects in the present confederation, particularly in the regulation of commerce and maritime affairs; it became the universal wish of America to grant further powers, so as to make the federal government adequate to the ends of its institution. The anxiety on this head was greatly increased, from the impoverishment and distress occasioned by the excessive importations of foreign merchandise and luxuries, and consequent drain of specie, since the peace: thus the people were in the disposition of a drowning man, eager to catch at any thing that promised relief, however delusory. Such an opportunity for the acquisition of undue power, has never been viewed with indifference by the ambitious and designing in any age or nation, and it has accordingly been too successfully improved by such men among us. The deputies from this state (with the exception of two) and most of those from the other states in the union, were unfortunately of this complexion, and many of them of such superior endowments, that in an exparte discussion of the subject, by specious glosses they have gained the concurrence of some well disposed men, in whom their country have great confidence, which has given a great sanction to their scheme of power.

2.7.67 A comparison of the authority under which the convention acted, and their form of government, will shew that they have despised their delegated power, and assumed sovereignty; that they have entirely annihilated the old confederation, and the particular government of the several states, and instead thereof have established one general government that is to pervade the union; constituted on the most unequal principles, destitute of accountability to its constituents, and as despotic in its nature, as the Venetian aristocracy; a government that will give full scope to the magnificent designs of the well-born; a government where tyranny may glut its vengeance on the low-born, unchecked by an odious bill of rights: as has been fully illustrated in my two preceding numbers; and yet as a blind upon the understandings of the people, they have continued the forms of the particular governments, and termed the whole a confederation of the United States, pursuant to the sentiments of that profound, but corrupt politician Machiavel, who advises any one who would change the constitution of a state, to keep as much as possible to the old forms; for then the people seeing the same officers, the same formalities, courts of justice, and other outward appearances, are insensible of the alteration, and believe themselves in possession of their old government.[35] Thus Caesar, when he seized the Roman liberties, caused himself to be chosen dictator (which was an ancient office) continued the senate, the consuls, the tribunes, the censors, and all other offices and forms of the commonwealth; and yet changed Rome from the most free to the most tyrannical government in the world.

2.7.68 The convention, after vesting all the great and efficient powers of sovereignty in the general government, insidiously declare by section 4th of article 4th, "that the United States shall guarantee to every state in this union, a republican form of government;" but of what avail will be the form without the reality of freedom?

2.7.69 The late convention in the majesty of its assumed omnipotence, have not even condescended to submit the plan of the new government to the consideration of the people, the true source of authority; but have called upon them by their several conventions, 'to assent to and ratify'* in toto, what they have been pleased to decree; just as the grand monarque of France requires the parliament of Paris to register his edicts without revision or alteration, which is necessary previous to their execution.

2.7.70 The authors and advocates of the new plan, conscious that its establishment can only be obtained from the ignorance of the people of its true nature, and their unbounded confidence in some of the men concurring; have hurried on its adoption with a precipitation that betrays their design: before many had seen the new plan, and before any had time to examine it, they, by their ready minions, attended by some well disposed but mistaken persons, obtained the subscriptions of the people to papers expressing their entire approbation of [it], and their wish to have it established; thus precluding them from any consideration; but lest the people should discover the juggle, the elections of the state conventions, are urged on at very early days; the proposition of electing the convention for this state in nine days after the date of the resolution for all the counties east of Bedford, and supported by three or four of the deputies of the convention, and who were also members of the then assembly, is one of the most extravagant instances of this kind; and even this was only prevented by the secession of nineteen virtuous and enlightened members.*[37] In order to put the matter beyond all recal, they have proceeded a step further, they have made the deputies nominated for the state convention of this city and elsewhere, pledge their sacred honor, previous to their election, that they would implicitly adopt the proposed government, in toto; thus short as the period is before the final fiat is to be given, consideration is rendered nugatory, and conviction of its dangers or impropriety unavailable. A good cause does not stand in need of such means; it scorns all indirect advantages and borrowed helps, and trusts alone to its own native merit and intrinsic strength: the lion is never known to make use of cunning, nor can a good cause suffer by a free and thorough examination—It is knavery that seeks disguise. Actors do not care that any one should look into the tiring room, nor jugglers or sharpers into their hands or boxes.

*See resolution of Convention accompanying the instrument of the proposed government.[36]

Every exertion has been made to suppress discussion by shackling the press; but as this could not be effected in this state, the people are warned not to listen to the adversaries of the proposed plan, lest they should impose upon them, and thereby prevent the adoption of this blessed government. What figure would a lawyer make in a court of justice, if he should desire the judges not to hear the counsel of the other side, lest they should perplex the cause and mislead the court? Would not every bystander take it for granted, that he was conscious of the weakness of his client's cause, and that it could no otherwise be defended, than by not being understood?

2.7.71 All who are friends to liberty are friends to reason, the champion of liberty, and none are foes to liberty but those who have truth and reason for

*The message of the President and Council, sent into the present General Assembly, on the 27th of October last, discloses another imposition. The board sent to the House the official transmission of the proposed constitution of the United States, inclosed in a letter from the President of Congress, which proves that the paper produced to the last house on the day before the final rising of the same, was a surreptitious copy of the vote of Congress, obtained for the purpose of deluding the legislature into the extravagance of directing an election of Convention within nine days.

The provision made by the Convention of Pennsylvania, which sat in 1776 for amending the constitution, is guarded with admirable wisdom and caution. A council of Censors is to be holden every seven years, which shall have power (two thirds of the whole number elected agreeing) to propose amendments of the same government, and to call a Convention to adopt and establish these propositions; but the alterations must be "promulgated at least six months before the day appointed for the election of such Convention, for the previous consideration of the people, that they may have an opportunity of instructing their delegates on the subject." The present measures explain the conduct of a certain party of the Censors who sat in 1784, (much fewer than two thirds of the whole) that proposed to abolish the 47th article of the constitution, whereby the manner of amending the same was regulated.

their foes. He who has dark purposes to serve, must use dark means; light would discover him, and reason expose him: he must endeavour to shut out both, and make them look frightful by giving them ill names.

Liberty only flourishes where reason and knowledge are encouraged; and 2.7.72 wherever the latter are stifled, the former is extinguished. In Turkey printing is forbid, enquiry is dangerous, and free speaking is capital; because they are all inconsistent with the nature of the government. Hence it is, that the Turks are all stupidly ignorant, and are all slaves.

I shall now proceed in the consideration of the construction of the pro- 2.7.73 posed plan of government.—By section 4th of article 1st, of the proposed government, it is declared, "that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of chusing senators." Will not this section put it in the power of the future Congress to abolish the suffrage by ballot, so indispensible in a free government.—Montesquieu, in his Spirit of Laws, vol. 1, page 12, says "that in a democracy there can be no exercise of sovereignty but by the suffrages of the people, which are their will: now the sovereign's will is the sovereign himself. The laws, therefore, which establish the right of suffrage, are fundamental to this government. In fact, it is as important to regulate in a republic, in what manner, by whom, and concerning what, suffrages are to be given, as it is in a monarchy to know who is the prince, and after what manner he ought to govern."[38] This valuable privilege of voting by ballot, ought not to rest on the discretion of the government, but be irrevocably established in the Constitution.

Will not the above quoted section, also authorise the future Congress to 2.7.74 lengthen the term for which the senators and representatives are to be elected, from 6 and 2 years respectively, to any period, even for life? As the parliament of England voted themselves from triennial to septennial; and as the long parliament under Charles the 1st became perpetual?

Section 8th, of article 1st, vests Congress with power "to provide for 2.7.75 calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections and repell invasions; to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."—This section will subject the citizens of these States to the most arbitrary military discipline, even death may be inflicted on the disobedient; in the character of militia, you may be dragged from your families and homes to any part of the continent, and for any length of time, at the discretion of the future Congress: and as militia, you may be made the unwilling instruments of oppression, under the direction of government; there is no exemption upon account of conscientious scruples of bearing arms; no equivalent to be received in lieu of personal services. The militia of Pennsylvania may be marched to Georgia or New-Hampshire, however incompatible with their interests or consciences;—in short, they may be made as mere machines as Prussian soldiers.

2.7.76 Section the 9th begins thus—"The migration or importation of such persons, as any of the States, now existing, shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by Congress prior to the year 1808, but a duty or tax may be imposed on such importation, not exceeding ten dollars for each person." And by the 5th article this restraint is not to be removed by any future Convention. We are told that the objects of this article are slaves, and that it is inserted to secure to the southern States the right of introducing negroes for twenty-one years to come, against the declared sense of the other States to put an end to an odious traffic in the human species; which is especially scandalous and inconsistent in a people, who have asserted their own liberty by the sword, and which dangerously enfeebles the districts, wherein the labourers are bondmen. The words are dark and ambiguous; such as no plain man of common sense would have used, [and] are evidently chosen to conceal from Europe, that in this enlightened country, the practice of slavery has its advocates among men in the highest stations. When it is recollected that no poll tax can be imposed on five negroes above what three whites shall be charged; when it is considered, that the impost on the consumption of the Carolina field negroes, must be trifling, and the excise, nothing, it is plain that the proportion of contributions, which can be expected from the southern states under the new constitution, will be very unequal; and yet they are to be allowed to enfeeble themselves by the further importation of negroes till the year 1808. Has not the concurrence of the five southern states (in the convention) to the new system, been purchased too dearly by the rest, who have undertaken to make good their deficiencies of revenue, occasioned by their wilful incapacity, without an equivalent?

The general acquiescence of one description of citizens in the proposed government, surprises me much; if so, many of the Quakers have become indifferent to the sacred rights of conscience, so amply secured by the constitution of this commonwealth;[39] if they are satisfied, to rest this inestimable privilege on the discretion of the future government; yet, in a political light, they are not acting wisely; in the state of Pennsylvania, they form so considerable a portion of the community, as must ensure them great weight in the government; but in the scale of general empire, they will be lost in the balance.

2.7.77 I intended in this number to have shewn from the nature of things, from the opinions of the greatest writers, and from the peculiar circumstances of the United States, the impracticability of establishing and maintaining one government on the principles of freedom in so extensive a territory; to have shewn, if practicable, the inadequacy of such government, to provide for its many and various concerns; and also to have shewn, that a confederation of small republics, possessing all the powers of internal government, and united in the management of their general and foreign concerns, is the only system of government by which so extensive a country can be governed consistent with freedom: But a writer under the signature of Brutus, in the New-York paper, which has been republished by Messrs. Dunlap and Claypoole, has done this in so masterly a manner, that it would be superfluous in me to add any thing on this subject.[40]

My fellow citizens, as a lover of my country, as the friend to mankind, 2.7.78
whilst it is yet safe to write, and whilst it is yet in your power to avoid it, I warn you of the impending danger. To this remote quarter of the world, has liberty fled.—Other countries, now subject to slavery, were once as free as we yet are; therefore, for your own sakes, for the sake of your posterity, as well as for that of the oppressed of all nations, cherish this remaining asylum of liberty.

Centinel.

Philad., Novem. 5th, 1787.

IV[41]

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Friends, Countrymen and fellow Citizens,

That the present confederation is inadequate to the objects of the union, 2.7.79 seems to be universally allowed. The only question is, what additional powers are wanting to give due energy to the federal government? We should, however, be careful in forming our opinion on this subject, not to impute the temporary and extraordinary difficulties that [have] hitherto impeded the execution of the confederation, to defects in the system itself. Taxation is in every government, a very delicate and difficult subject; hence it has been the policy of all wise statesmen, as far as circumstances permitted, to lead the people by small beginnings and almost imperceptible degrees, into the habits of taxation; where the contrary conduct has been pursued, it has ever failed of full success, not unfrequently proving the ruin of the projectors. The imposing of a burdensome tax at once on a people, without the usual gradations, is the severest test that any government can be put to, despotism itself has often proved unequal to the attempt. Under this conviction, let us take a review of our situation before and since the revolution. From the first settlement of the country until the commencement of the late war, the taxes were so light and trivial as to be scarcely felt by the people; when we engaged in the expensive contest with Great Britain, the Congress sensible of the difficulty of levying the monies necessary to its support, by direct taxation, had recourse to an anticipation of the public resources, by emitting bills of credit, and thus postponed the necessity of taxation for several years; this means was pursued to a most ruinous length; but about the year 80 or 81, it was wholly exhausted, the bills of credit had suffered such a depreciation from the excessive quantities in circulations, that they ceased to be useful as a medium. The country at this period, was very much impoverished and exhausted; commerce had been suspended for near six years; the husbandman, for want of a market, limited his crops to his own subsistence; the frequent calls of the militia and long continuance in actual service, the devastations of the enemy, the subsistence of our own armies, the evils of the depreciation of the paper money, which fell chiefly upon the patriotic and virtuous part of the community, and all concurred to produce great distress throughout America. In this situation of affairs, we still had the same powerful enemy to contend with, who had even more numerous and better appointed armies in the field than at any former time. Our allies were applied to in this exigence, but the pecuniary assistance that we could procure from them, was soon exhausted; the only resource now remaining, was to obtain by direct taxation, the monies necessary for our defence; the history of mankind does not furnish a similar instance of an attempt to levy such enormous taxes at once, of a people so wholly unprepared and uninured to them—the lamp of sacred liberty must indeed have burned with unsullied lustre, every sordid principle of the mind must have been then extinct, when the people not only submitted to the grievous impositions, but cheerfully exerted themselves to comply with the calls of their country; their abilities however, were not equal to furnish the necessary sums—indeed the requisition of the year 1782, amounted to the whole income of their farms and other property, including the means of their subsistence; perhaps the strained exertions of two years, would not have sufficed to the discharge of this requisition; how then can we impute the difficulties of the people to a due compliance with the requisitions of Congress to a defect in the confederation, for any government, however energetic, in similar circumstances, would have experienced the same fate. If we review the proceedings of the states, we shall find that they gave every sanction and authority to the requisitions of Congress, that their laws could confer, that they attempted to collect the sums called for in the same manner as is proposed to be done in future by the general government, instead of the state legislatures.

2.7.80 It is a maxim that a government, ought to be cautious not to govern over much, for when the cord of power is drawn too tight, it generally proves its destruction[;] the impracticability of complying with the requisitions of Congress has lessened the sense of obligation and duty in the people, and thus weakened the ties of the union; the opinion of power in a free government is much more efficatious than the exercise of it; it requires the maturity of time and repeated practice to give due energy and certainty to the operations of government, especially to such as affect the purses of the people.

The thirteen Swiss Cantons confederated by more general and weaker ties than these United States are by the present articles of confederation, have not experienced the necessity of strengthening their union by vesting their general diet with further or greater powers; this national body has only the management of their foreign concerns and in case of a war can only call by requisition on the several Cantons for the necessary supplies, who are sovereign and independent in every internal and local exercise of government—and yet this rope of sand, as our confederation has been termed, which is so similar to that, has held together for ages without any apparent charm. 2.7.81

I am persuaded that a due consideration, will evince, that the present inefficacy of the requisitions of Congress, is not owing to a defect in the confederation, but the peculiar circumstances of the times. 2.7.82

The wheels of the general government having been thus clogged and the arrearages of taxes still accumulating, it may be asked what prospect is there of the government resuming its proper tone, unless more compulsory powers are granted? To this it may be answered, that the produce of imposts on commerce which all agree to vest in Congress, together with the immense tracts of land at their disposal, will rapidly lessen and eventually discharge the present incumbrances; when this takes place, the mode by requisition will be found perfectly adequate to the extraordinary exigencies of the union. Congress have lately sold land to the amount of eight millions of dollars, which is a considerable portion of the whole debt.

It is to be lamented that the interested and designing have availed themselves so successfully of the present crisis, and under the specious pretence of having discovered a panacea for all the ills of the people, they are about establishing a system of government, that will prove more destructive to them, than the wooden horse filled with soldiers did in ancient times to the city of Troy; this horse was introduced by their hostile enemy the Grecians, by a prostitution of the sacred rites of their religion; in like manner, my fellow citizens[,] are aspiring despots among yourselves prostituting the name of a Washington to cloak their designs upon your liberties. 2.7.83

I would ask how is the proposed government to shower down those treasures upon every class of citizens as is so industriously inculcated and so fondly believed? Is it by the addition of numerous and expensive establishments? Is it by doubling our judiciaries, instituting federal courts in every county of every state? Is it by a superb presidental court? Is it by a large standing army? In short is it by putting it in the power of the future government to levy money at pleasure, and placing this government so independent of the people as to enable the administration to gratify every corrupt passion of the mind, to riot on your spoils, without check or controul? 2.7.84

A transfer to Congress of the power of imposing imposts on commerce and the unlimited regulation of trade, I believe is all that is wanting to render 2.7.85

America as prosperous as it is in the power of any form of government to render her; this properly understood would meet the views of all the honest and well meaning.

2.7.86 What gave birth to the late Continental Convention? Was it not the situation of our commerce, which lay at the mercy of every foreign power, who from motives of interest or enmity could restrict and controul it, without risquing a retaliation on the part of America, as Congress was impotent on this subject? Such indeed was the case with respect to Britain, whose hostile regulations gave such a stab to our navigation as to threaten its annihilation, it became the interest of even the American merchant to give a preference to foreign bottoms; hence the distress of our seamen, shipwrights, and every mechanic art dependent on navigation.

2.7.87 By these regulations too we were limitted in markets for our produce, our vessels were excluded from their West India Islands, many of our staple commodities were denied entrance in Britain; hence the husbandmen were distressed by the demand for their crops being lessened and their prices reduced. This is the source to which may be traced every evil we experience, that can be relieved by a more energetic government. Recollect the language of complaint for years past, compare the recommendations of Congress founded on such complaints, pointing out the remedy, examine the reasons assigned by the different states for appointing delegates to the late Convention, view the powers vested in that body; they all harmonize in one sentiment, that the due regulation of trade and navigation was the anxious wish of every class of citizens, was the great object of calling the Convention.

2.7.88 This object being provided for, by the proposed Constitution, the people overlook and are not sensible of the needless sacrifice they are making for it.—Of what avail will be a prosperous state of commerce, when the produce of it will be at the absolute disposal of an arbitrary and unchecked government, who may levy at pleasure the most oppressive taxes; who may destroy every principle of freedom; who may even destroy the privilege of complaining.

2.7.89 If you are in doubt about the nature and principles of the proposed government, view the conduct of its authors and patrons[;] that affords the best explanation, the most striking comment.

The evil genius of darkness presided at its birth, it came forth under the veil of mystery, its true features being carefully concealed, and every deceptive art has been and is practising to have this spurious brat received as the genuine offspring of heaven-born liberty. So fearful are its patrons that you should discern the imposition, that they have hurried on its adoption, with the greatest precipitation; they have endeavored also to preclude all investigation, they have endeavored to intimidate all opposition; by such means as these, have they surreptitiously procured a Convention in this state, favorable to their views; and here again investigation and discussion are abridged, the final question is moved before the subject has been under consideration; an appeal to the people is precluded even in the last resort, lest their eyes should be opened; the Convention have denied the minority the privilege of entering the reasons of their dissent on its journals[42]—Thus despotism is already triumphant, and the genius of liberty is on the eve of her exit, is about bidding an eternal adieu to this once happy people.

2.7.90 After so recent a triumph over British despots, after such torrents of blood and treasure have been spent, after involving ourselves in the distresses of an arduous war, and incurring such a debt, for the express purpose of asserting the rights of humanity, it is truly astonishing that a set of men among ourselves, should have the effrontery to attempt the destruction of our liberties. But in this enlightened age to hope to dupe the people by the arts they are practising, is still more extraordinary.

2.7.91 How do the advocates of the proposed government, combat the objections urged against it? Not even by an attempt to disprove them, for that would the more fully confirm their truth, but by a species of reasoning that is very congenial to that contempt of the understandings of the people, that they so eminently possess, and which policy cannot even prevent frequent ebullitions of; they seem to think that the oratory and fascination of great names and mere sound will suffice to ensure success; that the people may be diverted from a consideration of the merits of the plan, by bold assertions and mere declamation. Some of their writers for instance, paint the distresses of every class of citizens with all the glowing language of eloquence, as if this was a demonstration of the excellence, or even the safety of the new plan,[43] which, notwithstanding the reality of this distress, may be a system of tyranny and oppression; other writers tell you of the great men who composed the late convention, and give you a pompous display of their virtues,[44] instead of a justification of the plan of government; and others again urge the tyrant's plea, they endeavor to make it a case of necessity, now is the critical moment;[45] they represent the adoption of this government as our only alternative, as the last opportunity we shall have of peaceably establishing a government;[46] they assert it to be the best system that can be formed, and that if we reject it, we will have a worse one or none at all, nay, that if we presume to propose alterations, we shall get into a labyrinth of difficulties from which we cannot be extricated, as no two states will agree in amendments, that therefore it would involve us in irreconcilable discord.[47] But they all sedulously avoid the fair field of argument, a rational investigation into the origination of the proposed government. I hope the good sense of the people will detect the fallacy of such conduct, will discover the base juggle and with becoming resolution resent the imposition.

2.7.92 That the powers of Congress ought to be strengthened, all allow, but is this a conclusive proof of the necessity to adopt the proposed plan; is it a proof that because the late convention, in the first essay upon so arduous and difficult a subject, harmonised in their ideas, that a future convention will not, or that after a full investigation and mature consideration of the objections, they will not plan a better government and one more agreeable to the sentiments of America, or is it any proof that they can never again agree in any plan? The late convention must indeed have been inspired, as some of its advocates have asserted, to admit the truth of these positions, or even to admit the possibility of the proposed government, being such a one as America ought to adopt; for this body went upon original ground, foreign from their intentions or powers, they must therefore have been wholly uninformed of the sentiments of their constituents in respect to this form of government, as it was not in their contemplation when the convention was appointed to erect a new government, but to strengthen the old one. Indeed they seem to have been determined to monopolize the exclusive merit of the discovery, or rather as if darkness was essential to its success they precluded all communication with the people, by closing their doors; thus the well disposed members unassisted by public information and opinion, were induced by those arts that are now practising on the people, to give their sanction to this system of despotism.

2.7.93 Is there any reason to presume that a new Convention will not agree upon a better plan of government? Quite the contrary, for perhaps there never was such a coincidence on any occasion as on the present[;] the opponents to the proposed plan, at the same time in every part of the continent, harmonised in the same objections; such an uniformity of opposition is without example and affords the strongest demonstration of its solidity. Their objections too are not local, are not confined to the interests of any one particular state to the prejudice of the rest, but with a philanthropy and liberality that reflects lustre on humanity, that dignifies the character of America, they embrace the interests and happiness of the whole union[;] they do not even condescend to minute blemishes, but shew that the main pillars of the fabric are bad, that the essential principles of liberty and safety are not to be found in it, that despotism will be the necessary and inevitable consequence of its establishment.

Centinel.

V

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Friends, Countrymen, and Fellow-Citizens,

2.7.94 Mr. Wilson in a speech delivered in our Convention on Saturday the 24th instant, has conceded, nay forceably proved, that one consolidated government, will not answer for so extensive a territory as the United States includes, that slavery would be the necessary fate of the people under such a government; his words are so remarkable, that I cannot forbear reciting them, they are as follows, viz. "The extent of country for which the new constitution was required, produced another difficulty in the business of the federal convention. It is the opinion of some celebrated writers, that to a small territory, the democratical, to a middling territory, (as Montesquieu has termed it) the monarchical, and, to an extensive territory, the despotic form of government, is best adapted. Regarding then, the wide and almost unbounded jurisdiction of the United States, at first view, the hand of despotism seemed necessary to controul, connect, and protect it; and hence the chief embarrassment rose. For, we knew that, although our constituents would chearfully submit to the legislative restraints of a free government, they would spurn at every attempt to shackle them with despotic power." See page 5 of the printed speech. And again in page 7, he says "Is it probable that the dissolution of the state governments, and the establishment of one consolidated empire would be eligible in its nature, and satisfactory to the people in its administration? I think not, as I have given reasons to shew that so extensive a territory could not be governed, connected, and preserved, but by the supremacy of despotic power. All the exertions of the most potent emperors of Rome were not capable of keeping that empire together, which, in extent, was far inferior to the dominion of America."[48]

This great point having been now confirmed by the concession of Mr. Wilson, though indeed it was self evident before, and the writers against the proposed plan of government, having proved to demonstration, that the powers proposed to be vested in Congress, will necessarily annihilate and absorb the state Legislatures and judiciaries and produce from their wreck one consolidated government, the question is determined. Every man therefore who has the welfare of his country at heart, every man who values his own liberty and happiness, in short, every description of persons, except those aspiring despots who hope to benefit by the mysery and vassalage of their countrymen, must now concur in rejecting the proposed system of government, must now unite in branding its authors with the stigma of eternal infamy. The anniversary of this great escape from the fangs of despotism, ought to be celebrated as long as liberty shall continue to be dear to the citizens of America. 2.7.95

I will repeat some of my principal arguments, and add some further remarks, on the subject of consolidation.[49] 2.7.96

The Legislative is the highest delegated power in government, all others are subordinate to it. The celebrated Montesquieu establishes it as a maxim, that legislation necessarily follows the power of taxation.[50] By the 8th sect. of article the 1st of the proposed government, "the Congress are to have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States." Now, what can be more comprehensive than these words? Every species of taxation, whether external or internal are included. Whatever taxes, duties, and excises that the Congress may deem necessary to the general welfare may be imposed on the citizens of these states and levied by their officers. The congress are to be the absolute judges of the propriety of such taxes, in short they may construe every purpose for which the state legislatures now lay taxes, to be for the general welfare, they may seize upon every source of taxation, and thus make it impracticable for the states to have the smallest revenue, and if a state should presume to impose a tax or excise that would interfere with a federal tax or excise, congress may soon terminate the contention, by repealing the state law, by virtue of the following section—"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department thereof." Indeed every law of the states may be controuled by this power. The legislative power granted for these sections is so unlimited in its nature, may be so comprehensive and boundless in its exercise, that this alone would be amply sufficient to carry the coup de grace to the state governments, to swallow them up in the grand vortex of general empire. But the legislative has an able auxiliary in the judicial department, for a reference to my second number will shew that this may be made greatly instrumental in effecting a consolidation; as the federal judiciary would absorb all others.[51] Lest the foregoing powers should not suffice to consolidate the United States into one empire, the Convention[,] as if determined to prevent the possibility of a doubt, as if to prevent all clashing by the opposition of state powers, as if to preclude all struggle for state importance, as if to level all obstacles to the supremacy of universal sway, which in so extensive a territory, would be an iron-handed despotism, have ordained by article the 6th, "That this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

2.7.97 The words "pursuant to the constitution" will be no restriction to the authority of congress; for the foregoing section gives[52] them unlimited legislation; their unbounded power of taxation does alone include all others, as whoever has the purse strings will have full dominion. But the convention has superadded another power, by which the congress may stamp with the sanction of the constitution every possible law; it is contained in the following clause—"To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof. " Whatever law congress may deem necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of the powers vested in them, may be enacted; and by virtue of this clause, they may controul and abrogate any and every of the laws of the state governments, on the allegation that they interfere with the execution of any of their powers, and yet these laws will "be made in pursuance of the constitution," and of course will "be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

2.7.98 There is no reservation made in the whole of this plan in favor of the rights of the separate states. In the present plan of confederation made in the year 1778,[53] it was thought necessary by article the 2d to declare that "each state retains its sovereignty, freedom and independence, and every power, jurisdiction and right, which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." Positive grant was not then thought sufficiently descriptive and restrictive upon congress, and the omission of such a declaration now, when such great devolutions of power are proposed, manifests the design of consolidating the states.

2.7.99 What restriction does Mr. Wilson pretend there is in the new constitution to the supremacy of despotic sway over the United States? What barrier does he assign for the security of the state governments? Why truly a mere cobweb of a limit! by interposing the shield of what will become mere form, to check the reality of power. He says, that the existence of the state governments are essential to the organization of congress, that the former is made the necessary basis of the latter, for the federal senators and president are to be appointed by the state legislatures; and that hence all fears of a consolidation are groundless and imaginary.[54] It must be confessed, as reason and argument would have been foreign to the defence of the proposed plan of government, Mr. Wilson has displayed much ingenuity on this occasion, he has involved the subject in all the mazes of sophistry, and by subtil distinctions, he has established principles and positions, that exist only in his own fertile imagination. It is a solecism in politics for two co-ordinate sovereignties to exist together, you must separate the sphere of their jurisdiction, or after running the race of dominion for some time, one would necessarily triumph over the other; but in the mean time the subjects of it would be harrassed with double impositions to support the contention; however the strife between congress and the states could not be of long continuance, for the former has a decisive superiority in the outset, and has moreover the power by the very constitution itself to terminate it, when expedient.

2.7.100 As this necessary connexion, as it has been termed, between the state governments and the general government, has been made a point of great magnitude by the advocates of the new plan, as it is the only obstacle alledged by them against a consolidation, it ought to be well considered. It is declared by the proposed plan, that the federal senators and the electors who chuse the president of the United States, shall be appointed by the state legislatures for the long period of six and four years respectively;—how will this connexion prevent the state legislatures being divested of every important, every efficient power? may not they, will not they dwindle into mere boards of appointment, as has ever happened in other nations to public bodies, who, in similar circumstances, have been so weak as to part with the essentials of power? Does not history abound with such instances? And this may be the mighty amount of this inseparable connexion, which is so much dwelt upon as the security of the state governments. Yet even this shadow of a limit against consolidation, may be annihilated by the imperial fiat, without any violation of even the forms of the constitution[;] section 4th of article the 1st has made a provision for this, when the people are sufficiently fatigued with the useless expence of maintaining the forms of departed power and security, and when they shall pray to be relieved from the imposition. This secton cannot be too often repeated, as it gives such a latitude to the designing, as it revokes every other part of the constitution that may be tolerable, and as it may enable the administration under it, to complete the system of despotism; it is in the following words, viz. "The times, places and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, shall be prescribed in each state by the legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of chusing senators." The only apparent restriction in this clause, is as to the place of appointing senators, but even this may be rendered of no avail, for as the Congress have the controul over the time of appointment of both senators and representatives, they may under the pretence of an apprehension of invasion, upon the pretence of the turbulence of what they may stile a faction, and indeed pretences are never wanting to the designing, they may postpone the time of the election of the senators and the representatives from period to period to perpetuity; thus they may[,] and if they may, they certainly will[,] from the lust of dominion, so inherent in the mind of man, relieve the people from the trouble of attending elections by condescending to create themselves. Has not Mr. Wilson avowed it in fact? Has he not said in the Convention that it was necessary that Congress should possess this power as the means of its own preservation[;] otherwise says he, an invasion, a civil war, a faction, or a secession of a minority of the assembly might prevent the representation of a state in Congress.[55]

2.7.101 The advocates of the proposed government must be hard driven, when they represent, that because the legislatures of this and the other states have exceeded the due bounds of power, notwithstanding every guard provided by their constitutions; that because the lust of arbitrary sway is so powerful as sometimes to get the better of every obstacle; that therefore we should give full scope to it, for that all restriction would be useless and nugatory. And further, when they tell you that a good administration will atone for all the defects in the government, which, say they, you must necessarily have, for how can it be otherwise, your rulers are to be taken from among yourselves. My fellow citizens, these aspiring despots, must indeed have a great contempt for your understandings, when they hope to gull you out of your liberties by such reasoning; for what is the primary object of government, but to check and controul the ambitious and designing[;][56] how then can moderation and virtue be expected from men, who will be in possession of absolute sway, who will have the United States at their disposal? They would be more than men, who could resist such temptation! their being taken from among the people, would be no security; tyrants are of native growth in all countries, the greatest bashaw in Turky has been one of the people, as Mr. Wilson tells you the president-general will be.[57] What consolation would this be, when you shall be suffering under his oppression.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, Nov. 30, 1787.

VI

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Man is the glory, jest, and riddle of the world.—Pope.[58]

Incredible transition! the people who, seven years ago, deemed every earthly good, every other consideration, as worthless, when placed in competition with liberty, that heaven-born blessing, that zest of all others; the people, who, actuated by this noble ardor of patriotism, rose superior to every weakness of humanity, and shone with such dazzling lustre amidst the greatest difficulties; who, emulous of eclipsing each other in the glorious assertion of the dignity of human nature, courted every danger, and were ever ready, when necessary, to lay down their lives at the altar of liberty: I say the people, who exhibited so lately a spectacle, that commanded the admiration, and drew the plaudits of the most distant nations, are now reversing the picture, are now lost to every noble principle, are about to sacrifice that inestimable jewel liberty, to the genius of despotism. A golden phantom held out to them, by the crafty and aspiring despots among themselves, is alluring them into the fangs of arbitrary power; and so great is their infatuation, that it seems, as if nothing short of the reality of misery necessarily attendant on slavery, will rouse them from their false confidence, or convince them of the direful deception; but then alas! it will be too late, the chains of despotism will be fast rivetted and all escape precluded. 2.7.102 currency and belief: the devastations, losses and burthens occasioned by the late war; the excessive importations of foreign merchandise and luxuries, which have drained the country of its specie and involved it in debt, are all overlooked, and the inadequacy of the powers of the present confederation is erroneously supposed to be the only cause of our difficulties; hence persons of every description are revelling in the anticipation of the halcyon days, consequent on the establishment of the new constitution.—What gross deception and fatal delusion! Although very considerable benefit might be derived from strengthening the hands of Congress, so as to enable them to regulate commerce, and counteract the adverse restrictions of other nations, which would meet with the concurrence of all persons; yet this benefit, is accompanied in the new constitution with the scourge of despotic power, that will render the citizens of America tenants at will of every species of property, of every enjoyment, and make them the meer drudges of government. The gilded bait conceals corrosives that will eat up their whole substance.

For years past, the harpies of power have been industriously inculcating the idea that all our difficulties proceed from the impotency of Congress, and have at length succeeded to give to this sentiment almost universal 2.7.103

2.7.104 Since the late able discussion,[59] all are now sensible of great defects in the new constitution, are sensible that power is thereby granted without limitation or restriction; yet such is the impatience of the people to reap the golden harvest of regulated commerce, that they will not take time to secure their liberty and happiness, nor even to secure the benefit of the expected wealth; but are weakly trusting their every concern to the discretionary disposal of their future rulers: are content to risque every abuse of power, because they are promised a good administration, because moderation and self-denial are the characteristic features of men in possession of absolute sway. What egregious folly! What superlative ignorance of the nature of power does such conduct discover!

2.7.105 History exhibits this melancholy truth, that slavery has been the lot of nearly the whole of mankind in all ages, and, that the very small portion who have enjoyed the blessings of liberty, have soon been reduced to the common level of slavery and misery. The cause of this general vassalage may be traced to a principle of human nature, which is more powerful and operative than all the others combined; it is that lust of dominion that is inherent in every mind, in a greater or less degree; this is so universal and ever active a passion as to influence all our ancestors; the different situation and qualifications of men only modifies and varies the complexion and operation of it.

2.7.106 For this darling pre-eminence and superiority, the merchant, already possessed of a competency, adventures his all in the pursuit of greater wealth; it is for this, that men of all descriptions, after having amassed fortunes, still persevere in the toils of labour; in short, this is the great principle of exertion in the votaries of riches, learning, and fame.

2.7.107 In a savage state, pre-eminence is the result of bodily strength and intrepidity, which compels submission from all such as have the misfortune to be less able; therefore the great end of civil government is to protect the weak from the oppression of the powerful, to put every man upon the level of equal liberty; but here again the same lust of dominion by different means frustrates almost always this salutary intention. In a polished state of society, wealth, talents, address and intrigue are the qualities that attain superiority in the great sphere of government.

2.7.108 The most striking illustration of the prevalence of this lust of dominion is, that the most strenuous assertors of liberty in all ages, after successfully triumphing over tyranny, have themselves become tyrants, when the unsuspicious confidence of an admiring people have entrusted them with unchecked power: Rare are the instances of self-denial, or consistency of conduct in the votaries of liberty, when they have become possessed of the reins of authority; it has been the peculiar felicity of this country, that her great Deliverer did not prove a Cromwell nor a Monk.

2.7.109 Compare the declarations of the most zealous assertors of religious liberty, whilst under the lash of persecution, with their conduct when in power; you will find that even the benevolence and humility inculcated in the gospels, prove no restraint upon this love of domination—The mutual contentions of the several sects of religion in England some ages since, are sufficient evidence of this truth.

2.7.110 The annals of mankind demonstrate the precarious tenure of privileges and property dependent upon the will and pleasure of rulers; these illustrate the fatal danger of relying upon the moderation and self-denial of men exposed to the temptations that the Congress under the new constitution will be. The lust of power or dominion is of that nature, as seeks to overcome every obstacle, and does not remit its exertions, whilst any object of conquest remains, nothing short of the plenitude of dominion, will satisfy this cursed demon: Therefore, liberty is only to be preserved by a due responsibility in the government, and by the constant attention of the people; whenever that responsibility has been lessened, or this attention remitted, in the same degree has arbitrary sway prevailed.

2.7.111 The celebrated Montesquieu has warned mankind of the danger of an implicit reliance on rulers; he says, that "a perpetual jealousy respecting liberty, is absolutely requisite in all free states,"[60] and again, "that slavery is ever preceded by sleep."[61]

2.7.112 I shall conclude this number with an extract from a speech delivered by Lord George Digby, afterwards Earl of Bristol, in the English Parliament, on the triennial bill in the year 1641, viz. "It hath been a maxim among the wisest legislators that whoever means to settle good laws, must proceed in them with a sinister opinion of all mankind; and suppose that whosoever is not wicked, it is for want only of the opportunity. It is that opportunity of being ill, Mr. Speaker, that we must take away, if ever we mean to be happy, which can never be done, but by the frequency of parliaments.

"No state can wisely be confident of any public minister's continuing good, longer than the rod is held over him.

"Let me appeal to all those that were present in this house at the agitation of the petition of right: And let them tell themselves truly of whose promotion to the management of public affairs do they think the generality would, at that time, have had better hopes, than of Mr. Noy, and Sir Thomas Wentworth; both having been at that time and in that business as I have heard, most keen and active patriots, and the latter of them, to the eternal aggravation of his infamous treachery to the commonwealth be it spoken, the first mover, and insister to have this clause added to the petition of right, viz.

"That for the comfort and safety of his subjects, his Majesty would be pleased to declare his will and pleasure, that all his ministers should serve him according to the laws and statutes of the realm.

"And yet, Mr. Speaker, to whom now can all the inundations upon our liberties, under pretence of law, and the late ship-wreck at once of all our property be attributed more than to Noy, and all those other mischiefs whereby this monarchy hath been brought almost to the brink of destruction, so much to any as to that grand apostate to the commonwealth, the now Lieutenant of Ireland, Sir Thomas Wentworth? Let every man but consider those men as once they were." British Liberties, page 184 and 185.[62]

Centinel.

Philadelphia, December 22, 1787.

VII

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Friends and Fellow-Citizens!

2.7.113 The admiring world lately beheld the sun of liberty risen to meridian splendour in this western hemisphere, whose chearing rays began to dispel the glooms of even trans-atlantic despotism: the patriotic mind, enraptured with the glowing scene, fondly anticipated an universal and eternal day to the orb of freedom; but the horizon is already darkened and the glooms of slavery threaten to fix their empire. How transitory are the blessings of this life! Scarcely have four years elapsed since these United States, rescued from the domination of foreign despots by the unexampled heroism and perseverance of its citizens, at such great expence of blood and treasure, when they are about to fall a prey to the machinations of a profligate junto at home, who seizing the favorable moment, when the temporary and extraordinary difficulties of the people have thrown them off their guard, and lulled that jealousy of power so essential to the preservation of freedom, have been too successful in the sacrilegious attempt; however I am confident that this formidable conspiracy will end in the confusion and infamy of its authors; that if necessary, the avenging sword of an abused people will humble these aspiring despots to the dust, and that their fate, like that of Charles the First of England, will deter such attempts in future, and prove the confirmation of the liberties of America until time shall be no more.

2.7.114 One would imagine by the insolent conduct of these harpies of power, that they had already triumphed over the liberties of the people, that the chains were rivetted and tyranny established. They tell us all further opposition will be vain, as this state has passed the rubicon. Do they imagine the freemen of Pennsylvania will be thus trepaned out of their liberties; that they will submit without a struggle? They must indeed be inebriated with the lust of dominion to indulge such chimerical ideas. Will the act of one sixth of the people, and this too founded on deception and surprise, bind the community? Is it thus that the altar of liberty, so recently crimsoned with the blood of our worthies, is to be prostrated and despotism reared on its ruins? Certainly not. The solemn mumery that has been acting in the name of the people of Pennsylvania will be treated with the deserved contempt; it has served indeed to expose the principles of the men concerned, and to draw a line of discrimination between the real and affected patriots.

2.7.115 Impressed with an high opinion of the understanding and spirit of my fellow citizens, I have in no stage of this business entertained a doubt of its eventual defeat; the momentary delusion, arising from an unreserved confidence placed in some of the characters whose names sanctioned this scheme of power, did not discourage me: I foresaw that this blind admiration would soon be succeeded by rational investigation, which, stripping the monster of its gilded covering, would discover its native deformity.

2.7.116 Already the enlightened pen of patriotism, aided by an able public discussion, has dispelled the mist of deception, and the great body of the people are awakened to a due sense of their danger, and are determined to assert their liberty, if necessary by the sword, but this mean need not be recurred to, for who are their enemies? A junto composed of the lordly and high minded gentry, of the profligate and the needy office-hunters; of men principally who in the late war skulked from the common danger. Would such characters dare to face the majesty of a free people? No.—All the conflict would be between the offended justice and generosity of the people, whether these sacrilegious invaders of their dearest rights should suffer the merited punishment, or escape with an infamous contempt?

2.7.117 However, as additional powers are necessary to Congress, the people will no doubt see the expediency of calling a convention for this purpose as soon as may be by applying to their representatives in assembly, at their next session, to appoint a suitable day for the election of such Convention.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, December 27, 1787.

VIII

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow Citizens,

2.7.118 Under the benign influence of liberty, this country, so recently a rugged wilderness and the abode of savages and wild beasts, has attained to a degree of improvement and greatness, in less than two ages, of which history furnishes no parallel: It is here that human nature may be viewed in all its glory; man assumes the station designed him by the creation; a happy equality and independency pervades the community; it is here the human mind, untrammeled by the restraints of arbitrary power, expands every faculty: as the field to fame and riches is open to all, it stimulates universal exertion, and exhibits a lively picture of emulation, industry and happiness. The unfortunate and oppressed of all nations, fly to this grand asylum, where liberty is ever protected, and industry crowned with success.

2.7.119 But as it is by comparison only that men estimate the value of any good, they are not sensible of the worth of those blessings they enjoy, until they are deprived of them; hence from ignorance of the horrors of slavery, nations, that have been in possession of that rarest of blessings, liberty, have so easily parted with it: when groaning under the yoke of tyranny what perils would they not encounter, what consideration would they not give to regain the inestimable jewel they had lost; but the jealously of despotism guards every avenue to freedom, and confirms its empire at the expence of the devoted people, whose property is made instrumental to their misery, for the rapacious hand of power seizes upon every thing; despair presently succeeds, and every noble faculty of the mind being depressed, and all motive to industry and exertion being removed, the people are adapted to the nature of the government, and drag out a listless existence.

2.7.120 If ever America should be enslaved it will be from this cause, that they are not sensible of their peculiar felicity, that they are not aware of the value of the heavenly boon, committed to their care and protection, and if the present conspiracy fails, as I have no doubt will be the case, it will be the triumph of reason and philosophy, as these United States have never felt the iron hand of power, or experienced the wretchedness of slavery.

2.7.121 The conspirators against our liberties have presumed too much on the maxim that nations do not take the alarm, until they feel oppression; the enlightened citizens of America have on two memorable occasions convinced the tyrants of Europe that they are endued with the faculty of foresight, that they will jealously guard against the first introduction of tyranny, however speciously glossed over, or whatever appearance it may assume: It was not the mere amount of the duty on stamps, or tea that America opposed, they were considered as signals of approaching despotism, as precedents whereon the superstructure of arbitrary sway was to be reared.

Notwithstanding such illustrious evidence of the good sense and spirit of 2.7.122 the people of these United States, and contrary to all former experience of mankind, which demonstrates that it is only by gradual and imperceptible degrees that nations have hitherto been enslaved, except in case of conquest by the sword; the authors of the present conspiracy are attempting to seize upon absolute power at one grasp, impatient of dominion they have adopted a decisive line of conduct, which if successful, would obliterate every trace of liberty. I congratulate my fellow citizens that the infatuated confidence of their enemies has so blinded their ambition, that their defeat must be certain and easy, if imitating the refined policy of successful despots, they had attacked the citadel of liberty by sap, and gradually undermined its outworks, they would have stood a fairer chance of effecting their design; but in this enlightened age thus rashly to attempt to carry the fortress by storm, is folly indeed. They have even exposed some of their batteries prematurely, and thereby unfolded every latent view, for the unlimited power of taxation would alone have been amply sufficient for every purpose; by a proper application of this, the will and pleasure of the rulers would of course have become the supreme law of the land; therefore there was no use in portraying the ultimate object, by superadding the form to reality of supremacy in the following clause, viz. that which empowers the new congress to make all laws that may be necessary and proper for carrying into execution any of their powers, by virtue of which every possible law will be constitutional, as they are to be the sole judges of the propriety of such laws,[63] that which ordains that their acts shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the laws or constitution of any state to the contrary notwithstanding; that which gives Congress the absolute controul over the time and mode of its appointment and election, whereby, independent of any other means, they may establish hereditary despotism; that which authorises them to keep on foot at all times a standing army; and that which subjects the militia to absolute command—and to accelerate the subjugation of the people, trial by jury in civil cases and the liberty of the press are abolished.

So flagrant, so audacious a conspiracy against the liberties of a free people 2.7.123 is without precedent. Mankind in the darkest ages have never been so insulted; even then, tyrants found it necessary to pay some respect to the habits and feelings of the people, and nothing but the name of a Washington could have occasioned a moment's hesitation about the nature of the new plan, or saved its authors from the execration and vengeance of the people, which, eventually will prove an aggravation of their treason; for America will resent the imposition practiced upon the unsuspicious zeal of her illustrious deliverer, and vindicate her character from the aspersions of these enemies of her happiness and fame.

The advocates of this plan have artfully attempted to veil over the true 2.7.124 nature and principles of it with the names of those respectable characters that by consummate cunning and address they have prevailed upon to sign it, and what ought to convince the people of the deception and excite their apprehensions, is that with every advantage which education, the science of government and of law, the knowledge of history and superior talents and endowments, furnish the authors and advocates of this plan with, they have from its publication exerted all their power and influence to prevent all discussion of the subject, and when this could not be prevented they have constantly avoided the ground of argument and recurred to declamation, sophistry and personal abuse, but principally relied upon the magic of names. Would this have been their conduct, if their cause had been a good one? No, they would have invited investigation and convinced the understandings of the people.

2.7.125 But such policy indicates great ignorance of the good sense and spirit of the people, for if the sanction of every convention throughout the union was obtained by the means these men are practising; yet their triumph would be momentary, the favorite object would still elude their grasp; for a good government founded on fraud and deception could not be maintained without an army sufficiently powerful to compel submission, which the well born of America could not speedily accomplish. However the complexion of several of the more considerable states does not promise even this point of success. The Carolinas, Virginia, Maryland, New-York and New-Hampshire have by their wisdom in taking a longer time to deliberate, in all probability saved themselves from the disgrace of becoming the dupes of this gilded bait, as experience will evince that it need only be properly examined to be execrated and repulsed.

2.7.126 The merchant, immersed in schemes of wealth, seldom extends his views beyond the immediate object of gain; he blindly pursues his seeming interest, and sees not the latent mischief; therefore it is, that he is the last to take the alarm when public liberty is threatened. This may account for the infatuation of some of our merchants, who, elated with the imaginary prospect of an improved commerce under the new government, overlook all danger: they do not consider that commerce is the hand-maid of liberty, a plant of free growth that withers under the hand of despotism, that every concern of individuals will be sacrificed to the gratification of the men in power, who will institute injurious monopolies and shackle commerce with every device of avarice; and that property of every species will be held at the will and pleasure of rulers.

2.7.127 If the nature of the case did not give birth to these well-founded apprehensions, the principles and characters of the authors and advocates of the measure ought. View the monopolising spirit of the principal of them.[64] See him converting a bank, instituted for common benefit, to his own and creatures ['] emolument, and by the aid thereof, controuling the credit of the state, and dictating the measures of government. View the vassalage of our merchants, the thraldom of the city of Philadelphia, and the extinction of that spirit of independency in most of its citizens so essential to freedom. View this Collosus attempting to grasp the commerce of America and meeting with a sudden repulse, in the midst of his immense career, receiving a shock that threatens his very existence. View the desperate fortunes of many of his co-adjutors and dependants, particularly the bankrupt situation of the principal instrument under the great man in promoting the new government, whose superlative arrogance, ambition and rapacity, would need the spoils of thousands to gratify; view his towering aspect, he would have no bowels of compassion for the oppressed, he would overlook all their sufferings.[65] Recollect the strenuous and unremitted exertions of these men, for years past, to destroy our admirable constitution, whose object is to secure equal liberty and advantages to all, and the great obstacle in the way of their ambitious schemes, and then answer, whether these apprehensions are chimerical, whether such characters will be less ambitious, less avaritious, more moderate, when the privileges, property, and every concern of the people of the United States shall lie at their mercy, when they shall be in possession of absolute sway?

Centinel.

Philadelphia; December 29, 1787.

IX

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow Citizens,

You have the peculiar felicity of living under the most perfect system of local government in the world; prize then this invaluable blessing as it deserves: Suffer it not to be wrested from you, and the scourge of despotic power substituted in its place, under the specious pretence of vesting the general government of the United States with necessary power; that this would be the inevitable consequence of the establishment of the new constitution, the least consideration of its nature and tendency is sufficient to convince every unprejudiced mind. If you were sufficiently impressed with your present favored situation, I should have no doubt of a proper decision of the question in discussion. 2.7.128

The highest illustration of the excellence of the constitution of this commonwealth, is, that from its first establishment, the ambitious and profligate have been united in a constant conspiracy to destroy it; so sensible are they that it is their great enemy, that it is the great palladium of equal liberty, and the property of the people from the rapacious hand of power: The annals of 2.7.129 mankind do not furnish a more glorious instance of the triumph of patriotism over the lust of ambition aided by most of the wealth of the state. The few generally prevail over the many by uniformity of council, unremitted and persevering exertion, and superior information and address; but in Pennsylvania the reverse has happened; here the well born have been baffled in all their efforts to prostrate the altar of liberty for the purpose of substituting their own insolent sway that would degrade the freemen of this state into servile dependence upon the lordly and great: However, it is not the nature of ambition to be discouraged; it is ever ready to improve the first opportunity to rear its baneful head and with irritated fury to wreak its vengeance on the votaries of liberty. The present conspiracy is a continental exertion of the well born of America to obtain that darling domination, which they have not been able to accomplish in their respective states. Of what complexion were the deputies of this state in the general convention? Six out of eight were the inveterate enemies of our inestimable constitution, and the principals of that faction that for ten years past have kept the people in continual alarm for their liberties. Who are the advocates of the new constitution in this state? They consist of the same faction, with the addition of a few deluded well meaning men, but whose number is daily lessening.

2.7.130 These conspirators have come forward at a most favorable conjuncture, when the state of public affairs has lulled all jealousy of power: Emboldened by the sanction of the august name of a Washington, that they have prostituted to their purpose, they have presumed to overleap the usual gradations to absolute power, and have attempted to seize at once upon the supremacy of dominion. The new instrument of government does indeed make a fallacious parade of some remaining privileges, and insults the understandings of the people with the semblance of liberty in some of its artful and deceptive clauses: which form but a flimsy veil over the reality of tyranny, so weakly endeavored to be concealed from the eye of freedom. For, of what avail are the few inadequate stipulations in favor of the rights of the people, when they may be effectually counteracted and destroyed by virtue of other clauses; when these enable the rulers to renounce all dependence on their constituents, and render the latter tenants at will of every concern? The new constitution is in fact a carte blanche, a surrender at discretion to the will and pleasure of our rulers: as this has been demonstrated to be the case, by the investigation and discussion that have taken place, I trust the same good sense and spirit which have hitherto enabled the people to triumph over the wiles of ambition, will be again exerted for their salvation. The accounts from various parts of the country correspond with my warmest hopes, and justify my early predictions of the eventual defeat of this scheme of power and office-making.

2.7.131 The genius of liberty has sounded the alarm, and the dormant spirit of her votaries is reviving with enthusiastic ardor; the like unanimity which formerly distinguished them in their conflict with foreign despots, promises to crown their virtuous opposition on the present occasion, with signal success. The structure of despotism that has been reared in this state, upon deception and surprise, will vanish like the baseless fabric of a dream and leave not a trace behind.

The parasites and tools of power in Northampton county ought to take warning from the fate of the Carlisle junto, lest like them, they experience the resentment of an injured people. I would advise them not to repeat the imposition of a set of fallacious resolutions as the sense of that county, when in fact, it was the act of a despicable few, with Alexander Paterson at their head, whose achievements at Wyoming, as the meaner instrument of unfeeling avarice, have rendered infamously notorious; but yet, like the election of a Mr. Sedgwick for the little town of Stockbridge, which has been adduced as evidence of the unanimity of the western counties of Massachusetts state in favor of the new constitution, when the fact is far otherwise, this act of a few individuals will be sounded forth over the continent as a testimony of the zealous attachment of the county of Northampton to the new constitution.[66] By such wretched and momentary deceptions do these harpies of power endeavor to give the complexion of strength to their cause. To prevent the detection of such impositions, to prevent the reflection of the rays of light from state to state, which, producing general illumination, would dissipate the mist of deception, and thereby prove fatal to the new constitution, all intercourse between the patriots of America is as far as possible cut off; whilst on the other hand, the conspirators have the most exact information, a common concert is every where evident, they move in unison. There is so much mystery in the conduct of these men, such systematic deception, and fraud characterises all their measures, such extraordinary solicitude shewn by them to precipitate and surprise the people into a blind and implicit adoption of this government, that it ought to excite the most alarming apprehensions in the minds of all those who think their privileges, property and welfare worth securing. 2.7.132

It is a fact that can be established, that during almost the whole of the time that the late convention of this state were assembled, the newspapers published in New-York, by Mr. Greenleaf, which contains the essays written there against the new government, such as the patriotic ones of Brutus, Cincinnatus, Cato, etc.,[67] sent as usual by the printer of that place to the printers of this city, miscarried in their conveyance, which prevented the republication in this state of many of these pieces, and since that period great irregularity prevails; and I stand informed that the printers in New-York complain that the free and independent newspapers of this city do not come to hand; whilst on the contrary, we find the devoted vehicles of despotism pass uninterrupted. I would ask what is the meaning of the new arrangement at the Post-Office, which abridges the circulation of newspapers at this momentous crisis, when our every concern is dependant upon a proper decision of the subject in discussion[68]—No trivial excuse will be 2.7.133 admitted; the Centinel will, as from the first approach of despotism, warn his countrymen of the insidious and base strategems that are practising to hoodwink them out of their liberties.

2.7.134 The more I consider the manœvres that are practising, the more am I alarmed—foreseeing that the juggle cannot long be concealed, and that the spirit of the people will not brook the imposition, they have guarded as they suppose against any danger arising from the opposition of the people, and rendered their struggles for liberty impotent and ridiculous. What otherwise is the meaning of disarming the militia, for the purpose as it is said, of repairing their musquets at such a particular period? Does not the timing of the measure determine the intention? I was ever jealous of the select militia, consisting of infantry and troops of horse, instituted in this city and in some of the counties, without the sanction of law, and officered principally by the devoted instruments of the well born, although the illustrious patriotism of one of them, has not corresponded with the intention of appointing him. Are not these corps provided to suppress the first efforts of freedom, and to check the spirit of the people until a regular and sufficiently powerful military force shall be embodied to rivet the chains of slavery on a deluded nation. What confirms these apprehensions is the declaration of a certain Major, an active instrument in this business, and the echo of the principal conspirators, who has said, he should deem the cutting off of five thousand men, as a small sacrifice, a cheap purchase for the establishment of the new constitution.[69]

Centinel.

Philadelphia, January 5, 1788.

X

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow Citizens,

2.7.135 What illustrious evidence and striking demonstration does the present momentous discussion afford of the inestimable value of the liberty of the press? No doubt now remains, but that it will prove the rock of our political salvation. Despotism, with its innumerable host of evils, by gliding through the mist of deception, had gained some of the principal works, had made a lodgement in the very citadel of liberty before it was discovered, and was near carrying the fortress by surprise: at this imminent alarming crisis the centries from the watch-towers sounded the alarm, and aroused the dormant votaries of liberty to a due sense of their danger; who, with an alacrity and spirit suited to the exigence, answered to the call, repulsed the enemy, dislodged it from most of its acquisitions, and nothing is now wanting to a total rout and compleat defeat, but a general discharge from the artillery of freedom. As the shades of night fly the approach of the radiant sun, so does despotism before the majesty of enlightened truth; wherever free discussion is allowed, this is invariably the consequence. Since the press has been unshackled in Pennsylvania, what an astonishing transition appears in the sentiments of the people! Infatuation is at an end, execration and indignation have succeeded to blind admiration and mistaken enthusiasm. The rampant insolence of the conspirators is prostrated, black dispair has taken possession of many of them, their countenances proclaim their defeat, and express serious apprehension for their personal safety from the rising resentment of injured freemen.

James, the Caledonian, lieutenant general of the myrmidons of power, under Robert, the cofferer, who, with his aid du camp, Gouvero, the cunning man, has taken the field in Virginia;[70] I say James, in this exigence summonses a grand council of his partizans of this city, and represents, in the most pathetic moving language, the deplorable situation of affairs, stimulates them to make a vigorous effort to recover the ground they have lost and establish their empire; that for this purpose, a generous contribution must be made by all those who expect to taste the sweets of power, or share in the fruits of dominion, in order to form a fund adequate to the great design, that may put them in possession of the darling object: then recommends that a committee be appointed of those who are gifted with Machiavelian talents, of those who excel in ingenuity, artifice, sophistry and the refinements of faslehood, who can assume the pleasing appearance of truth and bewilder the people in all the mazes of error; and as the task will be arduous, and requires various abilities and talents, the business ought to be distributed, and different parts assigned to the members of the committee, as they may be respectively qualified; some by ingenious sophisms to explain away and counteract those essays of patriotism that have struck such general conviction; some to manufacture extracts of letters and notes from correspondents, to give the complexion of strength to their cause, by representing the unanimity of all corners of America in favor of the new constitution; and others to write reams of letters to their tools in every direction, furnishing them with the materials of propagating error and deception; in short that this committee ought to make the press groan and the whole country reverberate with their productions. Thus to overpower truth and liberty by the din of empty sound and the delusion of falsehood. 2.7.136

The conspirators, deceived by their first success, grounded on the unreserved confidence of the people, do not consider that with the detection of their views, all chance of success is over; that suspicion once awakened, is not so soon to be lulled, but with eagle-eye will penetrate all their wiles, and detect their every scheme, however deeply laid, or speciously glossed. The labours of their committee will be unavailing, the point of deception is 2.7.137 passed, the rays of enlightened patriotism have diffused general illumination. However, this new effort will serve to shew the perseverance of ambition and the necessity of constant vigilance in the people for the preservation of their liberty.

2.7.138 Already we recognize the ingenuity and industry of this committee; the papers teem with paragraphs, correspondents, etc. that exhibit a picture which bears no resemblance to the original; if we view this mirror for the representation of the sentiments of the people, a perfect harmony seems to prevail, every body in every place are charmed with the new Constitution, consider it as a gift from heaven, as their only salvation, etc. etc. etc. and I am informed expresses are employing to waft the delusion to the remotest corners; such a scene of bustle, lying, and activity, was never exhibited since the days of Adam. The contributions to the grand fund are so great, that it is whispered a magazine of all the apparatus of war is to be immediately provided, and if all other means fail, force is to be recurred to, which they hope will successfully terminate the disagreeable discussion of the rights of mankind, of equal liberty, etc. and thus establish a due subordination to the well born few.

Centinel.

XI[71]

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow Citizens,

2.7.139 The arguments upon which the advocates of the new constitution the most dwell, are the distresses of the community, the evils of anarchy, and the horrible consequences that would ensue from the dissolution of the union of the states, and the institution of separate confederacies or republics: The unanimity of the federal convention, and the sanction of great names, can be no further urged as an argument after the exposition made by the attorney-general of Maryland, who was a member of that convention; he has opened such a scene of discord and accommodation of republicanism to despotism as excite the most serious apprehensions in every patriotic mind.[72] The first argument has been noticed in the preceding essays;[73] wherein it is shewn that this is not the criterion whereby to determine the merits of the new constitution; that notwithstanding the reality of the distresses of the people, the new constitution may not only be inadequate as a remedy, but destructive of liberty, and the completion of misery: The remaining two arguments will be discussed in this number; their futility elucidated; and thus the medium of deception being dissipated, the public attention, with undiverted, undiminished force, will be directed to the proper object, will be confined to the consideration of the nature and construction of the plan of government itself, the question will then be, whether this plan be calculated for our welfare, or misery; whether it is the temple of liberty, or the structure of despotism? and as the former, or the latter, shall appear to be the case, to adopt, or reject it accordingly, otherwise to banish the demon of domination by suitable amendments and qualifications.

2.7.140 The evils of anarchy have been pourtrayed with all imagery of language, in the glowing colours of eloquence; the affrighted mind is thence led to clasp the new constitution as the instrument of deliverance, as the only avenue to safety and happiness:[74] To avoid the possible and transitory evils of one extreme, it is seduced into the certain and permanent misery necessarily attendant on the other. A state of anarchy from its very nature, can never be of long continuance; the greater its violence, the shorter the duration; order and security are immediately sought by the distracted people beneath the shelter of equal laws, and the salutary restraints of regular government; and if this be not attainable, absolute power is assumed by the one, or the few, who shall be the most enterprising and successful. If anarchy, therefore, were the inevitable consequence of rejecting the new constitution, it would be infinitely better to incur it; for even then there would be at least the chance of a good government rising out of licentiousness; but to rush at once into despotism, because there is a bare possibility of anarchy ensuing from the rejection, or from what is yet more visionary, the small delay that would be occasioned by a revision and correction of the proposed system of government, is so superlatively weak, so fatally blind, that it is astonishing any person of common understanding should suffer such an imposition to have the least influence on his judgement; still more astonishing, that so flimsy and deceptive a doctrine should make converts among the enlightened freemen of America, who have so long enjoyed the blessings of liberty; but when I view among such converts, men otherwise pre-eminent, it raises a blush for the weakness of humanity, that these her brightest ornaments should be so dim-sighted to what is self-evident to most men, that such imbecility of judgement should appear where so much perfection was looked for; this ought to teach us to depend more on our own judgement and the nature of the case, than upon the opinions of the greatest and best of men, who, from constitutional infirmities, or particular situations may sometimes view an object through a delusive medium; but the opinions of great men are more frequently the dictates of ambition, or private interest.

2.7.141 The source of the apprehensions of this so much dreaded anarchy would upon investigation be found to arise from the artful suggestions of designing men, and not from a rational possibility grounded on the actual state of affairs; the least reflection is sufficient to detect the fallacy to shew that there is no one circumstance to justify the production of such an event: On the contrary, a short time will evince to the utter dismay and confusion of the conspirators, that a perseverance in cramming down their scheme of power upon the freemen of this state, will inevitably produce an anarchy destructive of their darling domination, and may kindle a flame prejudicial to their safety; they should be cautious not to trespass too far on the forbearance of freemen, when wresting their dearest concerns; but prudently retreat from the gathering storm.

2.7.142 The other spectre that has been raised to terrify and alarm the people out of the exercise of their judgement on this great occasion, is the dread of our splitting into separate confederacies or republics, that might become rival powers and consequently liable to mutual wars from the usual motives of contention. This is an event still more improbable than the foregoing; it is a presumption unwarrantable, either by the situation of affairs, or the sentiments of the people; no disposition leading to it exists; the advocates of the new constitution seem to view such a separation with horror, and its opponents are strenuously contending for a confederation that shall embrace all America under its comprehensive and salutary protection. This hobgoblin appears to have sprung from the deranged brain of Publius, a New-York writer, who, mistaking sound for argument, has with Herculean labour accumulated myriads of unmeaning sentences, and mechanically endeavored to force conviction by a torrent of misplaced words; he might have spared his readers the fatigue of wading through his long-winded disquisitions on the direful effects of the contentions of inimical states, as totally inapplicable to the subject he was professedly treating; this writer has devoted much time, and wasted more paper in combating chimeras of his own creation:[75] However, for the sake of argument, I will admit, that the necessary consequence of rejecting, or delaying the establishment of the new constitution, would be the dissolution of the union, and the institution of even rival and inimical republics; yet ought such an apprehension, if well founded, to drive us into the fangs of despotism: Infinitely preferable would be occasional wars to such an event; the former, although a severe scourge, is transient in its continuance, and in its operation partial, but a small proportion of the community are exposed to its greatest horrors, and yet fewer experience its greatest evils; the latter is permanent and universal misery, without remission or exemption: as passing clouds obscure for a time the splendour of the sun, so do wars interrupt the welfare of mankind; but despotism is a settled gloom that totally extinguishes happiness, not a ray of comfort can penetrate to cheer the dejected mind; the goad of power with unabating rigor insists upon the utmost exaction, like a merciless task master, is continually inflicting the task, and is never satiated with the feast of unfeeling domination, or the most abject servility.

2.7.143 The celebrated Lord Kaims whose disquisitions on human nature evidence extraordinary strength of judgement and depth of investigation, says that a continual civil war, which is the most destructive and horrible scene of human discord, is preferable to the uniformity of wretchedness and misery attendant upon despotism;[76]—of all possible evils, as I observed in my first number, this is the worst and the most to be dreaded.

I congratulate my fellow-citizens that a good government, the greatest earthly blessing, may be so easily obtained, that our circumstances are so favorable that nothing but the folly of the conspirators can produce anarchy or civil war, which would presently terminate in their destruction and the permanent harmony of the state alone, interrupted by their ambitious machinations.

In a former number I stated a charge of a very heinous nature, and highly prejudicial to the public welfare, and at this great crisis peculiarly alarming and threatening to liberty; I mean the suppression of the circulation of the newspapers from state to state by the of——c——rs of the P——t-O——ce, who in violation of their duty and integrity have prostituted their of——ces to forward the nefarious design of enslaving their countrymen, by thus cutting off all communication by the usual vehicle between the patriots of America;—I find that notwithstanding that public appeal, they persevere in this villainous and daring practice. The newspapers of the other states that contain any useful information, are still withheld from the printers of this state, and I see by the annunciation of the Editor of Mr. Greenleaf's patriotic New-York paper, that the printers of that place are still treated in like manner; this informs his readers that but two southern papers have come to hand, and that they contain no information, which he affects to ascribe to the negligence of the p——t boy, not caring to quarrel with the p——t m——t——r g——l.[77] 2.7.144

Centinel.

Philadelphia, January 12, 1788.

XII

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

Conscious guilt has taken the alarm, thrown out the signal of distress, and even appealed to the generosity of patriotism. The authors and abettors of the new constitution shudder at the term conspirators being applied to them, as it designates their true character, and seems prophetic of the catastrophe: they read their fate in the epithet.[78] 2.7.145

In dispair they are weakly endeavouring to screen their criminality by interposing the shield of the virtues of a Washington, in representing his concurrence in the proposed system of government, as evidence of the purity of their intentions; but this impotent attempt to degrade the brightest 2.7.146 ornament of his country to a base level with themselves, will be considered as an aggravation of their treason, and an insult on the good sense of the people, who have too much discernment not to make a just discrimination between the honest mistaken zeal of the patriot, and the flagitious machinations of an ambitious junto, and will resent the imposition that Machiavelian arts and consummate cunning have practiced upon our illustrious chief.

2.7.147 The term conspirators was not, as has been alledged, rashly or inconsiderately adopted; it is the language of dispassionate and deliberate reason, influenced by the purest patriotism: the consideration of the nature and construction of the new constitution naturally suggests the epithet; its justness is strikingly illustrated by the conduct of the patrons of this plan of government, but if any doubt had remained whether this epithet is merited, it is now removed by the very uneasiness it occasions; this is a confirmation of its propriety. Innocence would have nothing to dread from such a stigma, but would triumph over the shafts of malice.

2.7.148 The conduct of men is the best clue to their principles. The system of deception that has been practiced; the constant solicitude shewn to prevent information diffusing its salutary light, are evidence of a conspiracy beyond the arts of sophistry to palliate, or the ingenuity of falsehood to invalidate: the means practised to establish the new constitution are demonstrative of the principles and designs of its authors and abettors.

2.7.149 At the time, says Mr. Martin (deputy from the state of Maryland in the general convention) when the public prints were announcing our perfect unanimity, discord prevailed to such a degree, that the minority were upon the point of appealing to the public against the machinations of ambition.[79] By such a base imposition, repeated in every newspaper and reverberated from one end of the union to the other, was the people lulled into a false confidence, into an implicit reliance upon the wisdom and patriotism of the convention; and when ambition, by her deceptive wiles, had succeeded to usher forth the new system of government with apparent unanimity of sentiment, the public delusion was compleat. The most extravagant fictions were palmed upon the people, the seal of divinity was even ascribed to the new constitution; a felicity more than human was to ensue from its establishment;—overlooking the real cause of our difficulties and burthens, which have their proper remedy, the people were taught that the new constitution would prove a mine of wealth and prosperity equal to every want, or the most sanguine desire; that it would effect what can only be produced by the exertion of industry and the practice of oeconomy.

2.7.150 The conspirators, aware of the danger of delay, that allowing time for a rational investigation would prove fatal to their designs, precipitated the establishment of the new constitution with all possible celerity; in Massachusetts the deputies of that convention, who are to give the final fiat in behalf of that great state to a measure upon which their dearest concerns depend, were elected by express in the first moments of blind enthusiasm; similar conduct has prevailed in the other states as far as circumstances permitted.

If the foregoing circumstances did not prove a conspiracy, there are 2.7.151 others that must strike conviction in the most unsuspicious. Attempts to prevent discussion by shackling the press ought ever to be a signal of alarm to freemen, and considered as an annunciation of meditated tyranny; this is a truth that the uniform experience of mankind has established beyond the possibility of doubt. Bring the conduct of the authors and abettors of the new constitution to this test, let this be the criterion of their criminality, and every patriotic mind must unite in branding them with the stigma of conspirators against the public liberties.—No stage of this business but what has been marked with every exertion of influence and device of ambition to suppress information and intimidate public discussion; the virtue and firmness of some of the printers, rose superior to the menaces of violence, and the lucre of private interest; when every means failed to shackle the press, the free and independent papers were attempted to be demolished by withdrawing all the subscriptions to them within the sphere of the influence of the conspirators; fortunately for the cause of liberty and truth, these daring high-handed attempts have failed except in one instance, where from a peculiarity of circumstances, ambition has triumphed. Under the flimsy pretence of vindicating the character of a contemptible drudge of party rendered ridiculous by his superlative folly in the late convention, of which the statement given in the Pennsylvania Herald, was confessedly a faithful representation, this newspaper has been silenced* by some hundreds of its subscribers (who it seems are generally among the devoted tools of party, or those who are obliged from their thraldom to yield implicit assent to the mandates of the junto) withdrawing their support from it; by this stroke the conspirators have suppressed the publication of the most valuable debates of the late convention, which would have been given in course by the Editor of that paper, whose stipend now ceasing, he cannot afford without compensation the time and attention necessary to this business.

Every patriotic person who had an opportunity of hearing that illustrious 2.7.152 advocate of liberty and his country, Mr. Findley, must sensibly regret that his powerful arguments are not to extend beyond the confined walls of the State-House, where they could have so limited an effect; that the United States could not have been his auditory through the medium of the press. I anticipate the answer of the conspirators; they will tell you that this could not be their motive for silencing this paper, as the whole of the debates were taken down in short hand by another person and published, but the public are not to be easily duped, they will not receive a spurious as an equivalent for a genuine production; equal solicitude was expressed for the publication of the former as for the suppression of the latter—the public will judge of the motives.

*The Herald it is said is to be discontinued the 23d instant, (the Editor is already dismissed.)

2.7.153 That investigation into the nature and construction of the new constitution, which the conspirators have so long and zealously struggled against, has, notwithstanding their partial success, so far taken place as to ascertain the enormity of their criminality. That system which was pompously displayed as the perfection of government, proves upon examination to be the most odious system of tyranny that was ever projected, a many headed hydra of despotism, whose complicated and various evils would be infinitely more oppressive and afflictive than the scourge of any single tyrant: the objects of dominion would be tortured to gratify the calls of ambition and the cravings of power of rival despots contending for the sceptre of superiority; the devoted people would experience a distraction of misery.

2.7.154 No wonder then that such a discovery should excite uneasy apprehensions in the minds of the conspirators, for such an attempt against the public liberties is unprecedented in history, it is a crime of the blackest dye, as it strikes at the happiness of millions and the dignity of human nature, as it was intended to deprive the inhabitants of so large a portion of the globe of the choicest blessing of life and the oppressed of all nations of an asylum.

2.7.155 The explicit language of the Centinel during the empire of delusion was not congenial to the feelings of the people, but truth when it has free scope is all powerful, it enforces conviction in the most prejudiced mind; he foresaw the consequence of an exertion of the good sense and understanding of the people, and predicted the defeat of the measure he ventured to attack, when it was deemed sacred by most men and the certain ruin of any who should dare to lisp a word against it: he has persevered through every discouraging appearance, and has now the satisfaction to find his countrymen are aware of their danger and are taking measures for their security.

2.7.156 Since writing the foregoing, I am informed that the Printer of the Pennsylvania Herald is not quite decided whether he will drop his paper; he wishes, and perhaps will be enabled, to perseverve;—however, the conspirators have effected their purpose; the editor is dismissed and the debates of the convention thereby suppressed.

Centinel.

XIII

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

2.7.157 The conspirators are putting your good sense, patriotism and spirit to the severest test. So bold a game of deception, so decisive a stroke for despotic power, was never before attempted among enlightened freemen. Can there be apathy so indifferent as not to be rouzed into indignation, or prejudice so blind, as not to yield to the glaring evidence of a flagitious conspiracy against the public liberties! The audacious and high-handed measures practised to suppress information, and intimidate discussion, would in any other circumstances than the present, have kindled a flame fatal to such daring invaders of our dearest privileges.

The conspirators having been severely galled and checked in their career 2.7.158 by the artillery of freedom, have made more vigorous and successful efforts to silence her batteries, while falsehood with all her delusions is making new and greater exertions in favor of ambition. On the one hand, every avenue to information is as far as possible cut off, the usual communication between the states through the medium of the press, is in a great measure destroyed, by a new arrangement at the Post-Office, scarcely a newspaper is suffered to pass† by this conveyance,[80] and the arguments of a Findley, a Whitehill and a Smilie, that bright constellation of patriots are suppressed, and a spurious publication substituted; and on the other hand the select committee are assiduously employed in manufacturing deception in all its ensnaring colours, and having an adequate fund at their command, they are deluging the country with their productions. The only newspaper that circulates extensively out of the city is kept running over with deceptive inventions. Doctor Puff[81] the paragraphist, has scarcely slept since his appointment, having received orders to work double tides; beneath his creative pen thousands of correspondents rise into view, who all harmonize in their sentiments and information about the new-constitution; but the chief reliance is on James the Caledonian,[82] who can to appearance distroy all distinction between liberty and despotism, and make the latter pass for the former, who can bewilder truth in all the mazes of sophistry, and render the plainest propositions problematical—He chameleon-like can vary his appearance at pleasure, and assume any character for the purposes of deception. In the guise of a Conciliator, in the Independent Gazetteer, he professes great candour and moderation, admits some of the principal objections to the new constitution to be well founded, and insidiously proposes a method to remove them, which is to consider the first Congress under the new constitution as a convention, competent to supply all defects in the system of government.[83] This is really a discovery that does honor to his invention. What! a legislative declaration or law a basis upon which to rest our dearest liberties. Does he suppose the people have so little penetration as not to see through so flimsy a delusion, that such a security would amount to no more than the will and pleasure of their rulers, who might repeal this fundamental sanction whenever ambition stimulated?—in the feigned character of a Freeman, he combats the weighty arguments of the minority of the late convention, by a meer play upon words, carefully avoiding the real merits of the question,[84] and we moreover trace him in a variety of miscellaneous productions in every shape and form, he occasionally assists Doctor Puff in the fabrication of extracts of letters, paragraphs, correspondents, etc. etc.

†For the truth of this charge I appeal to the Printers.

2.7.159 So gifted and with such a claim of merit from his extraordinary and unwearied exertions in the cause of despotism, who so suitable or deserving of the office of Chief Justice of the United States. How congenial would such a post be to the principles and disposition of James! Here he would be both Judge and jury, sovereign arbiter in law and equity. In this capacity he may satiate his vengeance on patriotism for the opposition given to his projects of dominion: Here he may gratify his superlative arrogance and contempt of mankind, by trampelling upon his fellow creatures with impunity; here he may give the finishing stroke to liberty, and silence the offensive complaints of violated justice and innocence, by adding the sanction of his office to the rapacity of power and the wantonness of oppression; there will be no intervening jury to shield the innocent, or procure redress to the injured.[85]

2.7.160 Fellow-citizens, although the conspirators and their abettors are not sufficiently numerous to endanger our liberties by an open and forcible attack on them, yet when the characters of which they are composed and the methods they are practising, are considered, it ought to occasion the most serious alarm, and stimulate to an immediate, vigorous and united exertion of the patriotic part of the community for the security of their rights and privileges. Societies ought to be instituted in every county and a reciprocity of sentiments and information maintained between such societies, whereby the patriots throughout Pennsylvania, being mutually enlightened and invigorated, would form an invincible bulwark to liberty, and by unity of council and exertion might the better procure and secure to themselves and to unborn ages the blessings of a good federal government. Nothing but such a system of conduct can frustrate the machinations of an ambitious junto, who, versed in Machiavellian arts, can varnish over with the semblance of freedom the most despotic instrument of government ever projected, who cannot only veil over their own ambitious purposes, but raise an outcry against the real patriots for interested views when they are advocating the cause of liberty and of their country by opposing a scheme of arbitrary power and office-making; who can give the appearance of economy to the introduction of a numerous and permanent standing army and the institution of lucrative, needless offices to provide for the swarms of gaping, almost famished expectants, who have been campaigning it for ten years without success against our inestimable state constitution, as a reward for their persevering toils, but particularly for their zeal on the present occasion, and also as a phalanx to tyranny; and who notwithstanding the testimony of uniform experience evinces the necessity of restrictions on those entrusted with power, and a due dependence of the deputy on the constituent being maintained to ensure the public welfare; who notwithstanding the fate that liberty has ever met from the remissness of the people and the persevering nature of ambition who ever on the watch, grasps at every avenue to supremacy. I say, notwithstanding such evidence before them of the folly of mankind so often duped by similar arts, the conspirators have had the address to inculcate the opinion that forms of government are no security for the public liberties, that the administration is every thing, that although there would be no responsibility under the new constitution, no restriction on the powers of the government, whose will and pleasure would be literally the law of the land, yet that we should be perfectly safe and happy, that as our rulers would be made of the same corrupt materials as ourselves, they certainly could not abuse the trust reposed in them, but would be the most self denying order of beings ever created; with your purses at their absolute disposal, and your liberties at their discretion, they would be proof against the charms of money and the allurements of power; however, if such Utopian ideas should prove chimerical and the people should find the yoke too heavy, they might at pleasure alleviate or even throw it off. In short, the conspirators have displayed so much ingenuity on this occasion, that if it had not been for the patriotism and firmness of some of the printers, which gave an opportunity to enlightened truth to come forward, and by her invincible powers to detect the sophistry, and expose the fallacy of such impositions, liberty must have been overcome by the wiles of ambition, and this land of freemen have become the miserable abode of slaves.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, January 26, 1788.

XIV

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

I am happy to find the comment that I have made upon the nature and tendency of the new constitution, and my suspicions of the principles and designs of its authors, are fully confirmed by the evidence of the Honorable LUTHER MARTIN, esquire, late deputy in the general convention. He has laid open the conclave, exposed the dark scene within, developed the mystery of the proceedings, and illustrated the machinations of ambition. His public spirit has drawn upon him the rage of the conspirators, for daring to remove the veil of secrecy, and announcing to the public the meditated, gilded mischief: all their powers are exerting for his destruction, the mint of calumny is assiduously engaged in coining scandal to blacken his character, and thereby to invalidate his testimony; but this illustrious patriot will rise 2.7.161 superior to all their low arts, and be the better confirmed in the good opinion and esteem of his fellow-citizens, upon whose gratitude he has an additional claim by standing forth their champion at a crisis when most men would have shrunk from such a duty. Mr. Martin has appealed to general Washington for the truth of what he has advanced, and undaunted by the threats of his and his country's enemies, is nobly persevering in the cause of liberty and mankind. I would earnestly recommend it to all well meaning persons to read his communication, as the most satisfactory and certain method of forming a just opinion on the present momentous question, particularly the three or four last continuances, as they go more upon the general principles and tendency of the new constitution. I have in former numbers alluded to some passages in this publication; I shall in this number quote some few others, referring to the work itself for a more lengthy detail. The following paragraphs are extracted from the continuances republished in the "Independent Gazetteer" of the 25th January, and the "Pennsylvania Packet" of the 1st February instant, viz.

[Here Centinel inserts two extracts from Luther Martin's Genuine Information: the first is 2.4.55 above ("By the eighth section of this article . . . on which the imposts and excises are laid."); the second is 2.4.43–44 above ("But even this provision . . . and they acted accordingly."). The extracts are complete and substantially accurate and are therefore not reprinted here. Centinel concludes:]

2.7.162 After such information, what are we to think of the declarations of Mr. Wilson, who assured our state convention, that it was neither the intention of the authors of the new constitution, nor its tendency to establish a consolidated or national government, founded upon the destruction of the state governments, that such could not have been the design of the general convention he said was certain, because the testimony of experience, the opinions of the most celebrated writers, and the nature of the case demonstrated in the clearest manner, that so extensive a territory as these United States includes, could not be governed by any other mode than a confederacy of republics consistent with the principles of freedom, and that their own conviction was, that nothing short of the supremacy of despotism could connect and bind together this country under ONE GOVERNMENT?[86] Has any one a doubt now remaining of the guilt of the conspirators!

2.7.163 The O——rs of the P——t O——ce, fearful of the consequences of their conduct, are taking measures to invalidate the charge made against them. As this is a matter of the highest importance to the public, it will be necessary to state the charge and the evidence. In two of my former numbers, I asserted that the patriotic newspapers of this city and that of New-York miscarried in their passage, whilst the vehicles of despotism, meaning those newspapers in favor of the new constitution, passed as usual; and it was particularly asserted that the patriotic essays of Brutus, Cincinnatus, Cato, etc. published at New-York, were withheld during the greatest part of the time that our state convention sat; and in a late number, I further asserted that since the late arrangement at the P——t O——ce, scarcely a newspaper was suffered to pass by the usual conveyance, and for the truth of this last charge I appealed to the printers;[87] however I understand this last is not denied or controverted. When the dependence of the printers on the P——t O——ce is considered, the injury they may sustain by incurring the displeasure of these of——rs, and when to this is added that of the complexion of the printers in respect to the new constitution, that most of them are zealous in promoting its advancement, it can scarcely be expected that they would volunteer it against the P——t O——rs, or refuse their names to a certificate exculpating the of——rs; accordingly we find that most of the printers have signed a certificate that the newspapers arrived as usual prior to the first of January, when the new arrangement took place; however, the printer of the Freeman's Journal when applied to, had the spirit to refuse his name to the establishment of a falsehood, and upon being called upon to specify the missing papers, particularly during the sitting of the state convention, he pointed out and offered to give a list of a considerable number, instancing no less than seven successive Greenleaf's patriotic New-York papers, besides others occasionally with-held from him; Colonel Oswald was out of town when his family was applied to, or I have no doubt he would have observed a similar conduct. But there is a fact that will invalidate any certificate that can be procured on this occasion, and is alone demonstrative of the suppression of the patriotic newspapers. The opponents to the new constitution in this state were anxious to avail themselves of the well-written essays of the New-York patriots, such as Brutus, Cincinnatus, Cato, etc.[88] and with that view were attentive to have them republished here as soon as they came to hand, and especially during the sitting of our state convention, when they would have been the most useful to the cause of liberty by operating on the members of that convention; a recurrence to the free papers of this city at that period, will shew a great chasm in these republications, owing to the miscarriage of Greenleaf's New-York papers; agreeable to my assertions it will appear, that for the greatest part of the time that our state convention sat, scarcely any of the numbers of Brutus, Cincinnatus, Cato, etc. were republished in this city; the fifth number of Cincinnatus that contained very material information about the finances of the union, which strikes at some of the principal arguments in favor of the new constitution, which was published at New-York the 29th November, was not republished here until the 15th December following, two or three days after the convention rose, and so of most of the other numbers of this and the other signatures; so great was the desire of the opponents here to republish them, that the fourth number of Cincinnatus was republished so lately as in Mr. Bailey's last paper, which with other missing numbers were procured by private hands from New-York, and in two or three instances, irregular numbers were republished. The new arrangement at the P——t O——ce, novel in its nature, and peculiarly injurious by the suppression of information at this great crisis of public affairs, is a circumstance highly presumptive of the truth of the other charge.

Centinel.

XV[89]

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

2.7.164 There are few of the maxims or opinions we hold, that are the result of our own investigation or observation, and even those we adopt from others are seldom on a conviction of their truth or propriety, but from the facination of example and the influence of what is or appears to be the general sentiment. The science of government being the most abstruse and unobvious of all others, mankind are more liable to be imposed upon by the artful and designing in systems and regulations of government, than on any other subject: hence a jealousy of innovation confirmed by uniform experience prevails in most communities; this reluctance to change, has been found to be the greatest security of free governments, and the principal bulwark of liberty; for the aspiring and ever-restless spirit of ambition would otherwise, by her deceptive wiles and ensnaring glosses, triumph over the freest and most enlightened people. It is the peculiar misfortune of the people of these United States, at this awful crisis of public affairs, to have lost this useful, this absolutely necessary jealousy of innovation in government, and thereby to lie at the mercy and be exposed to all the artifices of ambition, without this usual shield to protect them from imposition. The conspirators, well aware of their advantage, have seized the favorable moment, and by the most unparalleled arts of deception, have obtained the sanction of the conventions of several states to the most tyrannic system of government ever projected.

2.7.165 The magic of great names, the delusion of falsehood, the suppression of information, precipitation and fraud have been the instruments of this partial success, the pillars whereon the structure of tyranny has been so far raised. Those influential vehicles, the newspapers with few exceptions, have been devoted to the cause of despotism, and by the subserviency of the P—— O——, the usefulness of the patriotic newspapers has been confined to the places of their publication, whilst falsehood and deception have had universal circulation, without the opportunity of refutation. The feigned unanimity of one part of America, has been represented to produce the acquiescence of another, and so mutually to impose upon the whole by the force of example.

2.7.166 The adoption of the new constitution by the convention of the state of Massachusetts, by a majority of nineteen out of near four hundred members, and that too qualified by a number of propositions of amendment, cannot afford the conspirators much cause for triumph, and especially when all the circumstances under which it has been obtained, are considered. The late alarming disorders which distracted that state, and even threatened subversion of all order and government, and were with difficulty suppressed, occasioned the greatest consternation among all men of property and rank: in this disposition even the most high toned and arbitrary government became desirable as a security against licentiousness and agrarian laws; consequently the new constitution was embraced with eagerness by men of these descriptions, who, in every community, form a powerful interest, and added to the conspirators, office-hunters, etc. etc. made a formidable and numerous party in favor of the new constitution. The elections of the members of convention were moreover made in the first moments of blind enthusiasm, when every artifice was practised to prejudice the people against all those who had the enlightened patriotism to oppose this system of tyranny: thus was almost every man of real ability, who was in opposition, excluded from a seat in the convention; consequently the contest was very unequal; well-meaning, though uninformed men, were opposed to great learning, eloquence and sophistry in the shape of lawyers, doctors and divines, who were capable and seemed disposed to delude by deceptive glosses and specious reasoning; indeed, from the specimens we have seen of the discussion on this occasion, every enlightened patriot must regret that the cause of liberty has been so weakly, although jealously advocated, that its champions were so little illuminated. In addition to these numerous advantages in the convention, the friends of the new constitution had the weight and influence of the town of Boston to second their endeavors, and yet, notwithstanding all this, were near losing the question, although delusively qualified. Is this any evidence of the excellency of the new constitution? Certainly not. Nor can it have any influence in inducing the remaining states to accede. They will examine and judge for themselves, and from their wisdom in taking due time for deliberation, I have no doubt will prove the salvation of the liberties of the United States.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, February 20th, 1788.

XVI

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

The new constitution instead of being the panecea or cure of every grievance so delusively represented by its advocates will be found upon exami- 2.7.167 nation like Pandora's box, replete with every evil. The most specious clauses of this system of ambition and iniquity contain latent mischief, and premeditated villainy. By section 9th of the 1st article, "No ex post facto law shall be passed." This sounds very well upon a superficial consideration, and I dare say has been read by most people with approbation. Government undoubtedly ought to avoid retrospective laws as far as may be, as they are generally injurious and fraudulent: Yet there are occasions when such laws are not only just but highly requisite. An ex post facto law is a law made after the fact, so that the Congress under the new constitution are precluded from all controul over transactions prior to its establishment. This prohibition would skreen the numerous public defaulters, as no measure could be constitutionally taken to compel them to render an account and restore the public money; the unaccounted millions lying in their hands would become their private property. Hitherto these characters from their great weight and numbers have had the influence to prevent an investigation of their accounts, but if this constitution be established, they may set the public at defiance, as they would be completely exonerated of all demands of the United States against them. This is not a strained construction of this section, but the proper evident meaning of the words, which not even the ingenuity, or sophistry of the Caledonian,[90] can disguise from the meanest capacity. However if this matter admitted of any doubt, it would be removed by the following consideration, viz. that the new constitution is founded upon a dissolution of the present articles of confederation and is an original compact between those states, or rather those individuals who accede to it; consequently all contracts, debts and engagements in favor or against the United States, under the old government, are cancelled unless they are provided for in the new constitution. The framers of this constitution appear to have been aware of such consequence by stipulating in article 6th, that all debts contracted, and engagements entered into before the adoption of this constitution shall be valid against the United States under the new constitution, but there is no provision that the debts, etc. due to the United States, shall be valid or recoverable. This is a striking omission, and must have been designed, as debts of the latter description would naturally occur and claim equal attention with the former. This article implied, cancels all debts due to the United States prior to the establishment of the new constitution. If equal provision had been made for the debts due to the United States, as against the United States, the ex post facto clause would not have so pernicious an operation.

2.7.168 The immaculate convention, that is said to have possessed the fullness of patriotism, wisdom and virtue, contained a number of the principal public defaulters; and these were the most influential members, and chiefly instrumental in the framing of the new constitution: There were several of this description in the deputation from the state of Pennsylvania, who have long standing and immense accounts to settle, and MILLIONS perhaps to refund. The late Financier[91] alone, in the capacity of chairman of the commercial committee of Congress, early in the late war, was entrusted with millions of public money, which to this day remain unaccounted for, nor has he settled his accounts as Financier. The others may also find it a convenient method to balance accounts with the public; they are sufficiently known and therefore need not be designated—This will account for the zealous attachment of such characters to the new constitution and their dread of investigation and discussion. It may be said that the new Congress would rather break through the constitution than suffer the public to be defrauded of so much treasure, when the burthens and distresses of the people are so very great; but this is not to be expected from the characters of which that Congress would in all probability be composed, if we may judge from the predominant influence and interest these defaulters now possess in many of the states. Besides, should Congress be disposed to violate the fundamental articles of the constitution for the sake of public justice, they would be prevented in so doing by their oaths,* but even if this should not prove an obstacle, if it can be supposed that any set of men would perjure themselves for the public good, and combat an host of enemies on such terms, still it would be of no avail, as there is a further barrier interposed between the public and these defaulters, namely, the supreme court of the union, whose province it would be to determine the constitutionality of any law that may be controverted;[92] and supposing no bribery or corrupt influence practised on the bench of judges, it would be their sworn duty to refuse their sanction to laws made in the face and contrary to the letter and spirit of the constitution, as any law to compel the settlement of accounts and payment of monies depending and due under the old confederation would be. The 1st section of 3d article gives the supreme court cognizance of not only the laws, but of all cases arising under the constitution, which empowers this tribunal to decide upon the construction of the constitution itself in the last resort. This is so extraordinary, so unprecedented an authority, that the intention in vesting of it must have been to put it out of the power of Congress, even by breaking through the constitution, to compel these defaulters to restore the public treasure.

In the present circumstances these sections of the new constitution would 2.7.169 be also productive of great injustice between the respective states; the delinquent states would be exonerated from all existing demands against them on account of the great arrearages of former requisitions, as they could not be constitutionally compelled to discharge them. And as the majority of the states are in this predicament, and have an equal voice in the senate, it would be their interest, and in their power by not only the constitution, but

*Article VI. "The senators and representatives before-mentioned and the members of the several state legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several states, shall be bound by oath to support this constitution." Were ever public defaulters so effectually skreened! Not only the administrators of the general government, but also of the state governments, are prevented by oath from doing justice to the public; and the legislature of Pennsylvania could not without perjury insist upon the delinquent states discharging their arrears.

by a superiority of votes to prevent the levying of such arrearages; besides, the constitution, moreover, declares, that all taxes, etc. shall be uniform throughout the United States; which is an additional obstacle against noticing them.

2.7.170 The state of Pennsylvania in such case would have no credit for her extraordinary exertions and punctuality heretofore; but would be taxed equally with those states which, for years past, have not contributed any thing to the common expences of the union; indeed, some of the states have paid nothing since the revolution.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, 23d February, 1788.

XVII

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

2.7.171 In my last number I exposed the villainous intention of the framers of the new constitution, to defraud the public out of the millions lying in the hands of individuals by the construction of this system, which would, if established, cancel all debts now due to the United States. I also shewed that thereby the delinquent states would be exonerated of all arrearages due by them on former requisitions of Congress; and to prove that the cancelling of the public dues was premeditated in regard to individuals, I stated that the general convention contained a number of the principal public defaulters, and that these were the most influential members, and chiefly instrumental in framing the new constitution: In answer to which, the conspirators have, by bold assertions, spurious vouchers, and insufficient certificates, endeavoured to exculpate one member, and to alleviate the weight of the charge of delinquency against another. In the face of a resolution of Congress of the 20th June, 1785, declaring their intention of appointing 3 commissioners, to settle and adjust the receipts and expenditures of the late financier; the conspirators have asserted, that his accounts were finally settled in November, 1784, for which they pretend to have vouchers, and by a pompous display of certain resolutions of Congress, respecting a particular charge of fraud against him, as commercial agent to the United States, they vainly hope to divert the public attention from his great delinquency, in never accounting for the millions of public money, entrusted to him in that line. When we consider the immense sums of money taken up by Mr. M[orri]s, as commercial agent, to import military supplies, and even to trade in behalf of the United States, at a time when the risque was so great, that individuals would not venture their property; that all these transactions were conducted under the private firm of W[illiam Gavett] and M[ereer], which afforded unrestrained scope to peculation and embezzlement of the public property, by enabling Mr. M[orri]s to throw the loss of all captures by the enemy, at that hazardous period, on the public, and converting most of the safe arrivals (which were consequently very valuable) into his private property; and when we add to these considerations, the principles of the MAN, his bankrupt situation at the commencement of the late war, and the immense wealth he has dazzled the world with since, can it be thought unreasonable to conclude, that the principal source of his affluence was the commercial agency of the United States, during the war, not that I would derogate from his successful ingenuity in his numerous speculations in the paper monies, Havannah monopoly and job, or in the sphere of financiering.[93]

The certificate published in behalf of general M[i]fflin, the quarter master gen[era]l, will not satisfy a discerning public, or acquit him of the charge of delinquency, as this certificate was procured to serve an electioneering purpose, upon a superficial and hasty inspection of his general account, unchecked by the accounts of his deputies, whose receipts and expenditures had not been examined, and consequently, by errors, collusion between him and them, or otherside g[enera]l M[i]fflin may retain a large balance in his hands; in such case a quietus may have been thought expedient to continue his affluence. 2.7.172

For the honor of human nature, I wish to draw a veil over the situation and conduct of another weighty character, whose name has given a false lustre to the new constitution, and been the occasion of sullying the laurels of a Washington, by inducing him to acquiesce in a system of despotism and villainy, at which enlightened patriotism shudders. 2.7.173

The discovery of the intended fraud, which for magnitude and audacity, is unparalelled, must open the eyes of the deluded to the true character and principles of the men who had assumed the garb of patriotism, with an insidious design of enslaving and robbing their fellow-citizens—of establishing those odious distinctions between the well born and the great body of the people, of degrading the latter to the level of slaves, and elevating the former to the rank of nobility. 2.7.174

The citizens of this state, which is in advance in its payments to the federal treasury, whilst some of the others have not paid a farthing since the war, ought in a peculiar manner to resent the intended imposition, and make its authors experience their just resentment; it is incumbent upon them in a particular manner, to exert themselves to frustrate the measures of the conspirators, and set an example to those parts of the union, who have not enjoyed the blessing of a free press on this occasion, but are still enveloped in the darkness of delusion, and enthralled by the fascination of names. 2.7.175

Could it have been supposed seven years ago, that, before the wounds received in the late conflict for liberty were scarcely healed, a post master-general and his deputies would have had the daring presumption to convert 2.7.176 an establishment intended to promote and secure the public welfare into an engine of despotism, by suppressing all those newspapers that contain the essays of patriotism and real intelligence, and propagating instead thereof falsehoods and delusion? Such a supposition at that time, would have been treated as chimerical; but how must our indignation rise when we find this flagitious practice is persevered in, after being publicly detected! Must not the bribe from the conspirators be very great to compensate the post master-general and his deputies, for the loss of character and infamy consequent upon such conduct, and for the danger they incur of being impeached and turned out of office?

2.7.177 The scurrilous attack of the little Fiddler upon Mr. Workman of the university, on a suspicion, perhaps unfounded, of his being the author of a series of essays under the signature of Philadelphiensis, is characteristical of the man;[94] he has ever been the base parasite and tool of the wealthy and great, at the expence of truth, honor, friendship, treachery to benefactors, nay to the nearest relatives; all have been sacrificed by him at the shrine of the great: he ought however, to have avoided a contrast with so worthy and highly respected a character as Mr. Workman, who had an equal right with himself to offer his sentiments on the new constitution; and if he viewed it as a system of despotism, and had talents to unfold its nature and tendency, he deserves the thanks of every patriotic American, if he has exerted them under the character of Philadelphiensis.—His not being above four years in the country can be no objection; the celebrated Thomas Paine wrote his Common Sense before he had been two years in America, which was not the less useful or acceptable upon that account. The public have nothing to do with the author of a piece; it is the merits of the writing that are alone to be considered.—Mr. Workman, prior to his coming to America, was a professor in an eminent academy in Dublin.—Little Francis should have been cautious in giving provocation, for insignificance alone could have preserved him the smallest remnant of character; I hope he will take the hint, or such a scene will be laid open as will disgrace even his patrons; the suit of claths, and the quarter cask of wine, will not be forgot.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, March 19th, 1788.

XVIII

To the People of Pennsylvania.

Fellow-Citizens,

2.7.178 The measures that are pursuing to effect the establishment of the new constitution, are so repugnant to truth, honor, and the well-being of society, as would disgrace any cause. If the nature and tendency of this system were to be judged of by the conduct of its framers and patrons, what a picture of ambition and villainy would present itself to our view! From the specimens they have already given, anticipation may easily realise the consequences that would flow from the new constitution, if established; [we] may bid adieu to all the blessings of liberty, to all the fruits of the late glorious assertion of the rights of human nature, made at the expence of so much blood and treasure. Yet such is the infatuation of many well meaning persons, that they view with indifference the attrocious villainy which characterises the proceedings of the advocates of the new system: The daring, and in most parts of the United States, the successful methods practised to shackle the press, and destroy the freedom of discussion; the silencing the Pennsylvania Herald, to prevent the publication of the invaluable debates of the late convention of this state; the total suppression of real intelligence, and of the illuminations of patriotism through the medium of the post-office; the systematic fraud and deception that pervade the union; the stigmatising, and by every art which ambition and malice can suggest, labouring to villify, intimidate and trample under foot every disinterested patriot, who preferring his country's good to every other consideration, has the courage to stand forth the champion of liberty and the people; and the intercepting of private confidential letters passing from man to man, violating the sacredness of a seal, and thus infringing one of the first privileges of freemen—that of communicating with each other:[95] I say all these are overlooked by the infatuated admirers of the new system, who, deluded by the phantom of wealth and prosperity, profit not by the admonitory lesson which such proceedings afford, are deaf to the calls of patriotism, and would rush blindly into the noose of ambition.

However, to the honor of Pennsylvania, a very large majority of her 2.7.179 citizens view the subject in its true light, and spurn the shackles prepared for them. They will in due time convince the aspiring despots and avaricious office-hunters, that their dark intrigues, and deep concerted schemes of power and aggrandisement, are ineffectual, that they are neither to be duped nor dragooned out of their liberties. The conspirators, I know, insolently boast that their strength in the other states will enable them to crush the opposition in this; but let them not build upon that which is in its nature precarious and transient, which must fail them the moment the delusion is dispelled: Their success in the other states is the fruit of deceptions that cannot be long supported. Indeed the audacity and villainy of the conspirators on the one hand, and the frantic enthusiasm, and easy credulity of the people on the other, in some of the states, however well attested and recorded in the faithful page of history, will be treated by posterity as fabulous.

The great artifice that is played off on this occasion, is the persuading the 2.7.180 people of one place, that the people every where else are nearly unanimous in favor of the new system, and thus endeavouring by the fascination of example and force of general opinion to prevail upon the people every where to acquiesce in what is represented to them as the general sentiment.

2.7.181 Thus as one means of deception has failed them, they have adopted another, always avoiding rational discussion. When the glare of great names, the dread of annihilation if the new system was rejected, or the adoption of it even delayed, were dissipated by the artillery of truth and reason; they have recurred to the one now practising, the intimidating and imposing influence of imaginary numbers and unanimity that are continually reverberated from every part of the union, by the tools and vehicles of the would-be despots; and in which they have had astonishing success. The people in the Eastern states have been taught to believe that it is all harmony to the Southward; and in the Southern states they are discouraged from opposition by the unanimity of the Eastern and Northern states; nay, what will appear incredible, considering the distance, a gentleman of veracity just returned from New-York, assures that the conspirators have had the address to inculcate an opinion there that all opposition had ceased in this state, notwithstanding the evidence of the contrary is so glaring here; this gentleman further informs, that so entirely devoted is the post-office, that not a single newspaper is received by the printers of that place from this city or elsewhere; and a Boston newspaper come by private hand, announces [to] the public, that for some months past, the printers there have received no newspapers to the Southward of New-Haven, in Connecticut, where the press is muzzled, and consequently, cannot injure the cause; that all intelligence of the occurrences in the other states is withheld from them; and that they know more of the state of Europe, than of their own country.

2.7.182 Notwithstanding many thousand copies of the Reasons of Dissent of the minority of the late convention of this state were printed and forwarded in every direction, and by various conveyances, scarcely any of these got beyond the limits of this state, and most of them not until a long time after their publication.[96] The printer of these Reasons, by particular desire, addressed a copy of them to every printer in the union, which he sent to the Post-office to be conveyed in the mail as usual, long before the new arrangement, as it is called, took place; and yet we since find that none of them reached the place of their destination. This is a full demonstration of the subserviency of the Post-Office, and a striking evidence of the vigilance that has been exerted to suppress information. It is greatly to be regretted that the opposition in Massachusetts were denied the benefits of our discussion, that the unanswerable dissent of our minority did not reach Boston in time to influence the decision of the great question by their convention, as it would in all probability have enabled patriotism to triumph; not that I would derogate from the good sense and public spirit of that state, which I have no doubt would in common circumstances have shone with equal splendor, but this was far from being the case; the new constitution was viewed in Massachusetts through the medium of a SHAYS, the terrors of HIS insurrection had not subsided; a government that would have been execrated at another time was embraced by many as a refuge from anarchy, and thus liberty deformed by mad riot and dissention, lost her ablest advocates.

2.7.183 As the liberties of all the states in the union are struck at in common with those of Pennsylvania, by the conduct of the Post-Master General and deputies, I trust that the example which her Legislature* has set by instructing her delegates in Congress on this subject, will be followed by the others, that with one accord they will hurl their vengeance on the venal instruments of ambition, who have presumed to prostrate one of the principal bulwarks of liberty. In a confederated government of such extent as the United States, the freest communication of sentiment and information should be maintained, as the liberties, happiness and welfare of the union depend upon a concert of counsels; the signals of alarm whenever ambition should rear its baneful head, ought to be uniform: without this communication between the members of the confederacy the freedom of the press, if it could be maintained in so severed a situation, would cease to be a security against the encroachments of tyranny. The truth of the foregoing position is strikingly illustrated on the present occasion; for want of this intercommunity of sentiment and information, the liberties of this country are brought to an awful crisis; ambition has made a great stride towards dominion; has succeeded thro' the medium of muzzled presses to delude a great body of the people in the other states, and threatens to overwhelm the enlightened opposition in this by external force. Here, indeed, notwithstanding every nerve was strained, by the conspirators, to muzzle or demolish every newspaper that allowed free discussion, two printers have asserted the independency of the press,[97] whereby the arts of ambition have been detected, and the new system has been pourtrayed in its native villainy; its advocates have long since abandoned the field of argument, relinquished the unequal contest, and truth and patriotism reigns triumphant in this state; but the conspirators trust to their success in the other states for the attainment of their darling object, and therefore all their vigilance is exerted to prevent the infectious spirit of freedom and enlightened patriotism communicating to the rest of the union—all intercourse is as far as possible cut off.

2.7.184 To rectify the erroneous representation made in the other states of the sentiments of the people in this respecting the new constitution, I think it my duty to state the fact as it really is:—Those who favor this system of tyranny are most numerous in the city of Philadelphia, where, perhaps, they may be a considerable majority; in the most eastern counties they compose about one-fourth of the people, but in the middle, northern and western counties not above a twentieth part; so that upon the whole the friends to the new constitution in this state are about one-sixth of the people. The following circumstance is an evidence of the spirit and decision of the opposition:—An individual unadvisedly and without concert, and contrary to the system of conduct generally agreed upon, went to the expence of printing and circulating an address to the Legislature, reprobating in the strongest terms the new constitution, and praying that the deputies of this state in the federal Convention, who in violation of their duty acceeded to the new constitution, be called to account for their daring procedure; this address or petition was signed by upwards of four thousand citizens in only two counties, viz. Franklin and Cumberland, and if the time had admitted, prior to the adjournment of the Legislature, there is reason to believe that this high-toned application would have been subscribed by five-sixth of the freemen of this state.[98] The advocates of the new constitution, availing themselves of this partial measure of two counties, have asserted it to be the result of a general exertion, which is so evidently false that it can only deceive people at a distance from us, for the counties over the mountain are nearly unanimous in the opposition; in Fayette at a numerous county meeting, there appeared to be but two persons in favor of the constitution; in Bedford county in the mountains, there are not above twenty; in Huntingdon adjoining, about 30; in Dauphin, in the middle country, not 100; in Berks, a large eastern county that has near 5000 taxable inhabitants, not more than 50, and so of several others, and yet no petitions were circulated or signed in those counties.—The system of conduct alluded to is the forming societies in every county in the state, who have committees of correspondence; these are now engaged in planning a uniform exertion to emancipate this state from the thraldom of despotism; a convention of deputies from every district will in all probability be agreed upon, as the most eligible mode of combining the strength of the opposition, which is increasing daily both in numbers and spirit.

*The application to Congress from our Legislature, was made upon the complaint of all the printers of newspapers in the city of Philadelphia.

2.7.185 The Centinel, supported by the dignity of the cause he advocates, and sensible that his well-meant endeavors have met the approbation of the community, views with ineffable contempt the impotent efforts of disappointed ambition to depreciate his merit and stigmatize his performances, and without pretending to the spirit of divination, he thinks he may predict that the period is not far distant when the authors and wilful abettors of the new constitution will be viewed with detestation by every good man, whilst the Centinels of the present day will be honored with the esteem and confidence of a grateful people.

2.7.186 Great pains have been taken to discover the author of these papers, with a view, no doubt, to villify his private character, and thereby lessen the usefulness of his writings, and many suppose they have made the discovery, but in this they are mistaken. The Centinel submits his performances to the public judgement, and challenges fair argumentation; the information he has given from time to time, has stood the test of the severest scrutiny, and thus his reputation as a writer, is established beyond the injury of his enemies. If it were in the least material to the argument, or answered any one good purpose, he would not hesitate a moment in using his own signature; as it would not, but on the contrary, point where the shafts of malice could be levelled with most effect, and thus divert the public attention from the proper object, to a personal altercation, he from the first determined that the prying eye of party or curiosity, should never be gratified with his real name, and to that end to be the sole depository of the secret. He has been thus explicit to prevent the repetition of the weakness of declaring off, when charged with being the author, and to put the matter upon its true footing; however, it may flatter his vanity, that these papers should be ascribed to an illustrious patriot, whose public spirit and undaunted firmness of mind, eclipse the most shining ornaments of the Roman commonwealth, in its greatest purity and glory, whose persevering exertions for the public welfare, have endeared him to his country,[99] whilst it has made every knave and aspiring despot, his inveterate enemy, and who has never condescended to deny any writings that have been ascribed to him, or to notice the railings of party.

Centinel.

Philadelphia, April 5th, 1788.

1. Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, Declaration of Rights, arts. 10, 11, 12.

2. Centinel goes further here in his criticism of Washington and Franklin than most Anti-Federalists thought prudent, and he was strongly criticized on this account. Cf. A Federalist, in the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer, 25 October 1787 (McMaster and Stone 168). Resisting the weight of these venerable statesmen provided one of the Anti-Federalists' major rhetorical problems. The following Federalist appeal, exaggerated in style but characteristic in substance, was made by One of the Four Thousand, writing in the Independent Gazetteer 15 October 1787 (McMaster and Stone 117–18): "Freemen of Pennsylvania, consider the character and services of the men who made this government. Behold the venerable FRANKLIN, in the 70th year of his age, cooped up in the cabin of a small vessel, and exposing himself to the dangers of a passage on the ocean, crowded with British cruisers, in a winter month, in order to solicit from the court of France that aid, which finally enabled America to close the war with so much success and glory—and then say, is it possible that this man would set his hand to a constitution that would endanger your liberties? From this aged servant of the public, turn your eyes to the illustrious American hero, whose name has ennobled human nature—I mean our beloved WASHINGTON. Behold him, in the year 1775, taking leave of his happy family and peaceful retreat, and flying to the relief of a distant, and at that time an unknown part of the American continent. See him uniting and cementing an army, composed of the citizens of thirteen states, into a band of brothers. Follow him into the field of battle, and behold him the first in danger, and the last out of it. Follow him into his winter quarters, and see him sharing in the hunger, cold and fatigues of every soldier in his army. Behold his fortitude in adversity, his moderation in victory, and his tenderness and respect upon all occasions for the civil power of his country. But above all, turn your eyes to that illustrious scene he exhibited at Annapolis in 1782, when he resigned his commission, and laid his sword at the feet of Congress, and afterwards resumed the toils of an American farmer on the banks of the Potomac. Survey, my countrymen, these illustrious exploits of patriotism and virtue, and then say, is it possible that the deliverer of our country would have recommended an unsafe form of government for that liberty, for which he had for eight long years contended with such unexampled firmness, constancy and magnanimity." For other Federalists who stress the respectability of the framers, and particularly Washington and Franklin, see McMaster and Stone 117, 129, 136, 168; Ford, Essays 23, 26; Ford, Pamphlets 64, 74, 221, 245–47. See Federal Republican 3.6.5 n. 4. The Anti-Federalists frequently shared their opponents' high opinion of the framers. The Federal Farmer (V, 2.8.62) thought that "America probably never will be an assembly of men of a like number, more respectable." There were, however, frequent criticisms. See Martin 2.4.13, 19–20; Cato I, 2.6.5–6; Brutus I, 2.9.1–3; Old Whig VII, 3.3.41–42; Aristocrotis 3.16.1–3; Yeomanry of Massachusetts 4.19.1–3; American 4.20.1–3; Countryman from Dutchess County 6.6.2–4.

3. John Adams, Defence of the Constitutions of Government of the United States. The first volume of the Defence was published in England in 1787, arriving in the United States "in the midst of the agitation caused by the assembling of the convention to form the federal constitution." Editorial note, John Adams, Works IV, 275–76. Two more volumes of the Defence followed in 1788.

4. See the "Preface" of the first volume of Adams' Defence (Works IV, 283ff.); Letters V, XXIII (ibid. 284, 322, 380–82); Conclusion (ibid. 579 ff.); and Thoughts on Government (1776) (ibid. 193 ff.). While some Anti-Federalists join Centinel in his opposition to balanced government (see Brutus XVI, 2.9.202; [Maryland] Farmer V, 5.1.71–72; Lowndes 5.12.4; Impartial Examiner 5.14.35–40; Republicus 5.13.7; Monroe 5.21.19–28), others display views very similar to Adams' (see Federal Farmer VII, 2.8.97 n. 60). Note that Centinel, while opposing a balancing of orders, emphatically supports the principle of separation of powers. See II, 2.7.50 and n. 29.

5. A Federalist writer replied: "The Centinel asserts, that responsibility in the rulers is the best security the people can have of their rights. Now were this true, every discerning person will see that there is as great a responsibility in this plan as if all the powers of government were blended in one body of men. But the assertion is false. Interest is the greatest tie that one man can have on another, I mean taking mankind in general. And for the truth of this I appeal to your own experience and observation. The thief, the robber knows that he is responsible to the state, and in danger of the halter or the wheel-barrow, yet this does not influence his conduct; but convince him in any particular instance that it is more for his interest to forbear this practice, and he will, for that time, be honest. According to the proposed plan, the interest of the rulers and the ruled are the same; they never can be separated, for they are all one mass, having no difference of rights or privileges; or, as I said before, it is the people governing themselves; and therefore their rights will be secure." A Citizen, Carlisle [Pennsylvania] Gazette 24 October 1787.

6. The argument in this section is repeated and somewhat elaborated in V, 2.7.96. Cf. also II, 2.7.40.

7. See Cato III, 2.6.16 n. 11.

8. See [Gordon and Trenchard], Cato's Letters III, no. 71: "In Turky, Printing is forbid, lest by its Means common Sense might get the better of Violence, and be too hard for the Imperial Butcher."

9. Shakespeare, Julius Caesar act 3, sc. 2.

10. This is the only essay of the series that did not appear in the Independent Gazetteer.

11. Montesquieu, The Spirit of Laws XIV, ch. 13.

12. Montesquieu, Considerations on the Causes of the Greatness of the Romans and Their Decline ch. 9, "Two Causes of Rome's Ruin."

13. John Dickinson, Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania (1767) X; reprinted in Empire and Nation, ed. Forrest McDonald (Englewood Cliffs, N.J., 1962).

14. Although numerous lengthy speeches by Wilson defending the Constitution in the Pennsylvania convention were published by Thomas Lloyd in 1788—and indeed constituted almost the whole of Lloyd's publication (and Elliot's republication) of the Pennsylvania debates—the piece referred to here was a speech delivered to a meeting of the citizens of Philadelphia on 6 October 1787. The substance of this speech was published in the Pennsylvania Packet 10 October 1787, from which it is reprinted by McMaster and Stone 143–49. It was also printed in a separate pamphlet, along with the Examination of an American Citizen (Tench Coxe), from which it is taken by Ford, Pamphlets 155–61. Several lines were inadvertently omitted from the Ford republication (at 159 middle), and the McMaster and Stone version is therefore preferable. This speech was one of the most widely known Federalist statements and was answered by numerous Anti-Federalist writers. For a full version of the Pennsylvania debates and an explanation of the way these debates were published, see McMaster and Stone 211–431.

15. McMaster and Stone 146.

16. Ibid. 147. This argument was widespread. See ibid. 147, 264 (Wilson), 171 (A Federalist); Ford, Essays 153–54 (A Landholder); Elliot II, 64 (Sumner), 201 (Law), 202 (Wolcott); Elliot III, 96 (Madison), 301 (Pendleton); Elliot IV, 180–81 (Maclaine).

17. See McMaster and Stone 144.

18. While Centinel dates the Articles of Confederation in 1778, they did not come into force until 1781.

19. McMaster and Stone 143.

20. Regarding the omission of a provision for juries in civil cases, Wilson argued that state practice varied too much to permit a general rule. "Besides it is not in all causes that the trial by jury is adopted in civil questions: for causes depending in courts of admiralty, such as relate to maritime captures, and such as are agitated in the courts of equity, do not require the intervention of that tribunal." Ibid. 145. See Federal Farmer II, 2.8.9 n. 16.

21. I have not found any Federalist who makes this exact argument. See Ford, Pamphlets 149 (An American Citizen), 239 (Aristides); Ford, Essays 159 (A Landholder).

22. The Constitution does not extend federal judicial power to controversies between a state and citizens of that state. Art. III, sec. 2. See Agrippa V, 4.6.20.

23. See above, n. 20.

24. William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England III, 379–80. Centinel paraphrases or omits several sentences, including this one, after the reference to the few and the many: "On the other hand, if the power of the judicature were placed at random in the hands of the multitude, their decisions would be wild and capricious, and a new rule of action would be every day established in our courts."

25. For a description of this case and references to the primary materials, see Julius Goebel, Jr., and T. Raymond Naughton, Law Enforcement in Colonial New York (New York 1944) 235 and n. 47.

26. McMaster and Stone 145. See Brutus VIII, 2.9.97 n. 67.

27. McMaster and Stone 146.

28. See above, I, 2.7.10.

29. The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6. Cf. above, I, 2.7.6. The Anti-Federalists generally insisted on the necessity of a separation of powers. See Mason 2.2.7–8; Brutus XVI, 2.9.197; Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.86; XIV, 2.8.175; Old Whig V, 3.3.31; Officer of the Late Continental Army 3.8.3; DeWitt 4.3.12–14; Agrippa XVI, 4.6.73; Brutus [Virginia] 5.15.1; Henry 5.16.7, 14; Cincinnatus IV, 6.1.26–32; Plebeian 6.11.16. But see Penn 3.12.16–17; Watchman 4.22.4. Cf. above, n. 4.

30. McMaster and Stone 147–48. See Aristides, "Remarks," Ford, Pamphlets 253; cf. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.38; XVII 2.8.209; Old Whig VI, 3.3.33; Federal Republican 3.6.17. It may be noted that Publius does not attempt thus to sweeten the pill and agrees with the critics that "taking into the account the existing debt, foreign and domestic, upon any plan of extinguishment which a man moderately impressed with the importance of public justice and public credit could approve, in addition to the establishments, which all parties will acknowledge to be necessary, we could not reasonably flatter ourselves that this resource alone, upon the most improved scale, would even suffice for its present necessities." The Federalist no. 30, 190.

31. On poll taxes, see Cato VI, 2.6.42 and n. 29.

32. McMaster and Stone 149.

33. Ibid. 148–49: "All the officers of government, and all the appointments for the administration of justice and the collection of the public revenue, which are transferred from the individual to the aggregate sovereignty of the States, will necessarily turn the stream of influence and emolument into a new channel. Every person, therefore, who either enjoys or expects to enjoy a place of profit under the present establishment, will object to the proposed innovation; not, in truth, because it is injurious to the liberties of the country, but because it affects his schemes of wealth and consequence." For other examples of this common argument see above, Martin 2.4.118 n. 44. Both sides could of course play this game. See Centinel XIII, 2.7.159 and n. 85.

34. This essay was first published in the Independent Gazetteer 8 November 1787 (from which it is taken by McMaster and Stone in their reprinting of Centinel); but it was, according to the author, very inaccurately printed. A version corrected by the author was published in the Freeman's Journal 14 November 1787, and is the one reprinted here.

35. Machiavelli, Discourses I, ch. 25.

36. See Farrand II, 583–84, 666–67.

37. See Pennsylvania Convention Minority (3.11).

38. The Spirit of Laws II, ch. 2.

39. Pennsylvania Constitution 1776, Declaration of Rights, sec. VIII.

40. See Brutus I, 2.9.10–21. Centinel refers to the reprinting of the first number of Brutus in the Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser 26 October 1787.

41. Centinel IV and a couple of paragraphs from Centinel II were later reprinted, substantially in their original form, in the Freeman's Journal 26 March 1788 and 2 April 1788, under the title "The Real Federalist" and signed by Deliberator.

42. See McMaster and Stone 238–48. See also Pennsylvania Convention Minority (3.11).

43. See above, I, 2.7.26. See One of the Four Thousand and A Pennsylvania Farmer in McMaster and Stone 118, 127–28. For other examples of this very common Federalist theme, see Ford, Essays 141–42, 149, 402–4; Ford, Pamphlets 55, 70–73; The Federalist no. 15, 91–92. On Anti-Federalist views of conditions, see Plebeian 6.11.5 n. 6.

44. See above, n. 2. The main references to Federalist discussions of the framers are collected below, Federal Republican 3.6.5 n. 4.

45. See above, n. 43. "There are critical periods in the fate of nations, as well as in the life of man, which are not to be neglected with impunity. I am much mistaken if this is not such a one with us. When we were at the very brink of despair, the late excellent Convention with a unanimity that none could have hoped for, generously discarding all little considerations formed a system of government which I am convinced can stand the nicest examination, if reason and not prejudice is employed in viewing it." Marcus [James Iredell], Ford, Pamphlets 369. For other examples, see Ford, Essays 191; McMaster and Stone 228; The Federalist no. 37; Virginia Independent Chronicle 31 October 1787, 14 November 1787 (A True Friend); ibid., 5 December 1787 (Americanus); ibid., 13 February 1788 (A Planter); Gazette of the State of Georgia 20 March 1788 (William Pierce to St. George Tucker); Massachusetts Centinel 13 October 1787. Anti-Federalists widely conceded that this was a critical period (see Federal Farmer I, 2.8.1 n. 4), while denying that circumstances were as bad as they painted them (see Plebeian 6.11.5 n. 6).

46. See Ford, Pamphlets 83, 191; Cato II, 2.6.8 n. 4.

47. See for examples, McMaster and Stone 96, 436, 484, 521–23; Ford, Pamphlets 78–83, 123; The Federalist no. 38.

48. Centinel's quotations are taken from a pamphlet version of the speech, published by Thomas Bradford, and reprinted in McMaster and Stone 217–31. (Exactly the same portions of the speech are quoted by the Pennsylvania Convention Minority; see 3.11.17.) The version of this speech printed in Elliot II, 418–34, is taken from Thomas Lloyd's report of the Pennsylvania debates and is misdated by Elliot as 26 November. See Federal Farmer XVII, 2.8.204 n. 123.

49. See particularly above, I, 2.7.11–16.

50. See above, n. 6.

51. See above, II, 2.7.41–46.

52. The original reads: ". . . the foregoing sections gives. . . ." On the "pursuant" clause, see Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.22 and n. 11.

53. See above, n. 18.

54. McMaster and Stone 147.

55. Pennsylvania Convention, 28 November, ibid. 265–66; Elliot II, 440–41.

56. See VI, 2.7.105–8. On the subject of good administration see Federal Farmer I, 2.8.1 n. 3; Poplicola 4.11 passim.

57. Cf. Wilson's remarks on 1 December, McMaster and Stone 307.

58. Alexander Pope, Essay on Man, Epistle 2.

59. The Pennsylvania ratifying convention had concluded its deliberations on 15 December. The Address of the Minority of the Pennsylvania Convention had been published on 18 December in the Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser (see 3.11 intro.). By this time most of the major Pennsylvania Anti-Federalist pieces had been published or were in the course of publication, such as the Old Whig, the Democratic Federalist, An Officer of the Continental Army, and Philadelphiensis. Pennsylvanians had also had the opportunity to read such out-of-state authors as Cato, Federal Farmer, Brutus, Cincinnatus, Gerry, Mason, and Agrippa.

60. The quotation is not from Montesquieu but from John Dickinson, as Centinel correctly notes above; II, 2.7.33 n. 13.

61. The Spirit of Laws XIV, ch. 13.

62. British Liberties; or, The Free-born Subject's Inheritance, Containing the Laws that Form the Basis of Those Liberties, with Observations Thereon . . . (London 1766) 184–85.

63. On judicial review, see XVI, 2.7.168 and n. 92.

64. Robert Morris.

65. James Wilson.

66. See McMaster and Stone 483 ff.

67. Greenleaf's newspaper was the New York Journal, which was published in daily and weekly editions. See introductions to Cato (2.6), Brutus (2.9), and Cincinnatus (6.1).

68. This question is taken up again in several subsequent papers. See XI, 2.7.144; XII, 2.7.150–56; XIII, 2.7.157–58; XIV, 2.7.163; XV, 2.7.165; XII, 2.7.176–83. There appears in fact to have been no "new arrangement" of postal service, although there was a good deal of confusion and suspicion. The postmaster general, Ebenezar Hazard, defended himself by explaining that the arrangements for carrying newspapers, which were not strictly part of the mail, remained unchanged. The specific issue concerned the free carriage of newspapers exchanged between printers, which was entirely a matter of private arrangement between the carriers and the printers and not the responsibility of the postmaster general. Some of the carriers appear to have declined to take the printers' copies, which the Anti-Federal printers regarded as contrary to an established custom or right. There may have been political motives in some individual cases. It may also have been that some of the postriders, whose use Hazard promoted in favor of stages—the source of the "new arrangements" charge?—found the transportation of the newspapers a greater burden than the stages had and consequently refused to carry them. Yet Hazard said, in a private letter, that "it was while the stages carried the mail that 'Centinel' complained." The evidence suggests a primitive postal service rather than conspiracy. There were some interruptions in the exchange between printers of certain Anti-Federal newspapers at this time; but there is no evidence that it was serious or extensive or that it had its source in any instruction from the postmaster general. The Anti-Federalist essays were in fact widely and rather quickly distributed throughout the country. Following this controversy, the Congress provided that the printers should have the right to a free exchange of their papers by means of the public mail. While there is no adequate account of this matter in the secondary literature, there are discussions of it in McMaster and Stone 24, 529–31; Rutland, The Ordeal of the Constitution, 62, 128–34; and Wesley Everett Rich, History of the United States Post Office to the Year 1829 (Cambridge 1924) 29–67. The main primary sources are Papers of the Continental Congress no. 61, 607–10, 567–68, 413, and passim; Journals of the Continental Congress XXXII, 55; XXXIII, 670–79; XXXIV, 144; Massachusetts Historical Society Collections, series 5, III, 23–45, 66–68; Proceedings and Debates of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia 1788) III, 198, 232–35; Washington, Writings XXX, 15–18; New York Journal, and Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer, January–April 1788.

69. The Independent Gazetteer, 9 January 1788, contains a reply to this charge, asserting that what the Major said was, "that I would rather see five thousand rascals who might wish to disturb the peace and happiness of America, perish by the rope, than that the sword of civil war should be drawn."

70. The references are of course to James Wilson, Robert Morris, and Gouverneur Morris.

71. From the Independent Gazetteer 16 January 1788, incorporating errata printed on 5 February 1788.

72. Luther Martin, Genuine Information; see above, 2.4.11–37.

73. See above, IV, 2.7.91 and nn. 43, 45.

74. "Anarchy, with her haggard cheeks and extended jaws, stands ready and all allow that unless some efficient form of government is adopted she will soon swallow us." Cassius [James Sullivan], Ford, Essays 15, 18. See The Federalist nos. 16 ff; McMaster and Stone 225–26 (Wilson), 93 (P. Webster), 118, 120–23, 127–28, 138, 298; Ford, Pamphlets 84 (A Citizen of New York), 269 (E. Randolph), 248–49 (Aristides); Ford, Essays 15 (Cassius), 179–80 (Landholder), 405–6 (Williamson). See above, n. 47.

75. See The Federalist no. 1, 7; no. 2, 12–13; nos. 6–7; no. 60, 409. For other Federalist warnings against separate confederacies, see Ford, Pamphlets 81–82 (A Citizen of New York), 248–49 (Aristides), 269–70 (E. Randolph); McMaster and Stone 225–26 (Wilson). See also An Old State Soldier, Virginia Independent Chronicle 6 February 1788; James McClurg to James Madison, 5 August 1787, Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society 2d series, XVII (1903), 471; An American, Virginia Independent Chronicle 4 June 1788; A Federalist, Country Journal and the Poughkeepsie Advertiser 22 April 1788; A Dutchess County Farmer, ibid. 26 February 1788; and the essay ostensibly written by a group of Dutchess county Anti-Federalists and replies, ibid. 4 March, 11 March, 18 March 1788. For allegations that Patrick Henry favored separate confederacies, see Henry 5.16.11 n. 25. Generally the Anti-Federalist treatment was similar to that of Centinel. Cf. Federal Farmer (2.8); vol. 1 above, ch. 4. n. 2. The question is discussed by Jackson Turner Main in The Antifederalists, Appendix A, "Separate Confederacies."

76. The name in the original text seems to be a misspelling compounded by a misprint. The reference is to Henry Home Kames, perhaps to his Sketches of the History of Man (Edinburgh 1774) I, book 2, sketch 6, 434, "War and Peace Compared."

77. See New York Journal 10 January 1787; see also above, n. 68.

78. See A Real Patriot, Independent Gazetteer 28 January 1787, reprinted in McMaster and Stone 524–25.

79. See Martin 2.4.36.

80. See above, n. 68.

81. "Puff" is identified as Benjamin Rush by Konkle, George Bryan 318.

82. James Wilson.

83. Essays by Conciliator appeared in the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer on 9 January, 15 January, 24 January, 12 February, and 20 February 1788.

84. Three essays by A Freeman, "to the Minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania," were published in the Pennsylvania Gazette 23 January, 30 January, and 6 February 1788. These essays appear in fact to have been written by Tench Coxe. See Deliberator 3.13 intro.

85. Wilson must have winced, his biographer suggests, on reading these words. "The Centinel had guessed Wilson's dearest ambition and soiled it." Charles Page Smith, James Wilson 284.

86. See above, V, 2.7.94.

87. See above, IX, 2.7.13 n. 68.

88. All of these essays are reprinted here: Brutus 2.9; Cincinnatus 6.1; Cato 2.6.

89. Incorporating corrections of errata printed 25 February 1788.

90. James Wilson.

91. Robert Morris.

92. See above, VIII, 2.7.122, where Centinel says that by virtue of the "necessary and proper" clause "every possible law will be constitutional, as they [Congress] are to be the sole judges of the propriety of such laws. . . ." Cf. I, 2.7.12–19; V, 2.7.97. See Brutus, XII, 2.9.148 n. 97. It should be observed that the statements of congressional omnipotence relate to the interpretation of powers granted to the Congress, especially in relation to the states, while the statement of ultimate judicial authority has to do with a specific restriction on the Congress. The arguments might thus be reconciled, although Centinel does not attempt to do so.

93. For replies by Morris and Mifflin to these charges, see McMaster and Stone 786–89.

94. The "little Fiddler" was Judge Francis Hopkinson, a Federalist writer who had produced a widely reprinted and commented on lampoon of Bryan, "The New Roof"; a mock "intercepted" Centinel essay (numbered XV), very widely reprinted in Federalist papers; and a facetious account of a meeting of the "Wheelbarrow Society." Konkle, George Bryan 316–19. The Philadelphiensis essays are printed below, 3.9.

95. Two letters by George Bryan to John Ralston were printed in the Pennsylvania Gazette 26 March 1788. See Konkle, George Bryan 320–24, who, however, has the dates wrong.

96. The Pennsylvania Minority, Address and Reasons of Dissent (reprinted below, 3.11), was published in the Pennsylvania Packet on 18 December 1787. Before the end of 1787 it had been published as a broadside or pamphlet in Philadelphia, Hudson, and Boston. It was very widely reprinted in newspapers across the country.

97. Probably referring to Eleazer Oswald, editor of the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer, and Francis Bailey, editor of the Freeman's Journal.

98. See McMaster and Stone 23.

99. The papers were commonly ascribed to Judge George Bryan, who is thus (presuming Samuel Bryan in fact to have been the author) the object of political filial piety of a characteristically overblown kind. On the authorship of Centinel, see above, 2.7 intro.

Observations Leading to a Fair Examination of the System Of Government Proposed by the Late Convention; And to Several Essential and Necessary Alterations in It. In a Number of Letters from the Federal Farmer to the Republican

1787

and
An Additional Number of Letters
From the Federal Farmer to the Republican Leading to a Fair Examination of the System of Government Proposed by the Late Convention;
To Several Essential and Necessary Alterations in It;
And Calculated to Illustrate and Support the Principles
And Positions Laid Down in the Preceding Letters

1788

The Observations of The Federal Farmer are generally, and correctly, considered to be one of the ablest Anti-Federalist pieces; they deserve to be read fully and carefully by any student of Anti-Federalist thought. Contrary to a common impression, the letters were surprisingly little reprinted in the newspapers, apparently only the Poughkeepsie Country Journal printing the whole series. But they enjoyed wide popularity in pamphlet form.[1] Four editions totaling, according to the publisher, several thousands of the pamphlet were sold in a few months; and in January 1788 the author published An Additional Number of Letters, which, being longer and more diffuse, apparently enjoyed less success. The texts of the original pamphlets are followed here.[2] Paul Leicester Ford printed only the original five letters, finding the Additional Letters largely repetitious. Forrest McDonald generally agreed and printed only four of the Additional Letters in his 1962 paperback edition.[3] There is no doubt that there is much repetition and that the Additional Letters are somewhat loosely constructed; but there is scarcely a letter that does not contain material of the first importance, and it is a mistake to confine one's study of The Federal Farmer's arguments to the first five letters. One of the best criticisms of these letters was made by Timothy Pickering in a letter to Charles Tillinghast dated 24 December 1787. They were also reviewed in Noah Webster's American Museum.[4]

The Federal Farmer is generally supposed to have been Richard Henry Lee, but this was unequivocally denied by William W. Crosskey in his Politics and the Constitution.[5] Crosskey promised to discuss the matter in a later volume, which, unfortunately, was never published.[6] While Crosskey's case against Lee's authorship does not appear to have been very strong, neither, it turns out, is the case to support the usual view. The present editor's review of the evidence was at an advanced stage when he was pleased to discover that Gordon Wood's independent and often parallel investigation, also stimulated by Crosskey's remark, had led him too to doubt the solidity of the usual attribution.[7]

Wood makes a powerful and substantial rebuttal to the usual assumption that Lee's thought and style are evident in The Federal Farmer. The reader may make his own comparison of The Federal Farmer and Lee's letter to Governor Randolph, also printed here.[8] The yield of such a comparison seems to be, generally speaking, many differences but none that are flatly contradictory, and many similarities, but none that were not shared with many other Anti-Federal writers. Perhaps most telling against the case for Lee's authorship is the fact that the primary concern of The Federal Farmer is the question of consolidation and the destruction of the states, about which Lee's letter says nothing. This is a puzzling difference, and it seems to have been the source of Crosskey's doubt. Of course to attempt to deny, and especially to establish, authorship on such grounds is an extremely treacherous business. Lee's private letters during the fall of 1787 and the first half of 1788 show many points of similarity with The Federal Farmer (though no more, perhaps, than with several other Anti-Federal writers), and they demonstrate in particular that Lee, like The Federal Farmer, was concerned with the issue of consolidation and doubtful that a single government could extend over the whole United States.[9] Crosskey's contention that Lee's opinion changed shortly before the Virginia ratifying convention, while not without some foundation, is not very persuasive.[10] Yet it is striking that Lee does not in his official letter of opposition give any attention to the argument that is most prominent in the Observations.

Lee is positively identified as The Federal Farmer in a piece by New England published in the Connecticut Courant on 24 December 1787. This piece was quite widely reprinted and seems to have given rise to a handful of essays in Massachusetts in which Lee is named as The Federal Farmer.[11]

This is probably also the source of George Cabot's penciled note, in his copy of the Additional Letters, of Lee's "supposed" authorship. This copy of the Additional Letters was given to the Boston Athenaeum and was, as Wood shows, apparently the authority for the attribution of The Federal Farmer to Lee in the Athenaeum Catalogue published in 1874, thence to Sabin's Dictionary of Books Relating to America, and thence to Bancroft, Ford, and American historians generally.[12] This is a slim basis for attribution, but the evidence in these matters is usually slim, and it would hardly have been contradicted, even given the discrepancies in tone and argument between The Federal Farmer and Lee's letter, but for silence or ignorance among contemporaries who might be expected to know of Lee's authorship.[13]

Webster and Pickering, in their reviews of the essays, gave no evidence of knowing the author.[14] Virginian Edward Carrington sent The Federal Farmer's two volumes to Jefferson, describing them as reputedly "the best of anything that has been written in the opposition," but reporting that "the author is not known."[15] There is no evidence of authorship in Lee's correspondence or in the Lee family papers.[16] Moreover, while Lee's grandson and early biographer refers to "the objections of Mr. Lee to the constitution, and his arguments in support of them, [which] may be seen by the reader in eloquent and powerful detail, in his letters in the body of correspondence written during the years 1787 and 1788," he makes no reference to The Federal Farmer, as he surely would have done had he thought Lee was the author.[17] Considering the success and reputation of The Federal Farmer, it is strange that Lee never acknowledged authorship if they were his—yet the same could be said of just about any other possible author. The case against Lee's authorship remains inconclusive. But if, as seems probable, the only solid positive evidence is the essay of New England and its derivatives, the case for Lee's authorship is surely a good deal weaker than has usually been assumed.

Why is there so little extant evidence about a pamphlet so widely known and respected? Part of the reason, at least, is that these eighteenth-century Americans, while sharing with the rest of humankind a curiosity and disposition to gossip about personalities, really did think that what counts most (or at least what ought to count most) in political debate is what is said rather than who said it.[18] The Observations fall into four parts: first, a preface dealing with the way in which the Constitution ought to be considered (I, 2.8.1–8); second, an examination of the feasibility of a consolidation of the United States into one government on free principles (I, 2.8.9–14; II, 2.8.15–23); third, an examination of the organization and powers of the proposed government (III, 2.8.24–43; IV, 2.8.44–58); fourth, a conclusion (V, 2.8.59–66). Of particular importance are the excellent discussions of representation and the jury trial that run throughout these and the Additional Letters. The Additional Letters, which are taken up largely with an examination of the organization of the three branches of the government, also contain especially important discussions of federalism (VI, 2.8.72–73), the federal republic (VI, 2.8.75–80; XVII, 2.8.204–13), and bills of rights (XVI, 2.8.196–203). What follows is an extended outline of the argument of the essays.

OBSERVATIONS

I. Preface (I, 2.8.1–8).
There is no reason for hasty or ill-considered adoption.
While the plan proposed appears to be partly federal, it is principally calculated to make the states one consolidated government, as is seen by examining the plan, its history, and the politics of its friends.

II. The states cannot be consolidated into one entire government on free principles (I, 2.8.9–14; II, 2.8.15–23; III, 2.8.24).
   A. A consideration of the several forms on which the United States might exist as one nation (I, 2.8.10–13).
   B. Impracticability of free and equal government extending over large and heterogeneous territory (I, 2.8.14).
   C. The Constitution does not, and cannot, provide the two essential parts of free government, a substantial representation of the people in the legislature (II, 2.8.15) and the jury trial of the vicinage (II, 2.8.16).
   D. Other considerations:
      1. The center and the extremes will not share benefits; and, because of the limited operation of the laws of a free government, the law will have to be enforced at the extremes by fear and fraud (II, 2.8.17–18).
      2. It is difficult, though not impossible, to frame a Bill of Rights for such a varied country (II, 2.8.19–21).
   E. The Constitution lodges very extensive powers in an inherently defective government, with the result either of neglected laws or military enforcement leading, in either case, to despotism (II, 2.8.22–23).

III. Organization and powers of the new government (III, 2.8.25–43, IV, 2.8.44–58).
   A. Organization (III, 2.8.25–34):
      Each part of the government briefly examined and criticized (III, 2.8.25–30). The deficiencies, particularly the smallness of the House of Representatives, the compromise basis of the Senate, and the blending of powers, are admittedly the inevitable result of our situation, which reinforces the conclusion that it is not possible to consolidate the states on proper principles (III, 2.8.31–34).

B. Powers improperly or prematurely lodged (III, 2.8.35–43; IV, 2.8.44):
   1. Powers regarding external objects and some regarding internal objects ought to be lodged in the general government, but unlimited power to lay taxes and extensive control of military strength of the country are dangerous; power in these critical areas should be granted extremely cautiously so long as the federal government is so defective especially regarding representation (which is further discussed here) (III, 2.8.35–40).
   2. The extensive jurisdiction given to federal judiciary is examined and shown, in many points, to be unnecessary and dangerous. Jury trial of the vicinage is not secured (III, 2.8.41–43; IV, 2.8.44).

C. Undefined powers (IV 2.8.44–45): Provisions regarding direct taxes, regarding qualifications of the vice president, regarding appointment of inferior officers, regarding congressional control over the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court.

D. Powers the exercise of which is unsecured (IV, 2.8.46–58):
   1. Supremacy clause—no provision that treaties shall be made in pursuance of Constitution.
   2. Necessary and proper clause—power of Congress not restricted to a few national objects.
   3. No Bill of Rights with reservations for states and individuals: (a) religion, (b) trial by jury, (c) press.
   4. Provision for amendment—Constitution will transfer power from the many to the few, who will resist further change.

IV. Conclusion (V, 2.8.59–66).
Government ought to preserve, not undermine, the equal division of our land and the free and manly habits of our people.

We need improved federal government, and there are many good things here, but the value is lessened by the want of a representation of the people.

Extreme partisans favoring and opposing the Constitution—examination of activities of partisans for the Constitution.

Constitution should be considered freely and carefully and amendments proposed.

ADDITIONAL LETTERS

I. General and introductory (VI, 2.8.67–92).
   A. Character of Federalist and Anti-Federalist partisans (VI, 2.8.71–73):

This is a continuation of the preface in letter I and of discussion in V, with important discussion of "honest" federalists, "pretended" federalists, "true" federalists, and of misleading terms, "federalist" and "anti-federalist."

B. General positions and principles (VI, 2.8.74–80):
A (rather miscellaneous) brief restatement of earlier points about the need for a more efficient government, the necessity of a federal republic in such an extensive territory, the importance of a substantial representation and jury trial. A distinction is drawn between natural, constitutional, and common or legal rights.

C. Leading features of the Articles of Confederation (VI, 2.8.81–86).

D. Organization of state governments (VI, 2.8.87–92).

II. Legislative branch (VII–XII, 2.8.93–165).

A. Introduction (VII, 2.8.93–96):
Must have government—aim is to have one operating by persuasion, or it will operate by force.

Criteria of fair and equal representation: same interests, feelings, opinions, and views as people at large.

B. Representation is insubstantial and ought to be increased (VII–X, 2.8.97–142).

1. Substantial representation should contain representatives of all orders of society to maintain balance. Two major classes, aristocracy and democracy; their subordinate classes, their characteristics; and subsidiary interests and parties. (An important discussion.) The representation in the House of Representatives is too small to reflect these classes and interests and will be drawn largely from the aristocracy (VII, 2.8.97–100).

Observations in defense of representation as provided in the Constitution listed (VII, 2.8.101).

2. England as a genuine balance among the several orders (VIII, 2.8.102–10):
Contrast to Rome—the differences lie in substantial representation in England. (Secondary discussion but still important on question of representation.)

3. Observations of advocates answered (IX–X, 2.8.111–42):
People will elect good men (important on representation) (X, 2.8.111–18).

Members of Congress must return home and bear the burdens they impose on others (IX, 2.8.119–26).

People have a strong arm to check their rulers (X, 2.8.127).

States are part of the system and will balance the general government (but states have no constitutional check) (X, 2.8.128).

Objects of Congress are few and national (X, 2.8.130–32).

House of Representatives will increase in size in time (X, 2.8.133–34).

Difficulty of assembling many men without making them a mob (X, 2.8.136).

Congress will have no temptation to do wrong (X, 2.8.138).

People will be free as long as they possess habits of free men (X, 2.8.139).

4. Organization, appointment, powers of Senate (XI, 2.8.143–47):
Cannot have genuine representation of aristocracy in the United States; so Senate will contain generally same kind of men as high posts of House of Representatives; checks will be only those limited ones derived from different modes of appointment, different terms of office, mere fact of a second branch, etc.

While Senate is useful, some revisions should be made: terms of office should be shortened, senators should be recallable, and provisions should be made for rotation. Treaty power might be dangerous, but whole Congress has power to make commercial regulations.

C. The elections ought to be better secured (XII, 2.8.148–65):
All general principles regarding electors and elected, mode of election (which should be by majority vote in districts, etc.), should be laid down in Constitution. Any necessary discretion should reside in state legislatures, closest to the people.

III. Executive branch (XIII–XIV, 2.8.166–82).

A. Appointments (XIII, 2.8.166–72; XIV, 2.8.173–76):
Executive necessary but dangerous—need to keep it balanced by distributing appointments.

Various methods of appointment sketched and discussed—in selecting from among these the aims are to keep balance in government and to prevent legislature from becoming infected by the spirit of office-men.

B. Election and powers of President (XIV, 2.8.177–82):
Unity in executive; general need for "first man."

Must be given ample powers; chief concern should be to avoid perpetuation of power in any man or family. Thus should not be reeligible.

Veto power—combination of executive and judges is best.

IV. Judicial branch (XV, 2.8.183–95).

Peculiar character of judicial branch and its dangerous tendency in popular government (2.8.183–84).

Organization of judiciary (2.8.185–88).

Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over fact and law (2.8.189).

Importance of trial by jury (2.8.190–94).

Law and equity (2.8.195).

V. Powers of new government (XVI–XVIII, 2.8.196–230).

A. Bill of Rights (XVI, 2.8.196–203).

1. Basic purpose of Bill of Rights in limited government (XVI, 2.8.196–98).
2. Specific protections needed, relating to trial by jury, ex post facto laws, habeas corpus, judicial procedure, quartering of soldiers, and freedom of press (XVI, 2.8.199–203).

B. Need for federal republic to preserve free and mild government in the United States (XVII, 204–13; XVIII, 214–30).

1. Description of federal republic (XVII, 2.8.204–13).

Essential characteristics of federal republic (2.8.204–5).

Additional powers needed but checks of federal system must be maintained (2.8.206–9).

Additional federal checks that may be desirable (2.8.210).

Enlightened and spirited character of the people will not be sufficient if state governments possess no real power (2.8.211–13).

2. Discussion of powers granted to new government (XVIII, 2.8.214–29).
3. The true bond of the American union must be formed of pure federal principles (XVIII, 2.8.230).

1. See J. Wadsworth to R. King, 16 December 1787, The Life and Correspondence of Rufus King X, 264; DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar 104, 113; Samuel Bannister

Harding, The Contest over the Ratification of the Federal Constitution in the State of Massachusetts (Cambridge, Mass., 1896) 17. Robert Rutland mistakenly says that the letters of The Federal Farmer were published in the New York Journal; they were in fact published in the Poughkeepsie Country Journal, November 1787 through January 1788, as Rutland later correctly notes; The Ordeal of the Constitution 22.

2. Both the Observations and the Additional Letters were printed in New York by Thomas Greenleaf.

3. Ford, Pamphlets 277 ff.; Empire and Nation, ed. McDonald. The text of the McDonald edition is extremely unreliable, containing numerous alterations of spelling and punctuation which the reader is not led to expect and, more seriously, a substantial number of misreadings, misprints, omitted lines, etc. A copy of the original edition of the Additional Letters was brought out by Quadrangle Books, Chicago, in 1962, but it is now out of print.

4. Octavius Pickering and Charles Upham, The Life of Timothy Pickering (Boston 1873) II, 352–68; American Museum May 1788, 422–33.

5. (Chicago 1953) II, 1299–1300.

6. [A third volume was completed by Crosskey's literary executor, William Jeffrey, Jr., and published in 1980 under the title The Political Background of the Federal Convention, but, since it covers events through 22 May 1788 only, it does not include the Federal Farmer discussion.—M.D.] I am informed by Professor Jeffrey that Crosskey's opinion was based on the following grounds. First, Crosskey reportedly discovered in the John Lamb papers a letter from Lee to Lamb saying that he "would be interested in seeing the Letters of a Federal Farmer." There being no reason why he should conceal his authorship from Lamb, this would strongly suggest that he was not the author. But I find no such letter in the Lamb papers. Lamb's committee did distribute, among other materials, the Observations of The Federal Farmer; and Lee did thank Lamb for sending him some Anti-Federal materials, promising to read them with pleasure; but there is no evidence that The Federal Farmer was included in the packet sent to Lee. See Letter of Joshua Atherton, 23 June 1788, John Lamb Papers, box 5, no. 25, New-York Historical Society; letter of Richard Henry Lee to John Lamb, 27 June 1788, in Leake, Memoir of the Life and Times of General John Lamb 309–10. [On reconsidering this question, Professor Jeffrey reports that he may have misled Storing about this ground for Crosskey's opinion. Jeffrey believes that Lamb's letter to Lee, and Lee's response acknowledging receipt of the Anti-Federal materials, including The Federal Farmer, persuaded Crosskey that Lee was not the author.—M.D.] Crosskey's second ground was the fact that Lee published over his own name his objections to the Constitution in his letter to Governor Randolph of 16 October 1787 (see below, 5.6), and would therefore, Crosskey reasoned, have had no motive for concealing his opposition by assuming a pseudonym for the longer pamphlet. But a pseudonym was used not merely or even mainly to enable the author to conceal his opinion or to protect himself; it was a convention aimed at directing attention at the arguments rather than at personalities. A public figure might well declare his own position in a speech or letter and go on to publish a longer, more analytical piece over a pseudonym. Many of the prominent figures in the debate over the Constitution did precisely that.

7. Gordon S. Wood, "The Authorship of The Letters from the Federal Farmer," William and Mary Quarterly April 1974.

8. See below, 5.6.

9. Lee, Letters II, 433–76.

10. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution II, 1300.

11. New England was reprinted in the New Hampshire Mercury 2 January 1788; New York Daily Advertiser 4 January; Massachusetts Centinel 5 January; Gazette of the State of Georgia 21 February; Charleston City Gazette 7 April 1788; Charleston Columbian Herald 14 April. Subsequent items identifying Lee as The Federal Farmer (and not mentioned by Wood) appeared in the Massachusetts Gazette 1 January (and was reprinted in New York and Pennsylvania papers); Massachusetts Centinel 2 January; and Boston American Herald 7 January. I am indebted for most of this information to Steven R. Boyd, University of Texas, San Antonio, who finds here a widespread assumption among contemporaries that Lee was the author.

12. Wood, William and Mary Quarterly April 1974, 304–7. See Bancroft, History of the Formation of the Constitution II, 230; see also 451–52; Ford, Pamphlets 277.

13. One further shred of evidence is provided by the title page of the copy of the Observations of The Federal Farmer in the American Antiquarian Society, which bears a notation, "Richard Henry Lee." The handwriting does not, however, appear to be contemporaneous with the publication of the pamphlet.

14. See above, note 4.

15. 9 June 1788. Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society 2d series, XVII (1903), 501. Oliver Ellsworth (as A Landholder) contended that Lee had revised Mason's and Gerry's statements of their objections and was "supposed to be the author of most of the scurrility poured out in the New York papers against the new constitution," but he did not mention The Federal Farmer specifically. Ford, Essays 161. See letter from J. Wadsworth to Rufus King, 16 December 1787 (above, n. 1), describing the distribution of the Letters, without identifying the author. One of John Lamb's correspondents, Hugh Ledlie, writing from Hartford, reported insinuations made in the Connecticut convention "that out of the impost £8,000 was paid by this State annually to the State of New York out of which you recd. upwards of £900 which enabled you & others to write the foederal farmer and other false Libels and send them into this & the Neighbouring States to poison the minds of the good people against the good C——n." John Lamb Papers, box 5, no. 1; New-York Historical Society.

16. Lee, Letters passim; Lee Family Papers, 1742–1795 (microfilm, University of Virginia Library).

17. Richard H. Lee, ed., Memoir of the Life of Richard Henry Lee (Philadelphia 1825) I, 240. Lee's most recent biographer calls the Letters of The Federal Farmer "Lee's greatest literary achievement," but he does not consider the grounds of attribution to Lee. Oliver Perry Chitwood, Richard Henry Lee: Statesman of the Revolution (Morgantown, W.Va. 1967) 173.

18. "It is not material whether the federal farmer belongs to Virginia or Kamtschatka—whether he owns five hundred negroes, or is a man of no property at all—if his arguments are cogent—his reasonings conclusive. . . . Nor is it of consequence to the publick, or to the general cause, whether mr. Lee is an enemy, or a devotee to the fame and to the merit, of general Washington. . . . We are not contending for the characters of men. . . . We wish to view every thing on the broad scale of independence to America—the sovereignty of the United States, and the freedom of the people. . . ." Helvidius Priscus, below, 4.12.9.

I

October 8th, 1787.

Dear Sir,

My letters to you last winter, on the subject of a well balanced national government for the United States, were the result of free enquiry;[1] when I passed from that subject to enquiries relative to our commerce, revenues, past administration, etc. I anticipated the anxieties I feel, on carefully examining the plan of government proposed by the convention. It appears to be a plan retaining some federal features; but to be the first important step, and to aim strongly to one consolidated government of the United States. It leaves the powers of government, and the representation of the people, so 2.8.1

unnaturally divided between the general and state governments, that the operations of our system must be very uncertain. My uniform federal attachments, and the interest I have in the protection of property, and a steady execution of the laws, will convince you, that, if I am under any biass at all, it is in favor of any general system which shall promise those advantages. The instability of our laws increases my wishes for firm and steady government; but then, I can consent to no government, which, in my opinion, is not calculated equally to preserve the rights of all orders of men in the community. My object has been to join with those who have endeavoured to supply the defects in the forms of our governments by a steady and proper administration of them. Though I have long apprehended that fraudalent debtors, and embarrassed men, on the one hand, and men, on the other, unfriendly to republican equality, would produce an uneasiness among the people, and prepare the way, not for cool and deliberate reforms in the governments, but for changes calculated to promote the interests of particular orders of men.[2] Acquit me, sir, of any agency in the formation of the new system; I shall be satisfied with seeing, if it shall be adopted, a prudent administration. Indeed I am so much convinced of the truth of Pope's maxim, that "That which is best administered is best," that I am much inclined to subscribe to it from experience. I am not disposed to unreasonably contend about forms.[3] I know our situation is critical, and it behoves us to make the best of it.[4] A federal government of some sort is necessary. We have suffered the present to languish; and whether the confederation was capable or not originally of answering any valuable purposes, it is now but of little importance. I will pass by the men, and states, who have been particularly instrumental in preparing the way for a change, and, perhaps, for governments not very favourable to the people at large. A constitution is now presented which we may reject, or which we may accept, with or without amendments; and to which point we ought to direct our exertions, is the question. To determine this question, with propriety, we must attentively examine the system itself, and the probable consequences of either step. This I shall endeavour to do, so far as I am able, with candor and fairness; and leave you to decide upon the propriety of my opinions, the weight of my reasons, and how far my conclusions are well drawn. Whatever may be the conduct of others, on the present occasion, I do not mean, hastily and positively to decide on the merits of the constitution proposed. I shall be open to conviction, and always disposed to adopt that which, all things considered, shall appear to me to be most for the happiness of the community. It must be granted, that if men hastily and blindly adopt a system of government, they will as hastily and as blindly be led to alter or abolish it; and changes must ensue, one after another, till the peaceable and better part of the community will grow weary with changes, tumults and disorders, and be disposed to accept any government, however despotic, that shall promise stability and firmness.

The first principal question that occurs, is, Whether, considering our situation, we ought to precipitate the adoption of the proposed constitution? If we remain cool and temperate, we are in no immediate danger of any commotions; we are in a state of perfect peace, and in no danger of invasions; the state governments are in the full exercise of their powers; and our governments answer all present exigencies, except the regulation of trade, securing credit, in some cases, and providing for the interest, in some instances, of the public debts; and whether we adopt a change, three or nine months hence, can make but little odds with the private circumstances of individuals; their happiness and prosperity, after all, depend principally upon their own exertions. We are hardly recovered from a long and distressing war: The farmers, fishmen, &c. have not yet fully repaired the waste made by it. Industry and frugality are again assuming their proper station. Private debts are lessened, and public debts incurred by the war have been, by various ways, diminished; and the public lands have now become a productive source for diminishing them much more. I know uneasy men, who wish very much to precipitate, do not admit all these facts; but they are facts well known to all men who are thoroughly informed in the affairs of this country. It must, however, be admitted, that our federal system is defective, and that some of the state governments are not well administered; but, then, we impute to the defects in our governments many evils and embarrassments which are most clearly the result of the late war. We must allow men to conduct on the present occasion, as on all similar ones. They will urge a thousand pretences to answer their purposes on both sides. When we want a man to change his condition, we describe it as miserable, wretched, and despised; and draw a pleasing picture of that which we would have him assume. And when we wish the contrary, we reverse our descriptions. Whenever a clamor is raised, and idle men get to work, it is highly necessary to examine facts carefully, and without unreasonably suspecting men of falshood, to examine, and enquire attentively, under what impressions they act. It is too often the case in political concerns, that men state facts not as they are, but as they wish them to be; and almost every man, by calling to mind past scenes, will find this to be true. 2.8.2

Nothing but the passions of ambitious, impatient, or disorderly men, I conceive, will plunge us into commotions, if time should be taken fully to examine and consider the system proposed. Men who feel easy in their circumstances, and such as are not sanguine in their expectations relative to the consequences of the proposed change, will remain quiet under the existing governments. Many commercial and monied men, who are uneasy, not without just cause, ought to be respected; and, by no means, unreasonably disappointed in their expectations and hopes; but as to those who expect employments under the new constitution; as to those weak and ardent men who always expect to be gainers by revolutions, and whose lot it generally is to get out of one difficulty into another, they are very little to be 2.8.3

regarded: and as to those who designedly avail themselves of this weakness and ardor, they are to be despised. It is natural for men, who wish to hasten the adoption of a measure, to tell us, now is the crisis—now is the critical moment which must be seized, or all will be lost: and to shut the door against free enquiry, whenever conscious the thing presented has defects in it, which time and investigation will probably discover. This has been the custom of tyrants and their dependants in all ages. If it is true, what has been so often said, that the people of this country cannot change their condition for the worse, I presume it still behoves them to endeavour deliberately to change it for the better. The fickle and ardent, in any community, are the proper tools for establishing despotic government. But it is deliberate and thinking men, who must establish and secure governments on free principles. Before they decide on the plan proposed, they will enquire whether it will probably be a blessing or a curse to this people.

2.8.4 The present moment discovers a new face in our affairs. Our object has been all along, to reform our federal system, and to strengthen our governments—to establish peace, order and justice in the community—but a new object now presents. The plan of government now proposed is evidently calculated totally to change, in time, our condition as a people. Instead of being thirteen republics, under a federal head, it is clearly designed to make us one consolidated government. Of this, I think, I shall fully convince you, in my following letters on this subject. This consolidation of the states has been the object of several men in this country for some time past. Whether such a change can ever be effected in any manner; whether it can be effected without convulsions and civil wars; whether such a change will not totally destroy the liberties of this country—time only can determine.

2.8.5 To have a just idea of the government before us, and to shew that a consolidated one is the object in view, it is necessary not only to examine the plan, but also its history, and the politics of its particular friends.

2.8.6 The confederation was formed when great confidence was placed in the voluntary exertions of individuals, and of the respective states; and the framers of it, to guard against usurpation, so limited and checked the powers, that, in many respects, they are inadequate to the exigencies of the union. We find, therefore, members of congress urging alterations in the federal system almost as soon as it was adopted. It was early proposed to vest congress with powers to levy an impost, to regulate trade, etc. but such was known to be the caution of the states in parting with power, that the vestment, even of these, was proposed to be under several checks and limitations. During the war, the general confusion, and the introduction of paper money, infused in the minds of people vague ideas respecting government and credit. We expected too much from the return of peace, and of course we have been disappointed. Our governments have been new and unsettled; and several legislatures, by making tender, suspension, and paper money laws, have given just cause of uneasiness to creditors. By these and other causes, several orders of men in the community have been prepared, by degrees, for a change of government; and this very abuse of power in the legislatures, which, in some cases, has been charged upon the democratic part of the community, has furnished aristocratical men with those very weapons, and those very means, with which, in great measure, they are rapidly effecting their favourite object. And should an oppressive government be the consequence of the proposed change, posterity may reproach not only a few overbearing unprincipled men, but those parties in the states which have misused their powers.

The conduct of several legislatures, touching paper money, and tender laws, has prepared many honest men for changes in government, which otherwise they would not have thought of—when by the evils, on the one hand, and by the secret instigations of artful men, on the other, the minds of men were become sufficiently uneasy, a bold step was taken, which is usually followed by a revolution, or a civil war. A general convention for mere commercial purposes was moved for—the authors of this measure saw that the people's attention was turned solely to the amendment of the federal system; and that, had the idea of a total change been started, probably no state would have appointed members to the convention. The idea of destroying, ultimately, the state government, and forming one consolidated system, could not have been admitted—a convention, therefore, merely for vesting in congress power to regulate trade was proposed. This was pleasing to the commercial towns; and the landed people had little or no concern about it. September, 1786, a few men from the middle states met at Annapolis, and hastily proposed a convention to be held in May, 1787, for the purpose, generally, of amending the confederation—this was done before the delegates of Massachusetts, and of the other states arrived—still not a word was said about destroying the old constitution, and making a new one—The states still unsuspecting, and not aware that they were passing the Rubicon, appointed members to the new convention, for the sole and express purpose of revising and amending the confederation—and, probably, not one man in ten thousand in the United States, till within these ten or twelve days, had an idea that the old ship was to be destroyed, and he put to the alternative of embarking in the new ship presented, or of being left in danger of sinking—The States, I believe, universally supposed the convention would report alterations in the confederation, which would pass an examination in congress, and after being agreed to there, would be confirmed by all the legislatures, or be rejected. Virginia made a very respectable appointment, and placed at the head of it the first man in America: In this appointment there was a mixture of political characters; but Pennsylvania appointed principally those men who are esteemed aristocratical. Here the favourite moment for changing the government was evidently discerned by a few men, who seized it with address. Ten other states ap- 2.8.7

pointed, and tho' they chose men principally connected with commerce and the judicial department yet they appointed many good republican characters—had they all attended we should now see, I am persuaded a better system presented. The non-attendance of eight or nine men, who were appointed members of the convention, I shall ever consider as a very unfortunate event to the United States.[5]—Had they attended, I am pretty clear, that the result of the convention would not have had that strong tendency to aristocracy now discernable in every part of the plan.[6] There would not have been so great an accumulation of powers, especially as to the internal police of the country, in a few hands, as the constitution reported proposes to vest in them—the young visionary men, and the consolidating aristocracy, would have been more restrained than they have been. Eleven states met in the convention, and after four months close attention presented the new constitution, to be adopted or rejected by the people. The uneasy and fickle part of the community may be prepared to receive any form of government; but, I presume, the enlightened and substantial part will give any constitution presented for their adoption, a candid and thorough examination; and silence those designing or empty men, who weakly and rashly attempt to precipitate the adoption of a system of so much importance—We shall view the convention with proper respect—and, at the same time, that we reflect there were men of abilities and integrity in it, we must recollect how disproportionably the democratic and aristocratic parts of the community were represented—Perhaps the judicious friends and opposers of the new constitution will agree, that it is best to let it rest solely on its own merits, or be condemned for its own defects.

2.8.8 In the first place, I shall premise, that the plan proposed is a plan of accommodation—and that it is in this way only, and by giving up a part of our opinions, that we can ever expect to obtain a government founded in freedom and compact. This circumstance candid men will always keep in view, in the discussion of this subject.

2.8.9 The plan proposed appears to be partly federal, but principally however, calculated ultimately to make the states one consolidated government.

The first interesting question, therefore suggested, is, how far the states can be consolidated into one entire government on free principles. In considering this question extensive objects are to be taken into view, and important changes in the forms of government to be carefully attended to in all their consequences. The happiness of the people at large must be the great object with every honest statesman, and he will direct every movement to this point. If we are so situated as a people, as not to be able to enjoy equal happiness and advantages under one government, the consolidation of the states cannot be admitted.

2.8.10 There are three different forms of free government under which the United States may exist as one nation; and now is, perhaps, the time to determine to which we will direct our views.[7] 1. Distinct republics connected under a federal head. In this case the respective state governments must be the principal guardians of the peoples rights, and exclusively regulate their internal police; in them must rest the balance of government. The congress of the states, or federal head, must consist of delegates amenable to, and removeable by the respective states: This congress must have general directing powers; powers to require men and monies of the states; to make treaties, peace and war; to direct the operations of armies, etc. Under this federal modification of government, the powers of congress would be rather advisary or recommendatory than coercive. 2. We may do away the several state governments, and form or consolidate all the states into one entire government, with one executive, one judiciary, and one legislature, consisting of senators and representatives collected from all parts of the union: In this case there would be a compleat consolidation of the states. 3. We may consolidate the states as to certain national objects, and leave them severally distinct independent republics, as to internal police generally. Let the general government consist of an executive, a judiciary, and balanced legislature, and its powers extend exclusively to all foreign concerns, causes arising on the seas to commerce, imports, armies, navies, Indian affairs, peace and war, and to a few internal concerns of the community; to the coin, post-offices, weights and measures, a general plan for the militia, to naturalization, and, perhaps to bankruptcies,[8] leaving the internal police of the community, in other respects, exclusively to the state governments; as the administration of justice in all causes arising internally, the laying and collecting of internal taxes, and the forming of the militia according to a general plan prescribed. In this case there would be a compleat consolidation, quoad certain objects only.[9]

Touching the first, or federal plan, I do not think much can be said in its favor: The sovereignty of the nation, without coercive and efficient powers to collect the strength of it, cannot always be depended on to answer the purposes of government; and in a congress of representatives of sovereign states, there must necessarily be an unreasonable mixture of powers in the same hands. 2.8.11

As to the second, or compleat consolidating plan, it deserves to be carefully considered at this time, by every American: If it be impracticable, it is a fatal error to model our governments, directing our views ultimately to it. 2.8.12

The third plan, or partial consolidation, is, in my opinion, the only one that can secure the freedom and happiness of this people. I once had some general ideas that the second plan was practicable,[10] but from long attention, and the proceedings of the convention, I am fully satisfied, that this third plan is the only one we can with safety and propriety proceed upon. Making this the standard to point out, with candor and fairness, the parts of the new constitution which appear to be improper, is my object. The convention appears to have proposed the partial consolidation evidently with a view to collect all powers ultimately, in the United States into one entire 2.8.13 government; and from its views in this respect, and from the tenacity of the small states to have an equal vote in the senate, probably originated the greatest defects in the proposed plan.

2.8.14 Independant of the opinions of many great authors, that a free elective government cannot be extended over large territories, a few reflections must evince, that one government and general legislation alone, never can extend equal benefits to all parts of the United States: Different laws, customs, and opinions exist in the different states, which by a uniform system of laws would be unreasonably invaded. The United States contain about a million of square miles, and in half a century will, probably, contain ten millions of people; and from the center to the extremes is about 800 miles.

Before we do away the state governments, or adopt measures that will tend to abolish them, and to consolidate the states into one entire government, several principles should be considered and facts ascertained:—These, and my examination into the essential parts of the proposed plan, I shall pursue in my next.

Your's &c.
The Federal Farmer.

II

October 9, 1787.

Dear Sir,

2.8.15 The essential parts of a free and good government are a full and equal representation of the people in the legislature, and the jury trial of the vicinage in the administration of justice—a full and equal representation, is that which possesses the same interests, feelings, opinions, and views the people themselves would were they all assembled—a fair representation, therefore, should be so regulated, that every order of men in the community, according to the common course of elections, can have a share in it—in order to allow professional men, merchants, traders, farmers, mechanics, etc. to bring a just proportion of their best informed men respectively into the legislature, the representation must be considerably numerous[11]—We have about 200 state senators in the United States, and a less number than that of federal representatives cannot, clearly, be a full representation of this people, in the affairs of internal taxation and police, were there but one legislature for the whole union. The representation cannot be equal, or the situation of the people proper for one government only—if the extreme parts of the society cannot be represented as fully as the central—It is apparently impracticable that this should be the case in this extensive country—it would be impossible to collect a representation of the parts of the country five, six, and seven hundred miles from the seat of government.

Under one general government alone, there could be but one judiciary, 2.8.16 one supreme and a proper number of inferior courts. I think it would be totally impracticable in this case to preserve a due administration of justice, and the real benefits of the jury trial of the vicinage,[12]—there are now supreme courts in each state in the union; and a great number of county and other courts subordinate to each supreme court—most of these supreme and inferior courts are itinerant, and hold their sessions in different parts every year of their respective states, counties and districts—with all these moving courts, our citizens, from the vast extent of the country must travel very considerable distances from home to find the place where justice is administered. I am not for bringing justice so near to individuals as to afford them any temptation to engage in law suits; though I think it one of the greatest benefits in a good government, that each citizen should find a court of justice within a reasonable distance, perhaps, within a day's travel of his home; so that, without great inconveniences and enormous expences, he may have the advantages of his witnesses and jury—it would be impracticable to derive these advantages from one judiciary—the one supreme court at most could only set in the centre of the union, and move once a year into the centre of the eastern and southern extremes of it—and, in this case, each citizen, on an average, would travel 150 or 200 miles to find this court—that, however, inferior courts might be properly placed in the different counties, and districts of the union, the appellate jurisdiction would be intolerable and expensive.

If it were possible to consolidate the states, and preserve the features of a 2.8.17 free government, still it is evident that the middle states, the parts of the union, about the seat of government, would enjoy great advantages, while the remote states would experience the many inconveniences of remote provinces. Wealth, offices, and the benefits of government would collect in the centre: and the extreme states[13] and their principal towns, become much less important.[14]

There are other considerations which tend to prove that the idea of one 2.8.18 consolidated whole, on free principles, is ill-founded—the laws of a free government rest on the confidence of the people, and operate gently—and never can extend their influence very far—if they are executed on free principles, about the centre, where the benefits of the government induce the people to support it voluntarily; yet they must be executed on the principles of fear and force in the extremes—This has been the case with every extensive republic of which we have any accurate account.[15]

There are certain unalienable and fundamental rights, which in forming 2.8.19 the social compact, ought to be explicitly ascertained and fixed—a free and enlightened people, in forming this compact, will not resign all their rights to those who govern, and they will fix limits to their legislators and rulers, which will soon be plainly seen by those who are governed, as well as by those who govern: and the latter will know they cannot be passed un-perceived by the former, and without giving a general alarm—These rights should be made the basis of every constitution: and if a people be so situated, or have such different opinions that they cannot agree in ascertaining and fixing them, it is a very strong argument against their attempting to form one entire society, to live under one system of laws only.—I confess, I never thought the people of these states differed essentially in these respects; they having derived all these rights from one common source, the British systems; and having in the formation of their state constitutions, discovered that their ideas relative to these rights are very similar. However, it is now said that the states differ so essentially in these respects, and even in the important article of the trial by jury, that when assembled in convention, they can agree to no words by which to establish that trial, or by which to ascertain and establish many other of these rights, as fundamental articles in the social compact.[16] If so, we proceed to consolidate the states on no solid basis whatever.

2.8.20 But I do not pay much regard to the reasons given for not bottoming the new constitution on a better bill of rights. I still believe a complete federal bill of rights to be very practicable.[17] Nevertheless I acknowledge the proceedings of the convention furnish my mind with many new and strong reasons, against a complete consolidation of the states. They tend to convince me, that it cannot be carried with propriety very far—that the convention have gone much farther in one respect than they found it practicable to go in another; that is, they propose to lodge in the general government very extensive powers—powers nearly, if not altogether, complete and unlimited, over the purse and the sword. But, in its organization, they furnish the strongest proof that the proper limbs, or parts of a government, to support and execute those powers on proper principles (or in which they can be safely lodged) cannot be formed. These powers must be lodged somewhere in every society; but then they should be lodged where the strength and guardians of the people are collected. They can be wielded, or safely used, in a free country only by an able executive and judiciary, a respectable senate, and a secure, full, and equal representation of the people. I think the principles I have premised or brought into view, are well founded—I think they will not be denied by any fair reasoner. It is in connection with these, and other solid principles, we are to examine the constitution. It is not a few democratic phrases, or a few well formed features, that will prove its merits; or a few small omissions that will produce its rejection among men of sense; they will enquire what are the essential powers in a community, and what are nominal ones; where and how the essential powers shall be lodged to secure government, and to secure true liberty.

2.8.21 In examining the proposed constitution carefully, we must clearly perceive an unnatural separation of these powers from the substantial representation of the people. The state governments will exist, with all their governors, senators, representatives, officers and expences; in these will be nineteen-twentieths of the representatives of the people; they will have a near connection, and their members an immediate intercourse with the people; and the probability is, that the state governments will possess the confidence of the people, and be considered generally as their immediate guardians.

The general government will consist of a new species of executive, a small senate, and a very small house of representatives. As many citizens will be more than three hundred miles from the seat of this government as will be nearer to it, its judges and officers cannot be very numerous, without making our governments very expensive. Thus will stand the state and the general governments, should the constitution be adopted without any alterations in their organization; but as to powers, the general government will possess all essential ones, at least on paper, and those of the states a mere shadow of power. And therefore, unless the people shall make some great exertions to restore to the state governments their powers in matters of internal police; as the powers to lay and collect, exclusively, internal taxes, to govern the militia, and to hold the decisions of their own judicial courts upon their own laws final, the balance cannot possibly continue long; but the state governments must be annihilated, or continue to exist for no purpose. 2.8.22

It is however to be observed, that many of the essential powers given the national government are not exclusively given; and the general government may have prudence enough to forbear the exercise of those which may still be exercised by the respective states. But this cannot justify the impropriety of giving powers, the exercise of which prudent men will not attempt, and imprudent men will, or probably can, exercise only in a manner destructive of free government. The general government, organized as it is, may be adequate to many valuable objects, and be able to carry its laws into execution on proper principles in several cases; but I think its warmest friends will not contend, that it can carry all the powers proposed to be lodged in it into effect, without calling to its aid a military force, which must very soon destroy all elective governments in the country, produce anarchy, or establish despotism. Though we cannot have now a complete idea of what will be the operations of the proposed system, we may, allowing things to have their common course, have a very tolerable one. The powers lodged in the general government, if exercised by it, must intimately effect the internal police of the states, as well as external concerns; and there is no reason to expect the numerous state governments, and their connections, will be very friendly to the execution of federal laws in those internal affairs, which hitherto have been under their own immediate management. There is more reason to believe, that the general government, far removed from the people, and none of its members elected oftener than once in two years, will be forgot or neglected, and its laws in many cases disregarded, unless a multitude of officers and military force be continually kept in view, and 2.8.23 employed to enforce the execution of the laws, and to make the government feared and respected. No position can be truer than this, that in this country either neglected laws, or a military execution of them, must lead to a revolution, and to the destruction of freedom. Neglected laws must first lead to anarchy and confusion; and a military execution of laws is only a shorter way to the same point—despotic government.[18]

Your's, &c.
The Federal Farmer.

III

October 10th, 1787.

Dear Sir,

2.8.24 The great object of a free people must be so to form their government and laws, and so to administer them, as to create a confidence in, and respect for the laws; and thereby induce the sensible and virtuous part of the community to declare in favor of the laws, and to support them without an expensive military force.[19] I wish, though I confess I have not much hope, that this may be the case with the laws of congress under the new constitution. I am fully convinced that we must organize the national government on different principals, and make the parts of it more efficient, and secure in it more effectually the different interests in the community; or else leave in the state governments some powers propose[d] to be lodged in it—at least till such an organization shall be found to be practicable. Not sanguine in my expectations of a good federal administration, and satisfied, as I am, of the impracticability of consolidating the states, and at the same time of preserving the rights of the people at large, I believe we ought still to leave some of those powers in the state governments, in which the people, in fact, will still be represented—to define some other powers proposed to be vested in the general government, more carefully, and to establish a few principles to secure a proper exercise of the powers given it. It is not my object to multiply objections, or to contend about inconsiderable powers or amendments; I wish the system adopted with a few alterations; but those, in my mind, are essential ones; if adopted without, every good citizen will acquiesce though I shall consider the duration of our governments, and the liberties of this people, very much dependant on the administration of the general government.[20] A wise and honest administration, may make the people happy under any government; but necessity only can justify even our leaving open avenues to the abuse of power, by wicked, unthinking, or ambitious men. I will examine, first, the organization of the proposed government, in order to judge; 2d, with propriety, what powers are improperly, at least prematurely lodged in it. I shall examine, 3d, the undefined powers; and 4th, those powers, the exercise of which is not secured on safe and proper ground.

First. As to the organization—the house of representatives, the democrative branch, as it is called, is to consist of 65 members: that is, about one representative for fifty thousand inhabitants, to be chosen biennially—the federal legislature may increase this number to one for each thirty thousand inhabitants, abating fractional numbers in each state.—Thirty-three representatives will make a quorum for doing business, and a majority of those present determine the sense of the house.—I have no idea that the interests, feelings, and opinions of three or four millions of people, especially touching internal taxation, can be collected in such a house.—In the nature of things, nine times in ten, men of the elevated classes in the community only can be chosen—Connecticut, for instance, will have five representatives—not one man in a hundred of those who form the democrative branch in the state legislature, will, on a fair computation, be one of the five—The people of this country, in one sense, may all be democratic; but if we make the proper distinction between the few men of wealth and abilities, and consider them, as we ought, as the natural aristocracy of the country,[21] and the great body of the people, the middle and lower classes, as the democracy, this federal representative branch will have but very little democracy in it, even this small representation is not secured on proper principles.—The branches of the legislature are essential parts of the fundamental compact, and ought to be so fixed by the people, that the legislature cannot alter itself by modifying the elections of its own members. This, by a part of Art. 1. Sect. 4. the general legislature may do, it may evidently so regulate elections as to secure the choice of any particular description of men.—It may make the whole state one district—make the capital, or any places in the state, the place or places of election—it may declare that the five men (or whatever the number may be the state may chuse) who shall have the most votes shall be considered as chosen—In this case it is easy to perceive how the people who live scattered in the inland towns will bestow their votes on different men—and how a few men in a city, in any order or profession, may unite and place any five men they please highest among those that may be voted for—and all this may be done constitutionally, and by those silent operations, which are not immediately perceived by the people in general.—I know it is urged, that the general legislature will be disposed to regulate elections on fair and just principles:—This may be true—good men will generally govern well with almost any constitution: but why in laying the foundation of the social system, need we unnecessarily leave a door open to improper regulations?—This is a very general and unguarded clause, and many evils may flow from that part which authorises the congress to regulate elections—Were it omitted, the regulations of elections would be solely in the respective states, where the people are sub- 2.8.25 stantially represented; and where the elections ought to be regulated, otherwise to secure a representation from all parts of the community, in making the constitution, we ought to provide for dividing each state into a proper number of districts, and for confining the electors in each district to the choice of some men, who shall have a permanent interest and residence in it; and also for this essential object, that the representative elected shall have a majority of the votes of those electors who shall attend and give their votes.

2.8.26 In considering the practicability of having a full and equal representation of the people from all parts of the union, not only distances and different opinions, customs, and views, common in extensive tracts of country, are to be taken into view, but many differences peculiar to Eastern, Middle, and Southern states. These differences are not so perceivable among the members of congress, and men of general information in the states, as among the men who would properly form the democratic branch. The Eastern states are very democratic, and composed chiefly of moderate freeholders; they have but few rich men and no slaves; the Southern states are composed chiefly of rich planters and slaves; they have but few moderate freeholders, and the prevailing influence, in them, is generally a dissipated aristocracy: The Middle states partake partly of the Eastern, and partly of the Southern character.

2.8.27 Perhaps, nothing could be more disjointed, unweildly and incompetent to doing business with harmony and dispatch, than a federal house of representatives properly numerous for the great objects of taxation, et cetera collected from the several states; whether such men would ever act in concert; whether they would not worry along a few years, and then be the means of separating the parts of the union, is very problematical?—View this system in whatever form we can, propriety brings us still to this point, a federal government possessed of general and complete powers, as to those national objects which cannot well come under the cognizance of the internal laws of the respective states, and this federal government, accordingly, consisting of branches not very numerous.

2.8.28 The house of representatives is on the plan of consolidation, but the senate is intirely on the federal plan;[22] and Delaware will have as much constitutional influence in the senate, as the largest state in the union: and in this senate are lodged legislative, executive and judicial powers: Ten states in this union urge that they are small states, nine of which were present in the convention.—They were interested in collecting large powers into the hands of the senate, in which each state still will have its equal share of power. I suppose it was impracticable for the three large states, as they were called, to get the senate formed on any other principles: But this only proves, that we cannot form one general government on equal and just principles—and proves, that we ought not to lodge in it such extensive powers before we are convinced of the practicability of organizing it on just and equal principles. The senate will consist of two members from each state, chosen by the state legislatures, every sixth year. The clause referred to, respecting the elections of representatives, empowers the general legislature to regulate the elections of senators also, "except as to the places of chusing senators."—There is, therefore, but little more security in the elections than in those of representatives: Fourteen senators make a quorum for business, and a majority of the senators present give the vote of the senate, except in giving judgment upon an impeachment, or in making treaties, or in expelling a member, when two-thirds of the senators present must agree—The members of the legislature are not excluded from being elected to any military offices, or any civil offices, except those created, or the emoluments of which shall be increased by themselves: two-thirds of the members present, of either house, may expel a member at pleasure. The senate is an independant branch of the legislature, a court for trying impeachments, and also a part of the executive, having a negative in the making of all treaties, and in appointing almost all officers.

The vice president is not a very important, if not an unncessary part of the system—he may be a part of the senate at one period, and act as the supreme executive magistrate at another—The election of this officer, as well as of the president of the United States seems to be properly secured;[23] but when we examine the powers of the president, and the forms of the executive, we shall perceive that the general government, in this part, will have a strong tendency to aristocracy, or the government of the few. The executive is, in fact, the president and senate in all transactions of any importance; the president is connected with, or tied to the senate; he may always act with the senate, but never can effectually counteract its views: The president can appoint no officer, civil or military, who shall not be agreeable to the senate; and the presumption is, that the will of so important a body will not be very easily controuled, and that it will exercise its powers with great address. 2.8.29

In the judicial department, powers ever kept distinct in well balanced governments, are no less improperly blended in the hands of the same men—in the judges of the supreme court is lodged, the law, the equity and the fact. It is not necessary to pursue the minute organical parts of the general government proposed.—There were various interests in the convention, to be reconciled, especially of large and small states; of carrying and non-carrying states; and of states more and states less democratic—vast labour and attention were by the convention bestowed on the organization of the parts of the constitution offered; still it is acknowledged there are many things radically wrong in the essential parts of this constitution—but it is said that these are the result of our situation: On a full examination of the subject, I believe it; but what do the laborious inquiries and determinations of the convention prove? If they prove any thing, they prove that we cannot consolidate the states on proper principles: The organization of the government presented proves, that we cannot form a general government in which 2.8.30 all power can be safely lodged; and a little attention to the parts of the one proposed will make it appear very evident, that all the powers proposed to be lodged in it, will not be then well deposited, either for the purposes of government, or the preservation of liberty. I will suppose no abuse of powers in those cases, in which the abuse of it is not well guarded against—I will suppose the words authorising the general government to regulate the elections of its own members struck out of the plan, or free district elections, in each state, amply secured.—That the small representation provided for shall be as fair and equal as it is capable of being made—I will suppose the judicial department regulated on pure principles, by future laws, as far as it can be by the constitution, and consist[ent] with the situation of the country—still there will be an unreasonable accumulation of powers in the general government, if all be granted, enumerated in the plan proposed. The plan does not present a well balanced government. The senatorial branch of the legislative and the executive are substantially united, and the president, or the first executive magistrate, may aid the senatorial interest when weakest, but never can effectually support the democratic[,] however it may be oppressed;—the excellency, in my mind, of a well balanced government is that it consists of distinct branches, each sufficiently strong and independant to keep its own station, and to aid either of the other branches which may occasionally want aid.

2.8.31 The convention found that any but a small house of representatives would be expensive, and that it would be impracticable to assemble a large number of representatives. Not only the determination of the convention in this case, but the situation of the states, proves the impracticability of collecting, in any one point, a proper representation.

2.8.32 The formation of the senate, and the smallness of the house, being, therefore, the result of our situation, and the actual state of things, the evils which may attend the exercise of many powers in this national government may be considered as without a remedy.

2.8.33 All officers are impeachable before the senate only—before the men by whom they are appointed, or who are consenting to the appointment of these officers. No judgment of conviction, on an impeachment, can be given unless two thirds of the senators agree. Under these circumstances the right of impeachment, in the house, can be of but little importance; the house cannot expect often to convict the offender; and, therefore, probably, will but seldom or never exercise the right. In addition to the insecurity and inconveniences attending this organization beforementioned, it may be observed, that it is extremely difficult to secure the people against the fatal effects of corruption and influence. The power of making any law will be in the president, eight senators, and seventeen representatives, relative to the important objects enumerated in the constitution. Where there is a small representation a sufficient number to carry any measure, may, with ease, be influenced by bribes, offices and civilities; they may easily form private juntoes, and out door meetings, agree on measures, and carry them by silent votes.

Impressed, as I am, with a sense of the difficulties there are in the way of forming the parts of a federal government on proper principles, and seeing a government so unsubstantially organized, after so arduous an attempt has been made, I am led to believe, that powers ought to be given to it with great care and caution.[24] 2.8.34

In the second place it is necessary, therefore, to examine the extent, and the probable operations of some of those extensive powers proposed to be vested in this government. These powers, legislative, executive, and judicial, respect internal as well as external objects. Those respecting external objects, as all foreign concerns, commerce, imposts, all causes arising on the seas, peace and war, and Indian affairs, can be lodged no where else, with any propriety, but in this government. Many powers that respect internal objects ought clearly to be lodged in it; as those to regulate trade between the states, weights and measures, the coin or current monies, post-offices, naturalization, etc. These powers may be exercised without essentially effecting the internal police of the respective states: But powers to lay and collect internal taxes, to form the militia, to make bankrupt laws, and to decide on appeals, questions arising on the internal laws of the respective states, are of a very serious nature, and carry with them almost all other powers. These taken in connection with the others, and powers to raise armies and build navies, proposed to be lodged in this government, appear to me to comprehend all the essential powers in the community, and those which will be left to the states will be of no great importance. 2.8.35

A power to lay and collect taxes at discretion, is, in itself, of very great importance. By means of taxes, the government may command the whole or any part of the subject's property. Taxes may be of various kinds; but there is a strong distinction between external and internal taxes. External taxes are impost duties, which are laid on imported goods; they may usually be collected in a few seaport towns, and of a few individuals, though ultimately paid by the consumer; a few officers can collect them, and they can be carried no higher than trade will bear, or smuggling permit—that in the very nature of commerce, bounds are set to them.[25] But internal taxes, as poll and land taxes, excises, duties on all written instruments, etc. may fix themselves on every person and species of property in the community; they may be carried to any lengths, and in proportion as they are extended, numerous officers must be employed to assess them, and to enforce the collection of them. In the United Netherlands the general government has compleat powers, as to external taxation; but as to internal taxes, it makes requisitions on the provinces. Internal taxation in this country is more important, as the country is so very extensive. As many assessors and collectors of federal taxes will be above three hundred miles from the seat of the federal government as will be less. Besides, to lay and collect internal taxes, 2.8.36 in this extensive country, must require a great number of congressional ordinances, immediately operating upon the body of the people; these must continually interfere with the state laws, and thereby produce disorder and general dissatisfaction, till the one system of laws or the other, operating upon the same subjects, shall be abolished. These ordinances alone, to say nothing of those respecting the militia, coin, commerce, federal judiciary, etc. etc. will probably soon defeat the operations of the state laws and governments.

2.8.37 Should the general government think it politic, as some administrations (if not all) probably will, to look for a support in a system of influence, the government will take every occasion to multiply laws, and officers to execute them, considering these as so many necessary props for its own support.[26] Should this system of policy be adopted, taxes more productive than the impost duties will, probably, be wanted to support the government, and to discharge foreign demands, without leaving any thing for the domestic creditors. The internal sources of taxation then must be called into operation, and internal tax laws and federal assessors and collectors spread over this immense country. All these circumstances considered, is it wise, prudent, or safe, to vest the powers of laying and collecting internal taxes in the general government, while imperfectly organized and inadequate; and to trust to amending it hereafter, and making it adequate to this purpose? It is not only unsafe but absurd to lodge power in a government before it is fitted to receive it? [Sic.] It is confessed that this power and representation ought to go together. Why give the power first? Why give the power to the few, who, when possessed of it, may have address enough to prevent the increase of representation? Why not keep the power, and, when necessary, amend the constitution, and add to its other parts this power, and a proper increase of representation at the same time? Then men who may want the power will be under strong inducements to let in the people, by their representatives, into the government, to hold their due proportion of this power. If a proper representation be impracticable, then we shall see this power resting in the states, where it at present ought to be, and not inconsiderately given up.

2.8.38 When I recollect how lately congress, conventions, legislatures, and people contended in the cause of liberty, and carefully weighed the importance of taxation, I can scarcely believe we are serious in proposing to vest the powers of laying and collecting internal taxes in a government so imperfectly organized for such purposes. Should the United States be taxed by a house of representatives of two hundred members, which would be about fifteen members for Connecticut, twenty-five for Massachusetts, etc. still the middle and lower classes of people could have no great share, in fact, in taxation. I am aware it is said, that the representation proposed by the new constitution is sufficiently numerous; it may be for many purposes; but to suppose that this branch is sufficiently numerous to guard the rights of the people in the administration of the government, in which the purse and sword is placed, seems to argue that we have forgot what the true meaning of representation is. I am sensible also, that it is said that congress will not attempt to lay and collect internal taxes; that it is necessary for them to have the power, though it cannot probably be exercised.[27]—I admit that it is not probable that any prudent congress will attempt to lay and collect internal taxes, especially direct taxes: but this only proves, that the power would be improperly lodged in congress, and that it might be abused by imprudent and designing men.

I have heard several gentlemen, to get rid of objections to this part of the 2.8.39 constitution, attempt to construe the powers relative to direct taxes, as those who object to it would have them; as to these, it is said, that congress will only have power to make requisitions, leaving it to the states to lay and collect them.[28] I see but very little colour for this construction, and the attempt only proves that this part of the plan cannot be defended. By this plan there can be no doubt, but that the powers of congress will be complete as to all kinds of taxes whatever—Further, as to internal taxes, the state governments will have concurrent powers with the general government, and both may tax the same objects in the same year; and the objection that the general government may suspend a state tax, as a necessary measure for the promoting the collection of a federal tax, is not without foundation.[29]—As the states owe large debts, and have large demands upon them individually, there clearly would be a propriety in leaving in their possession exclusively, some of the internal sources of taxation, at least until the federal representation shall be properly encreased: The power in the general government to lay and collect internal taxes, will render its powers respecting armies, navies and the militia, the more exceptionable. By the constitution it is proposed that congress shall have power "to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years; to provide and maintain a navy; to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions: to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia: reserving to the states the right to appoint the officers, and to train the militia according to the discipline prescribed by congress; congress will have unlimited power to raise armies, and to engage officers and men for any number of years; but a legislative act applying money for their support can have operation for no longer term than two years, and if a subsequent congress do not within the two years renew the appropriation, or further appropriate monies for the use of the army, the army will be left to take care of itself. When an army shall once be raised for a number of years, it is not probable that it will find much difficulty in getting congress to pass laws for applying monies to its support. I see so many men in America fond of a standing army, and especially among those who probably will have a large share in administering the federal system; it is very evident to me, that we shall have a large standing army as soon as the monies to support them can be possibly found. An army is a very agreeable place of employment for the young gentlemen of many families. A power to raise armies must be lodged some where; still this will not justify the lodging this power in a bare majority of so few men without any checks; or in the government in which the great body of the people, in the nature of things, will be only nominally represented. In the state governments the great body of the people, the yeomanry, etc. of the country, are represented: It is true they will chuse the members of congress, and may now and then chuse a man of their own way of thinking; but it is impossible for forty, or thirty thousand people in this country, one time in ten to find a man who can possess similar feelings, views, and interests with themselves: Powers to lay and collect taxes and to raise armies are of the greatest moment; for carrying them into effect, laws need not be frequently made, and the yeomanry, etc of the country ought substantially to have a check upon the passing of these laws; this check ought to be placed in the legislatures, or at least, in the few men the common people of the country, will, probably, have in congress, in the true sense of the word, "from among themselves."[30] It is true, the yeomanry of the country possess the lands, the weight of property, possess arms, and are too strong a body of men to be openly offended—and, therefore, it is urged, they will take care of themselves, that men who shall govern will not dare pay any disrespect to their opinions. It is easily perceived, that if they have not their proper negative upon passing laws in congress, or on the passage of laws relative to taxes and armies, they may in twenty or thirty years be by means imperceptible to them, totally deprived of that boasted weight and strength: This may be done in a great measure by congress, if disposed to do it, by modelling the militia. Should one fifth, or one eighth part of the men capable of bearing arms, be made a select militia, as has been proposed, and those the young and ardent part of the community, possessed of but little or no property, and all the others put upon a plan that will render them of no importance, the former will answer all the purposes of an army, while the latter will be defenceless. The state must train the militia in such form and according to such systems and rules as congress shall prescribe: and the only actual influence the respective states will have respecting the militia will be in appointing the officers. I see no provision made for calling out the posse commitatus for executing the laws of the union, but provision is made for congress to call forth the militia for the execution of them—and the militia in general, or any select part of it, may be called out under military officers, instead of the sheriff to enforce an execution of federal laws, in the first instance and thereby introduce an entire military execution of the laws.[31] I know that powers to raise taxes, to regulate the military strength of the community on some uniform plan, to provide for its defence and internal order, and for duly executing the laws, must be lodged somewhere; but still we ought not so to lodge them, as evidently to give one order of men in the community, undue advantages over others; or commit the many to the mercy, prudence, and moderation of the few. And so far as it may be necessary to lodge any of the peculiar powers in the general government, a more safe exercise of them ought to be secured, by requiring the consent of two-thirds or three-fourths of congress thereto—until the federal representation can be increased, so that the democratic members in congress may stand some tolerable chance of a reasonable negative, in behalf of the numerous, important, and democratic part of the community.

I am not sufficiently acquainted with the laws and internal police of all the states to discern fully, how general bankrupt laws, made by the union, would effect them, or promote the public good. I believe the property of debtors, in the several states, is held responsible for their debts in modes and forms very different. If uniform bankrupt laws can be made without producing real and substantial inconveniences, I wish them to be made by congress.[32] 2.8.40

There are some powers proposed to be lodged in the general government in the judicial department, I think very unnecessarily,[33] I mean powers respecting questions arising upon the internal laws of the respective states. It is proper the federal judiciary should have powers co-extensive with the federal legislature—that is, the power of deciding finally on the laws of the union. By Art. 3. Sect. 2. the powers of the federal judiciary are extended (among other things) to all cases between a state and citizens of another state—between citizens of different states—between a state or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens or subjects. Actions in all these cases, except against a state government, are now brought and finally determined in the law courts of the states respectively; and as there are no words to exclude these courts of their jurisdiction in these cases, they will have concurrent jurisdiction with the inferior federal courts in them; and, therefore, if the new constitution be adopted without any amendment in this respect, all those numerous actions, now brought in the state courts between our citizens and foreigners, between citizens of different states, by state governments against foreigners, and by state governments against citizens of other states, may also be brought in the federal courts; and an appeal will lay in them from the state courts, or federal inferior courts, to the supreme judicial court of the union. In almost all these cases, either party may have the trial by jury in the state courts; excepting paper money and tender laws, which are wisely guarded against in the proposed constitution, justice may be obtained in these courts on reasonable terms; they must be more competent to proper decisions on the laws of their respective states, than the federal courts can possibly be. I do not, in any point of view, see the need of opening a new jurisdiction to these causes—of opening a new scene of expensive law suits—of suffering foreigners, and citizens of different states, to drag each other many hundred miles into the federal courts. It is true, those courts may be so organized by a wise and prudent legislature, 2.8.41

as to make the obtaining of justice in them tolerably easy; they may in general be organized on the common law principles of the country: But this benefit is by no means secured by the constitution. The trial by jury is secured only in those few criminal cases, to which the federal laws will extend—as crimes committed on the seas, against the laws of nations, treason, and counterfeiting the federal securities and coin: But even in these cases, the jury trial of the vicinage is not secured—particularly in the large states, a citizen may be tried for a crime committed in the state, and yet tried in some states 500 miles from the place where it was committed; but the jury trial is not secured at all in civil causes. Though the convention have not established this trial, it is to be hoped that congress, in putting the new system into execution, will do it by a legislative act, in all cases in which it can be done with propriety. Whether the jury trial is not excluded [from] the supreme judicial court, is an important question. By Art. 3. Sect. 2. all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and in those cases in which a state shall be party, the supreme court shall have jurisdiction. In all the other cases beforementioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exception, and under such regulations, as the congress shall make. By court is understood a court consisting of judges; and the idea of a jury is excluded. This court, or the judges, are to have jurisdiction on appeals, in all the cases enumerated, as to law and fact; the judges are to decide the law and try the fact, and the trial of the fact being assigned to the judges by the constitution, a jury for trying the fact is excluded; however, under the exceptions and powers to make regulations, congress may, perhaps introduce the jury, to try the fact in most necessary cases.[34]

2.8.42 There can be but one supreme court in which the final jurisdiction will centre in all federal causes—except in cases where appeals by law shall not be allowed: The judicial powers of the federal courts extends in law and equity to certain cases: and, therefore, the powers to determine on the law, in equity, and as to the fact, all will concentre in the supreme court:—These powers, which by this constitution are blended in the same hands, the same judges, are in Great-Britain deposited in different hands—to wit, the decision of the law in the law judges, the decision in equity in the chancellor, and the trial of the fact in the jury. It is a very dangerous thing to vest in the same judge power to decide on the law, and also general powers in equity; for if the law restrain him, he is only to step into his shoes of equity, and give what judgment his reason or opinion may dictate; we have no precedents in this country, as yet, to regulate the divisions in equity as in Great Britain; equity, therefore, in the supreme court for many years will be mere discretion. I confess in the constitution of this supreme court, as left by the constitution, I do not see a spark of freedom or a shadow of our own or the British common law.

2.8.43 This court is to have appellate jurisdiction in all the other cases before mentioned: Many sensible men suppose that cases before mentioned respect, as well the criminal cases as the civil ones, mentioned antecedently in the constitution, if so an appeal is allowed in criminal cases—contrary to the usual sense of law. How far it may be proper to admit a foreigner or the citizen of another state to bring actions against state governments, which have failed in performing so many promises made during the war, is doubtful: How far it may be proper so to humble a state, as to oblige it to answer to an individual in a court of law, is worthy of consideration; the states are now subject to no such actions; and this new jurisdiction will subject the states, and many defendants to actions, and processes, which were not in the contemplation of the parties, when the contract was made; all engagements existing between citizens of different states, citizens and foreigners, states and foreigners; and states and citizens of other states were made the parties contemplating the remedies then existing on the laws of the states—and the new remedy proposed to be given in the federal courts, can be founded on no principle whatever.

Your's &c.
The Federal Farmer.

IV

October 12th, 1787.

Dear Sir,

It will not be possible to establish in the federal courts the jury trial of the vicinage so well as in the state courts. 2.8.44

Third. There appears to me to be not only a premature deposit of some important powers in the general government—but many of those deposited there are undefined, and may be used to good or bad purposes as honest or designing men shall prevail. By Art. 1, Sect. 2, representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, etc.—same art. sect. 8, the congress shall have powers to lay and collect taxes, duties, etc. for the common defence and general welfare, but all duties, imposts and excises, shall be uniform throughout the United States: By the first recited clause, direct taxes shall be apportioned on the states. This seems to favour the idea suggested by some sensible men and writers, that congress, as to direct taxes, will only have power to make requisitions,[35] but the latter clause, power to lay and collect taxes, etc seems clearly to favour the contrary opinion and, in my mind, the true one, that congress shall have power to tax immediately individuals, without the intervention of the state legislatures[;] in fact the first clause appears to me only to provide that each state shall pay a certain portion of the tax, and the latter to provide that congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, that is to assess upon, and to collect of the individuals in the state, the state[']s quota; but these still I consider as undefined powers, because judicious men understand them differently.

2.8.45 It is doubtful whether the vice president is to have any qualifications; none are mentioned; but he may serve as president, and it may be inferred, he ought to be qualified therefore as the president; but the qualifications of the president are required only of the person to be elected president. By art. the 2, sect. 2. "But the congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of the departments:" Who are inferior officers? May not a congress disposed to vest the appointment of all officers in the president, under this clause, vest the appointment of almost every officer in the president alone, and destroy the check mentioned in the first part of the clause, and lodged in the senate. It is true, this check is badly lodged, but then some check upon the first magistrate in appointing officers, ought it appears by the opinion of the convention, and by the general opinion, to be established in the constitution. By art. 3, sect. 2, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction as to law and facts with such exceptions, etc. to what extent is it intended the exceptions shall be carried—Congress may carry them so far as to annihilate substantially the appellate jurisdiction, and the clause be rendered of very little importance.

2.8.46 4th. There are certain rights which we have always held sacred in the United States, and recognized in all our constitutions, and which, by the adoption of the new constitution in its present form, will be left unsecured.[36] By article 6, the proposed constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby; any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

2.8.47 It is to be observed that when the people shall adopt the proposed constitution it will be their last and supreme act; it will be adopted not by the people of New-Hampshire, Massachusetts, etc. but by the people of the United States;[37] and wherever this constitution, or any part of it, shall be incompatible with the ancient customs, rights, the laws or the constitutions heretofore established in the United States, it will entirely abolish them and do them away: And not only this, but the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance of the federal constitution will be also supreme laws, and wherever they shall be incompatible with those customs, rights, laws or constitutions heretofore established, they will also entirely abolish them and do them away.

2.8.48 By the article before recited, treaties also made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law: It is not said that these treaties shall be made in pursuance of the constitution—nor are there any constitutional bounds set to those who shall make them: The president and two thirds of the senate will be empowered to make treaties indefinitely, and when these treaties shall be made, they will also abolish all laws and state constitutions incompatible with them. This power in the president and senate is absolute, and the judges will be bound to allow full force to whatever rule, article or thing the president and senate shall establish by treaty, whether it be practicable to set any bounds to those who make treaties, I am not able to say: if not, it proves that this power ought to be more safely lodged.

2.8.49 The federal constitution, the laws of congress made in pursuance of the constitution, and all treaties must have full force and effect in all parts of the United States; and all other laws, rights and constitutions which stand in their way must yield: It is proper the national laws should be supreme, and superior to state or district laws: but then the national laws ought to yield to unalienable or fundamental rights—and national laws, made by a few men, should extend only to a few national objects. This will not be the case with the laws of congress: To have any proper idea of their extent, we must carefully examine the legislative, executive and judicial powers proposed to be lodged in the general government, and consider them in connection with a general clause in art. 1. sect. 8, in these words (after inumerating a number of powers) "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof."—The powers of this government as has been observed, extend to internal as well as external objects, and to those objects to which all others are subordinate; it is almost impossible to have a just conception of these powers, or of the extent and number of the laws which may be deemed necessary and proper to carry them into effect, till we shall come to exercise those powers and make the laws. In making laws to carry those powers into effect, it is to be expected, that a wise and prudent congress will pay respect to the opinions of a free people, and bottom their laws on those principles which have been considered as essential and fundamental in the British, and in our government. But a congress of a different character will not be bound by the constitution to pay respect to those principles.

2.8.50 It is said, that when the people make a constitution, and delegate powers that all powers not delegated by them to those who govern is [sic] reserved in the people;[38] and that the people, in the present case, have reserved in themselves, and in their state governments, every right and power not expressly given by the federal constitution to those who shall administer the national government.[39] It is said on the other hand, that the people, when they make a constitution, yield all power not expressly reserved to themselves.[40] The truth is, in either case, it is mere matter of opinion and men usually take either side of the argument, as will best answer their purposes:

But the general presumption being, that men who govern, will, in doubtful cases, construe laws and constitutions most favourably for encreasing their own powers; all wise and prudent people, in forming constitutions, have drawn the line, and carefully described the powers parted with and the powers reserved. By the state constitutions, certain rights have been reserved in the people; or rather, they have been recognized and established in such a manner, that state legislatures are bound to respect them, and to make no laws infringing upon them. The state legislatures are obliged to take notice of the bills of rights of their respective states. The bills of rights, and the state constitutions, are fundamental compacts only between those who govern, and the people of the same state.

2.8.51 In the year 1788 the people of the United States make a federal constitution, which is a fundamental compact between them and their federal rulers; these rulers, in the nature of things, cannot be bound to take notice of any other compact. It would be absurd for them, in making laws, to look over thirteen, fifteen, or twenty state constitutions, to see what rights are established as fundamental, and must not be infringed upon, in making laws in the society. It is true, they would be bound to do it if the people, in their federal compact, should refer to the state constitutions, recognize all parts not inconsistent with the federal constitution, and direct their federal rulers to take notice of them accordingly; but this is not the case, as the plan stands proposed at present; and it is absurd, to suppose so unnatural an idea is intended or implied. I think my opinion is not only founded in reason, but I think it is supported by the report of the convention itself. If there are a number of rights established by the state constitutions, and which will remain sacred, and the general government is bound to take notice of them—it must take notice of one as well as another; and if unnecessary to recognize or establish one by the federal constitution, it would be unnecessary to recognize or establish another by it.[41] If the federal constitution is to be construed so far in connection with the state constitutions, as to leave the trial by jury in civil causes, for instance, secured; on the same principles it would have left the trial by jury in criminal causes, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, etc. secured; they all stand on the same footing; they are the common rights of Americans, and have been recognized by the state constitutions: But the convention found it necessary to recognize or re-establish the benefits of that writ, and the jury trial in criminal cases. As to expost facto laws, the convention has done the same in one case, and gone further in another. It is part of the compact between the people of each state and their rulers, that no expost facto laws shall be made. But the convention, by Art. I Sect. 10 have put a sanction upon this part even of the state compacts. In fact, the 9th and 10th Sections in Art. I. in the proposed constitution, are no more nor less, than a partial bill of rights; they establish certain principles as part of the compact upon which the federal legislators and officers can never infringe. It is here wisely stipulated, that the federal legislature shall never pass a bill of attainder, or expost facto law; that no tax shall be laid on articles exported, etc. The establishing of one right implies the necessity of establishing another and similar one.

On the whole, the position appears to me to be undeniable, that this bill of rights ought to be carried farther, and some other principles established, as a part of this fundamental compact between the people of the United States and their federal rulers. 2.8.52

It is true, we are not disposed to differ much, at present, about religion; but when we are making a constitution, it is to be hoped, for ages and millions yet unborn, why not establish the free exercise of religion, as a part of the national compact. There are other essential rights, which we have justly understood to be the rights of freemen; as freedom from hasty and unreasonable search warrants, warrants not founded on oath, and not issued with due caution, for searching and seizing men's papers, property, and persons. The trials by jury in civil causes, it is said, varies so much in the several states, that no words could be found for the uniform establishment of it.[42] If so, the federal legislation will not be able to establish it by any general laws. I confess I am of opinion it may be established, but not in that beneficial manner in which we may enjoy it, for the reasons beforementioned. When I speak of the jury trial of the vicinage, or the trial of the fact in the neighbourhood,—I do not lay so much stress upon the circumstance of our being tried by our neighbours: in this enlightened country men may be probably impartially tried by those who do not live very near them: but the trial of facts in the neighbourhood is of great importance in other respects. Nothing can be more essential than the cross examining witnesses, and generally before the triers of the facts in question. The common people can establish facts with much more ease with oral than written evidence; when trials of facts are removed to a distance from the homes of the parties and witnesses, oral evidence becomes intolerably expensive, and the parties must depend on written evidence, which to the common people is expensive and almost useless; it must be frequently taken ex parte, and but very seldom leads to the proper discovery of truth. 2.8.53

The trial by jury is very important in another point of view. It is essential in every free country, that common people should have a part and share of influence, in the judicial as well as in the legislative department. To hold open to them the offices of senators, judges, and offices to fill which an expensive education is required, cannot answer any valuable purposes for them; they are not in a situation to be brought forward and to fill those offices; these, and most other offices of any considerable importance, will be occupied by the few. The few, the well born, etc. as Mr. Adams calls them,[43] in judicial decisions as well as in legislation, are generally disposed, and very naturally too, to favour those of their own description. 2.8.54

The trial by jury in the judicial department, and the collection of the people by their representatives in the legislature, are those fortunate in- 2.8.55

ventions which have procured for them, in this country, their true proportion of influence, and the wisest and most fit means of protecting themselves in the community. Their situation, as jurors and representatives, enables them to acquire information and knowledge in the affairs and government of the society; and to come forward, in turn, as the centinels and guardians of each other. I am very sorry that even a few of our countrymen should consider jurors and representatives in a different point of view, as ignorant troublesome bodies, which ought not to have any share in the concerns of government.

2.8.56 I confess I do not see in what cases the congress can, with any pretence of right, make a law to suppress the freedom of the press; though I am not clear, that congress is restrained from laying any duties whatever on printing, and from laying duties particularly heavy on certain pieces printed, and perhaps congress may require large bonds for the payment of these duties. Should the printer say, the freedom of the press was secured by the constitution of the state in which he lived, congress might, and perhaps, with great propriety, answer, that the federal constitution is the only compact existing between them and the people; in this compact the people have named no others, and therefore congress, in exercising the powers assigned them, and in making laws to carry them into execution, are restrained by nothing beside the federal constitution, any more than a state legislature is restrained by a compact between the magistrates and people of a county, city, or town of which the people, in forming the state constitution, have taken no notice.

It is not my object to enumerate rights of inconsiderable importance; but there are others, no doubt, which ought to be established as a fundamental part of the national system.

2.8.57 It is worthy observation, that all treaties are made by foreign nations with a confederacy of thirteen states—that the western country is attached to thirteen states—thirteen states have jointly and severally engaged to pay the public debts.—Should a new government be formed of nine, ten, eleven, or twelve states, those treaties could not be considered as binding on the foreign nations who made them. However, I believe the probability to be, that if nine states adopt the constitution, the others will.

2.8.58 It may also be worthy our examination, how far the provision for amending this plan, when it shall be adopted, is of any importance. No measures can be taken towards amendments, unless two-thirds of the congress, or two-thirds of the legislatures of the several states shall agree.—While power is in the hands of the people, or democratic part of the community, more especially as at present, it is easy, according to the general course of human affairs, for the few influential men in the community, to obtain conventions, alterations in government, and to persuade the common people they may change for the better, and to get from them a part of the power: But when power is once transferred from the many to the few, all changes become extremely difficult; the government, in this case, being beneficial to the few, they will be exceedingly artful and adroit in preventing any measures which may lead to a change; and nothing will produce it, but great exertions and severe struggles on the part of the common people. Every man of reflection must see, that the change now proposed, is a transfer of power from the many to the few, and the probability is, the artful and ever active aristocracy, will prevent all peaceable measures for changes, unless when they shall discover some favourable moment to increase their own influence.[44] I am sensible, thousands of men in the United States, are disposed to adopt the proposed constitution, though they perceive it to be essentially defective, under an idea that amendments of it, may be obtained when necessary. This is a pernicious idea, it argues a servility of character totally unfit for the support of free government; it is very repugnant to that perpetual jealousy respecting liberty, so absolutely necessary in all free states, spoken of by Mr. Dickinson.[45]—However, if our countrymen are so soon changed, and the language of 1774, is become odious to them, it will be in vain to use the language of freedom, or to attempt to rouse them to free enquiries: But I shall never believe this is the case with them, whatever present appearances may be, till I shall have very strong evidence indeed of it.

Your's, &c.
The Federal Farmer.

V

October 13th, 1787

Dear Sir,

Thus I have examined the federal constitution as far as a few days leisure would permit. It opens to my mind a new scene; instead of seeing powers cautiously lodged in the hands of numerous legislators, and many magistrates, we see all important powers collecting in one centre, where a few men will possess them almost at discretion. And instead of checks in the formation of the government, to secure the rights of the people against the usurpations of those they appoint to govern, we are to understand the equal division of lands among our people, and the strong arm furnished them by nature and situation, are to secure them against those usurpations. If there are advantages in the equal division of our lands, and the strong and manly habits of our people, we ought to establish governments calculated to give duration to them, and not governments which never can work naturally, till that equality of property, and those free and manly habits shall be destroyed; these evidently are not the natural basis of the proposed constitution. No man of reflection, and skilled in the science of government, can 2.8.59 suppose these will move on harmoniously together for ages, or even for fifty years.[46] As to the little circumstances commented upon, by some writers, with applause—as the age of a representative, of the president, etc.—they have, in my mind, no weight in the general tendency of the system.

2.8.60 There are, however, in my opinion, many good things in the proposed system. It is founded on elective principles, and the deposits of powers in different hands, is essentially right. The guards against those evils we have experienced in some states in legislation are valuable indeed; but the value of every feature in this system is vastly lessened for the want of that one important feature in a free government, a representation of the people.[47] Because we have sometimes abused democracy, I am not among those men who think a democratic branch a nuisance; which branch shall be sufficiently numerous, to admit some of the best informed men of each order in the community into the administration of government.

2.8.61 While the radical defects in the proposed system are not so soon discovered, some temptations to each state, and to many classes of men to adopt it, are very visible. It uses the democratic language of several of the state constitutions, particularly that of Massachusetts; the eastern states will receive advantages so far as the regulation of trade, by a bare majority, is committed to it: Connecticut and New-Jersey will receive their share of a general impost: The middle states will receive the advantages surrounding the seat of government: The southern states will receive protection, and have their negroes represented in the legislature, and large back countries will soon have a majority in it. This system promises a large field of employment to military gentlemen, and gentlemen of the law; and in case the government shall be executed without convulsions, it will afford security to creditors, to the clergy, salary-men and others depending on money payments. So far as the system promises justice and reasonable advantages, in these respects, it ought to be supported by all honest men: but whenever it promises unequal and improper advantages to any particular states, or orders of men, it ought to be opposed.

2.8.62 I have, in the course of these letters observed, that there are many good things in the proposed constitution, and I have endeavoured to point out many important defects in it. I have admitted that we want a federal system—that we have a system presented, which, with several alterations may be made a tolerable good one—I have admitted there is a well founded uneasiness among creditors and mercantile men. In this situation of things, you ask me what I think ought to be done? My opinion in this case is only the opinion of an individual, and so far only as it corresponds with the opinions of the honest and substantial part of the community, is it entitled to consideration. Though I am fully satisfied that the state conventions ought most seriously to direct their exertions to altering and amending the system proposed before they shall adopt it—yet I have not sufficiently examined the subject, or formed an opinion, how far it will be practicable for those conventions to carry their amendments. As to the idea, that it will be in vain for those conventions to attempt amendments, it cannot be admitted; it is impossible to say whether they can or not until the attempt shall be made; and when it shall be determined, by experience, that the conventions cannot agree in amendments, it will then be an important question before the people of the United States, whether they will adopt or not the system proposed in its present form. This subject of consolidating the states is new; and because forty or fifty men have agreed in a system, to suppose the good sense of this country, an enlightened nation, must adopt it without examination, and though in a state of profound peace, without endeavouring to amend those parts they perceive are defective, dangerous to freedom, and destructive of the valuable principles of republican government—is truly humiliating. It is true there may be danger in delay; but there is danger in adopting the system in its present form; and I see the danger in either case will arise principally from the conduct and views of two very unprincipled parties in the United States—two fires, between which the honest and substantial people have long found themselves situated. One party is composed of little insurgents, men in debt, who want no law, and who want a share of the property of others; these are called levellers, Shayites, etc. The other party is composed of a few, but more dangerous men, with their servile dependents; these avariciously grasp at all power and property; you may discover in all the actions of these men, an evident dislike to free and equal government, and they will go systematically to work to change, essentially, the forms of government in this country; these are called aristocrats, M[onarch]ites [?], etc. etc. Between these two parties is the weight of the community; the men of middling property, men not in debt on the one hand, and men, on the other, content with republican governments, and not aiming at immense fortunes, offices, and power. In 1786, the little insurgents, the levellers, came forth, invaded the rights of others, and attempted to establish governments according to their wills. Their movements evidently gave encouragement to the other party, which, in 1787, has taken the political field, and with its fashionable dependants, and the tongue and the pen, is endeavouring to establish in great haste, a politer kind of government. These two parties, which will probably be opposed or united as it may suit their interests and views, are really insignificant, compared with the solid, free, and independent part of the community. It is not my intention to suggest, that either of these parties, and the real friends of the proposed constitution, are the same men. The fact is, these aristocrats support and hasten the adoption of the proposed constitution, merely because they think it is a stepping stone to their favorite object. I think I am well founded in this idea; I think the general politics of these men support it, as well as the common observation among them, That the proffered plan is the best that can be got at present, it will do for a few years, and lead to something better. The sensible and judicious part of the community will carefully weigh all these circumstances; they will view the late convention as a respectable assembly of men—America probably never will see an assembly of men of a like number, more respectable. But the members of the convention met without knowing the sentiments of one man in ten thousand in these states, respecting the new ground taken. Their doings are but the first attempts in the most important scene ever opened. Though each individual in the state conventions will not, probably, be so respectable as each individual in the federal convention, yet as the state conventions will probably consist of fifteen hundred or two thousand men of abilities, and versed in the science of government, collected from all parts of the community and from all orders of men, it must be acknowledged that the weight of respectability will be in them—In them will be collected the solid sense and the real political character of the country. Being revisers of the subject, they will possess peculiar advantages. To say that these conventions ought not to attempt, coolly and deliberately, the revision of the system, or that they cannot amend it, is very foolish or very assuming. If these conventions, after examining the system, adopt it, I shall be perfectly satisfied, and wish to see men make the administration of the government an equal blessing to all orders of men. I believe the great body of our people to be virtuous and friendly to good government, to the protection of liberty and property; and it is the duty of all good men, especially of those who are placed as centinels to guard their rights—it is their duty to examine into the prevailing politics of parties, and to disclose them—while they avoid exciting undue suspicions, to lay facts before the people, which will enable them to form a proper judgment. Men who wish the people of this country to determine for themselves, and deliberately to fit the government to their situation, must feel some degree of indignation at those attempts to hurry the adoption of a system, and to shut the door against examination. The very attempts create suspicions, that those who make them have secret views, or see some defects in the system, which, in the hurry of affairs, they expect will escape thee ye of a free people.

2.8.63 What can be the views of those gentlemen in Pennsylvania, who precipitated decisions on this subject?[48] What can be the views of those gentlemen in Boston, who countenanced the Printers in shutting up the press against a fair and free investigation of this important system in the usual way.[49] The members of the convention have done their duty—why should some of them fly to their states—almost forget a propriety of behaviour, and precipitate measures for the adoption of a system of their own making? I confess candidly, when I consider these circumstances in connection with the unguarded parts of the system I have mentioned, I feel disposed to proceed with very great caution, and to pay more attention than usual to the conduct of particular characters. If the constitution presented be a good one, it will stand the test with a well informed people: all are agreed there shall be state conventions to examine it; and we must believe it will be adopted, unless we suppose it is a bad one, or that those conventions will make false divisions respecting it. I admit improper measures are taken against the adoption of the system as well [as] for it—all who object to the plan proposed ought to point out the defects objected to, and to propose those amendments with which they can accept it, or to propose some other system of government, that the public mind may be known, and that we may be brought to agree in some system of government, to strengthen and execute the present, or to provide a substitute. I consider the field of enquiry just opened, and that we are to look to the state conventions for ultimate decisions on the subject before us; it is not to be presumed, that they will differ about small amendments, and lose a system when they shall have made it substantially good; but touching the essential amendments, it is to be presumed the several conventions will pursue the most rational measures to agree in and obtain them; and such defects as they shall discover and not remove, they will probably notice, keep them in view as the ground work of future amendments, and in the firm and manly language which every free people ought to use, will suggest to those who may hereafter administer the government, that it is their expectation, that the system will be so organized by legislative acts, and the government so administered, as to render those defects as little injurious as possible. Our countrymen are entitled to an honest and faithful government; to a government of laws and not of men; and also to one of their chusing—as a citizen of the country, I wish to see these objects secured, and licentious, assuming, and overbearing men restrained; if the constitution or social compact be vague and unguarded, then we depend wholly upon the prudence, wisdom and moderation of those who manage the affairs of government; or on what, probably, is equally uncertain and precarious, the success of the people oppressed by the abuse of government, in receiving it from the hands of those who abuse it, and placing it in the hands of those who will use it well.

In every point of view, therefore, in which I have been able, as yet, to 2.8.64 contemplate this subject, I can discern but one rational mode of proceeding relative to it: and that is to examine it with freedom and candour, to have state conventions some months hence, which shall examine coolly every article, clause, and word in the system proposed, and to adopt it with such amendments as they shall think fit. How far the state conventions ought to pursue the mode prescribed by the federal convention of adopting or rejecting the plan in toto, I leave it to them to determine. Our examination of the subject hitherto has been rather of a general nature. The republican characters in the several states, who wish to make this plan more adequate to security of liberty and property, and to the duration of the principles of a free government, will, no doubt, collect their opinions to certain points, and accurately define those alterations and amendments they wish; if it shall be found they essentially disagree in them, the conventions will then be able to determine whether to adopt the plan as it is, or what will be proper to be done.

2.8.65 Under these impressions, and keeping in view the improper and unadvisable lodgment of powers in the general government, organized as it at present is, touching internal taxes, armies and militia, the elections of its own members, causes between citizens of different states, etc. and the want of a more perfect bill of rights, etc. I drop the subject for the present, and when I shall have leisure to revise and correct my ideas respecting it, and to collect into points the opinions of those who wish to make the system more secure and safe, perhaps I may proceed to point out particularly for your consideration, the amendments which ought to be ingrafted into this system, not only in conformity to my own, but the deliberate opinions of others—you will with me perceive, that the objections to the plan proposed may, by a more leisure examination be set in a stronger point of view, especially the important one, that there is no substantial representation of the people provided for in a government in which the most essential powers, even as to the internal police of the country, is proposed to be lodged.

2.8.66 I think the honest and substantial part of the community will wish to see this system altered, permanency and consistency given to the constitution we shall adopt; and therefore they will be anxious to apportion the powers to the features and organization of the government, and to see abuse in the exercise of power more effectually guarded against. It is suggested, that state officers, from interested motives will oppose the constitution presented—I see no reason for this, their places in general will not be effected, but new openings to offices and places of profit must evidently be made by the adoption of the constitution in its present form.

Your's &c.
The Federal Farmer.

[The Additional Letters]

VI

December 25, 1787.

Dear Sir,

2.8.67 My former letters to you, respecting the constitution proposed, were calculated merely to lead to a fuller investigation of the subject; having more extensively considered it, and the opinions of others relative to it, I shall, in a few letters, more particularly endeavour to point out the defects, and propose amendments. I shall in this make only a few general and introductory observations, which, in the present state of the momentous question, may not be improper; and I leave you, in all cases, to decide by a careful examination of my works, upon the weight of my arguments, the propriety of my remarks, the uprightness of my intentions, and the extent of my candor—I presume I am writing to a man of candor and reflection, and not to an ardent, peevish, or impatient man.

When the constitution was first published, there appeared to prevail a misguided zeal to prevent a fair unbiassed examination of a subject of infinite importance to this people and their posterity—to the cause of liberty and the rights of mankind—and it was the duty of those who saw a restless ardor, or design, attempting to mislead the people by a parade of names and misrepresentations, to endeavour to prevent their having their intended effects. The only way to stop the passions of men in their career is, coolly to state facts, and deliberately to avow the truth—and to do this we are frequently forced into a painful view of men and measures. 2.8.68

Since I wrote to you in October, I have heard much said, and seen many pieces written, upon the subject in question; and on carefully examining them on both sides, I find much less reason for changing my sentiments, respecting the good and defective parts of the system proposed than I expected—The opposers, as well as the advocates of it, confirm me in my opinion, that this system affords, all circumstances considered, a better basis to build upon than the confederation. And as to the principal defects, as the smallness of the representation, the insecurity of elections, the undue mixture of powers in the senate, the insecurity of some essential rights, &c. the opposition appears, generally, to agree respecting them, and many of the ablest advocates virtually to admit them—Clear it is, the latter do not attempt manfully to defend these defective parts, but to cover them with a mysterious veil; they concede, they retract; they say we could do no better; and some of them, when a little out of temper, and hard pushed, use arguments that do more honor to their ingenuity, than to their candor and firmness. 2.8.69

Three states have now adopted the constitution without amendments;[50] these, and other circumstances, ought to have their weight in deciding the question, whether we will put the system into operation, adopt it, enumerate and recommend the necessary amendments, which afterwards, by three-fourths of the states, may be ingrafted into the system, or whether we will make the amendments prior to the adoption—I only undertake to shew amendments are essential and necessary—how far it is practicable to ingraft them into the plan, prior to the adoption, the state conventions must determine. Our situation is critical, and we have but our choice of evils—We may hazard much by adopting the constitution in its present form—we may hazard more by rejecting it wholly—we may hazard much by long contending about amendments prior to the adoption. The greatest political evils that 2.8.70 can befal us, are discords and civil wars—the greatest blessings we can wish for, are peace, union, and industry, under a mild, free, and steady government. Amendments recommended will tend to guard and direct the administration—but there will be danger that the people, after the system shall be adopted, will become inattentive to amendments—Their attention is now awake—the discussion of the subject, which has already taken place, has had a happy effect—it has called forth the able advocates of liberty, and tends to renew, in the minds of the people, their true republican jealousy and vigilance, the strongest guard against the abuses of power; but the vigilance of the people is not sufficiently constant to be depended on—Fortunate it is for the body of a people, if they can continue attentive to their liberties, long enough to erect for them a temple, and constitutional barriers for their permanent security: when they are well fixed between the powers of the rulers and the rights of the people, they become visible boundaries, constantly seen by all, and any transgression of them is immediately discovered: they serve as centinels for the people at all times, and especially in those unavoidable intervals of inattention.

2.8.71 Some of the advocates, I believe, will agree to recommend good amendments; but some of them will only consent to recommend indefinite, specious, but unimportant ones; and this only with a view to keep the door open for obtaining, in some favourable moment, their main object, a complete consolidation of the states, and a government much higher toned, less republican and free than the one proposed. If necessity, therefore, should ever oblige us to adopt the system, and recommend amendments, the true friends of a federal republic must see they are well defined, and well calculated, not only to prevent our system of government moving further from republican principles and equality, but to bring it back nearer to them—they must be constantly on their guard against the address, flattery, and manœuvres of their adversaries.

2.8.72 The gentlemen who oppose the constitution, or contend for amendments in it, are frequently, and with much bitterness, charged with wantonly attacking the men who framed it. The unjustness of this charge leads me to make one observation upon the conduct of parties, &c.[51] Some of the advocates are only pretended federalists; in fact they wish for an abolition of the state governments. Some of them I believe to be honest federalists, who wish to preserve substantially the state governments united under an efficient federal head; and many of them are blind tools without any object. Some of the opposers also are only pretended federalists, who want no federal government, or one merely advisory. Some of them are the true federalists, their object, perhaps, more clearly seen, is the same with that of the honest federalists; and some of them, probably, have no distinct object. We might as well call the advocates and opposers tories and whigs, or any thing else, as federalists and anti-federalists. To be for or against the constitution, as it stands, is not much evidence of a federal disposition; if any names are applicable to the parties, on account of their general politics, they are those of republicans and anti-republicans. The opposers are generally men who support the rights of the body of the people, and are properly republicans. The advocates are generally men not very friendly to those rights, and properly anti republicans.

Had the advocates left the constitution, as they ought to have done, to be adopted or rejected on account of its own merits or imperfections, I do not believe the gentlemen who framed it would ever have been even alluded to in the contest by the opposers. Instead of this, the ardent advocates begun by quoting names as incontestible authorities for the implicit adoption of the system, without any examination—treated all who opposed it as friends of anarchy; and with an indecent virulence addressed M[aso]n G[err]y, L[e]e, and almost every man of weight they could find in the opposition by name.[52] If they had been candid men they would have applauded the moderation of the opposers for not retaliating in this pointed manner, when so fair an opportunity was given them; but the opposers generally saw that it was no time to heat the passions; but, at the same time, they saw there was something more than mere zeal in many of their adversaries; they saw them attempting to mislead the people, and to precipitate their divisions, by the sound of names, and forced to do it, the opposers, in general terms, alledged those names were not of sufficient authority to justify the hasty adoption of the system contended for. The convention, as a body, was undoubtedly respectable; it was, generally, composed of members of the then and preceding Congresses: as a body of respectable men we ought to view it. To select individual names, is an invitation to personal attacks, and the advocates, for their own sake, ought to have known the abilities, politics, and situation of some of their favourite characters better, before they held them up to view in the manner they did, as men entitled to our implicit political belief: they ought to have known, whether all the men they so held up to view could, for their past conduct in public offices, be approved or not by the public records, and the honest part of the community. These ardent advocates seem now to be peevish and angry, because, by their own folly, they have led to an investigation of facts and of political characters, unfavourable to them, which they had not the discernment to foresee. They may well apprehend they have opened a door to some Junius,[53] or to some man, after his manner, with his polite addresses to men by name, to state serious facts, and unfold the truth; but these advocates may rest assured, that cool men in the opposition, best acquainted with the affairs of the country, will not, in the critical passage of a people from one constitution to another, pursue inquiries, which, in other circumstances, will be deserving of the highest praise. I will say nothing further about political characters, but examine the constitution; and as a necessary and previous measure to a particular examination, I shall state a few general positions and principles, which receive a general assent, and briefly notice the leading features of the confederation, and several state conventions, to which, through the whole investigation, we must frequently have recourse, to aid the mind in its determinations.

2.8.73

2.8.74 We can put but little dependance on the partial and vague information transmitted to us respecting antient governments; our situation as a people is peculiar: our people in general have a high sense of freedom; they are high spirited, though capable of deliberate measures; they are intelligent, discerning, and well informed; and it is to their condition we must mould the constitution and laws. We have no royal or noble families, and all things concur in favour of a government entirely elective. We have tried our abilities as free men in a most arduous contest, and have succeeded; but we now find the main spring of our movements were the love of liberty, and a temporary ardor, and not any energetic principle in the federal system.[54]

2.8.75 Our territories are far too extensive for a limited monarchy, in which the representatives must frequently assemble, and the laws operate mildly and systematically. The most elligible system is a federal republic, that is, a system in which national concerns may be transacted in the centre, and local affairs in state or district governments.

The powers of the union ought to be extended to commerce, the coin, and national objects; and a division of powers, and a deposit of them in different hands, is safest.

2.8.76 Good government is generally the result of experience and gradual improvements, and a punctual execution of the laws is essential to the preservation of life, liberty, and property. Taxes are always necessary, and the power to raise them can never be safely lodged without checks and limitation, but in a full and substantial representation of the body of the people; the quantity of power delegated ought to be compensated by the brevity of the time of holding it, in order to prevent the possessors increasing it. The supreme power is in the people, and rulers possess only that portion which is expressly given them; yet the wisest people have often declared this is the case on proper occasions, and have carefully formed stipulation to fix the extent, and limit the exercise of the power given.

2.8.77 The people by Magna Charta, &c. did not acquire powers, or receive privileges from the king, they only ascertained and fixed those they were entitled to as Englishmen; the title used by the king "we grant," was mere form. Representation, and the jury trial, are the best features of a free government ever as yet discovered, and the only means by which the body of the people can have their proper influence in the affairs of government.

2.8.78 In a federal system we must not only balance the parts of the same government, as that of the state, or that of the union; but we must find a balancing influence between the general and local governments—the latter is what men or writers have but very little or imperfectly considered.

2.8.79 A free and mild government is that in which no laws can be made without the formal and free consent of the people, or of their constitutional representatives; that is, of a substantial representative branch. Liberty, in its genuine sense, is security to enjoy the effects of our honest industry and labours, in a free and mild government, and personal security from all illegal restraints.

Of rights, some are natural and unalienable, of which even the people cannot deprive individuals: Some are constitutional or fundamental: these cannot be altered or abolished by the ordinary laws; but the people, by express acts, may alter or abolish them—These, such as the trial by jury, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, &c. individuals claim under the solemn compacts of the people, as constitutions, or at least under laws so strengthened by long usuage as not to be repealable by the ordinary legislature—and some are common or mere legal rights, that is, such as individuals claim under laws which the ordinary legislature may alter or abolish at pleasure.[55] 2.8.80

The confederation is a league of friendship among the states or sovereignties for the common defence and mutual welfare—Each state expressly retains its sovereignty, and all powers not expressly given to congress—All federal powers are lodged in a congress of delegates annually elected by the state legislatures, except in Connecticut and Rhode-Island, where they are chosen by the people—Each state has a vote in congress, pays its delegates, and may instruct or recall them; no delegate can hold any office of profit, or serve more than three years in any six years—Each state may be represented by not less than two, or more than seven delegates. 2.8.81

Congress (nine states agreeing) may make peace and war, treaties and alliances, grant letters of marque and reprisal, coin money, regulate the alloy and value of the coin, require men and monies of the states by fixed proportions, and appropriate monies, form armies and navies, emit bills of credit, and borrow monies. 2.8.82

Congress (seven states agreeing) may send and receive ambassadors, regulate captures, make rules for governing the army and navy, institute courts for the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, and for settling territorial disputes between the individual states, regulate weight and measures, post-offices, and Indian affairs. 2.8.83

No state, without the consent of congress, can send or receive embassies, make any agreement with any other state, or a foreign state, keep up any vessels of war or bodies of forces in time of peace, or engage in war, or lay any duties which may interfere with the treaties of congress—Each state must appoint regimental officers, and keep up a well regulated militia—Each state may prohibit the importation or exportation of any species of goods. 2.8.84

The free inhabitants of one state are intitled to the privileges and immunities of the free citizens of the other states—Credit in each state shall be given to the records and judicial proceedings in the others. 2.8.85

Canada, acceding, may be admitted, and any other colony may be admitted by the consent of nine states.

Alterations may be made by the agreement of congress, and confirmation of all the state legislatures.

2.8.86 The following, I think, will be allowed to be unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States:—

No man, demeaning himself peaceably, shall be molested on account of his religion or mode of worship—The people have a right to hold and enjoy their property according to known standing laws, and which cannot be taken from them without their consent, or the consent of their representatives; and whenever taken in the pressing urgencies of government, they are to receive a reasonable compensation for it—Individual security consists in having free recourse to the laws—The people are subject to no laws or taxes not assented to by their representatives constitutionally assembled—They are at all times intitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, the trial by jury in criminal and civil causes—They have a right, when charged, to a speedy trial in the vicinage; to be heard by themselves or counsel, not to be compelled to furnish evidence against themselves, to have witnesses face to face, and to confront their adversaries before the judge—No man is held to answer a crime charged upon him till it be substantially described to him; and he is subject to no unreasonable searches or seizures of his person, papers or effects—The people have a right to assemble in an orderly manner, and petition the government for a redress of wrongs—The freedom of the press ought not to be restrained—No emoluments, except for actual service—No hereditary honors, or orders of nobility, ought to be allowed—The military ought to be subordinate to the civil authority, and no soldier be quartered on the citizens without their consent—The militia ought always to be armed and disciplined, and the usual defence of the country—The supreme power is in the people, and power delegated ought to return to them at stated periods, and frequently—The legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought always to be kept distinct—others perhaps might be added.

2.8.87 The organization of the state governments—Each state has a legislature, an executive, and a judicial branch—In general legislators are excluded from the important executive and judicial offices—Except in the Carolinas there is no constitutional distinction among Christian sects—The constitutions of New York, Delaware, and Virginia, exclude the clergy from offices civil and military—the other states do nearly the same in practice.

2.8.88 Each state has a democratic branch elected twice a-year in Rhode-Island and Connecticut, biennially in South Carolina, and annually in the other states—There are about 1500 representatives in all the states, or one to each 1700 inhabitants, reckoning five blacks for three whites—The states do not differ as to the age or moral characters of the electors or elected, nor materially as to their property.

2.8.89 Pennsylvania has lodged all her legislative powers in a single branch, and Georgia has done the same; the other eleven states have each in their legislatures a second or senatorial branch. In forming this they have combined various principles, and aimed at several checks and balances. It is amazing to see how ingenuity has worked in the several states to fix a barrier against popular instability. In Massachusetts the senators are apportioned on districts according to the taxes they pay, nearly according to property. In Connecticut the freemen, in September, vote for twenty counsellers, and return the names of those voted for in the several towns; the legislature takes the twenty who have the most votes, and give them to the people, who, in April, chuse twelve of them, who, with the governor and deputy governor, form the senatorial branch. In Maryland the senators are chosen by two electors from each county; these electors are chosen by the freemen, and qualified as the members in the democratic branch are: In these two cases checks are aimed at in the mode of election. Several states have taken into view the periods of service, age, property, &c. In South-Carolina a senator is elected for two years, in Delaware three, and in New-York and Virginia four, in Maryland five, and in the other states for one. In New-York and Virginia one-fourth part go out yearly. In Virginia a senator must be twenty-five years old, in South Carolina thirty. In New-York the electors must each have a freehold worth 250 dollars, in North-Carolina a freehold of fifty acres of land; in the other states the electors of senators are qualified as electors of representatives are. In Massachusetts a senator must have a freehold in his own right worth 1000 dollars, or any estate worth 2000, in New-Jersey any estate worth 2666, in South Carolina worth 1300 dollars, in North-Carolina 300 acres of land in fee, &c. The numbers of senators in each state are from ten to thirty-one, about 160 in the eleven states, about one of 14000 inhabitants.

2.8.90 Two states, Massachusetts and New-York, have each introduced into their legislatures a third, but incomplete branch. In the former, the governor may negative any law not supported by two-thirds of the senators, and two-thirds of the representatives: in the latter, the governor, chancellor, and judges of the supreme court may do the same.

2.8.91 Each state has a single executive branch. In the five eastern states the people at large elect their governors; in the other states the legislatures elect them. In South Carolina the governor is elected once in two years; in New-York and Delaware once in three, and in the other states annually. The governor of New-York has no executive council, the other governors have. In several states the governor has a vote in the senatorial branch—the governors have similar powers in some instances, and quite dissimilar ones in others. The number of executive counsellers in the states are from five to twelve. In the four eastern states, New-Jersey, Pennsylvania, and Georgia, they are of the men returned legislators by the people. In Pennsylvania the counsellers are chosen triennially, in Delaware every fourth year, in Virginia every three years, in South-Carolina biennially, and in the other states yearly.

2.9.92 Each state has a judicial branch; each common law courts, superior and inferior; some chancery and admiralty courts: The courts in general sit in different places, in order to accommodate the citizens. The trial by jury is had in all the common law courts, and in some of the admiralty courts. The democratic freemen principally form the juries; men destitute of property, of character, or under age, are excluded as in elections. Some of the judges are during good behaviour, and some appointed for a year, and some for years; and all are dependant on the legislatures for their salaries—Particulars respecting this department are too many to be noticed here.

The Federal Farmer.

VII

December 31, 1787.

Dear Sir,

2.8.93 In viewing the various governments instituted by mankind, we see their whole force reducible to two principles—the important springs which alone move the machines, and give them their intended influence and controul, are force and persuasion: by the former men are compelled, by the latter they are drawn. We denominate a government despotic or free, as the one or other principle prevails in it. Perhaps it is not possible for a government to be so despotic, as not to operate persuasively on some of its subjects; nor is it, in the nature of things, I conceive, for a government to be so free, or so supported by voluntary consent, as never to want force to compel obedience to the laws. In despotic governments one man, or a few men, independant of the people, generally make the laws, command obedience, and inforce it by the sword: one-fourth part of the people are armed, and obliged to endure the fatigues of soldiers, to oppress the others and keep them subject to the laws. In free governments the people, or their representatives, make the laws; their execution is principally the effect of voluntary consent and aid; the people respect the magistrate, follow their private pursuits, and enjoy the fruits of their labour with very small deductions for the public use.[56] The body of the people must evidently prefer the latter species of government; and it can be only those few who may be well paid for the part they take in enforcing despotism, that can, for a moment, prefer the former. Our true object is to give full efficacy to one principle, to arm persuasion on every side, and to render force as little necessary as possible. Persuasion is never dangerous not even in despotic governments; but military force, if often applied internally, can never fail to destroy the love and confidence, and break the spirits, of the people: and to render it totally impracticable and unnatural for him or them who govern, and yield to this force against the people, to hold their places by the peoples' elections.

I repeat my observation, that the plan proposed will have a doubtful operation between the two principles; and whether it will preponderate towards persuasion or force is uncertain.

Government must exist—If the persuasive principle be feeble, force is infallibly the next resort. The moment the laws of congress shall be disregarded they must languish, and the whole system be convulsed—that moment we must have recourse to this next resort, and all freedom vanish. 2.8.94

It being impracticable for the people to assemble to make laws, they must elect legislators, and assign men to the different departments of the government.[57] In the representative branch we must expect chiefly to collect the confidence of the people, and in it to find almost entirely the force of persuasion. In forming this branch, therefore, several important considerations must be attended to. It must possess abilities to discern the situation of the people and of public affairs, a disposition to sympathize with the people, and a capacity and inclination to make laws congenial to their circumstances and condition: it must afford security against interested combinations, corruption and influence; it must possess the confidence, and have the voluntary support of the people. 2.8.95

I think these positions will not be controverted, nor the one I formerly advanced, that a fair and equal representation is that in which the interests, feelings, opinions and views of the people are collected, in such manner as they would be were the people all assembled. Having made these general observations, I shall proceed to consider further my principal position, viz. that there is no substantial representation of the people provided for in a government, in which the most essential powers, even as to the internal police of the country, are proposed to be lodged; and to propose certain amendments as to the representative branch: 1st, That there ought to be an increase of the numbers of representatives: And, 2dly, That the elections of them ought to be better secured. 2.8.96

1.[58] The representation is unsubstantial and ought to be increased. In matters where there is much room for opinion, you will not expect me to establish my positions with mathematical certainty; you must only expect my observations to be candid, and such as are well founded in the mind of the writer. I am in a field where doctors disagree; and as to genuine representation, though no feature in government can be more important, perhaps, no one has been less understood, and no one that has received so imperfect a consideration by political writers. The ephori in Sparta, and the tribunes in Rome, were but the shadow; the representation in Great-Britain is unequal and insecure. In America we have done more in establishing this important branch on its true principles, than, perhaps, all the world besides: yet even here, I conceive, that very great improvements in representation may be made. In fixing this branch, the situation of the people must be surveyed, 2.8.97 and the number of representatives and forms of election apportioned to that situation. When we find a numerous people settled in a fertile and extensive country, possessing equality, and few or none of them oppressed with riches or wants, it ought to be the anxious care of the constitution and laws, to arrest them from national depravity, and to preserve them in their happy condition.[59] A virtuous people make just laws, and good laws tend to preserve unchanged a virtuous people. A virtuous and happy people by laws uncongenial to their characters, may easily be gradually changed into servile and depraved creatures. Where the people, or their representatives, make the laws, it is probable they will generally be fitted to the national character and circumstances, unless the representation be partial, and the imperfect substitute of the people. However, the people may be electors, if the representation be so formed as to give one or more of the natural classes of men in the society an undue ascendency over the others, it is imperfect; the former will gradually become masters, and the latter slaves. It is the first of all among the political balances, to preserve in its proper station each of these classes. We talk of balances in the legislature, and among the departments of government; we ought to carry them to the body of the people. Since I advanced the idea of balancing the several orders of men in a community, in forming a genuine representation, and seen that idea considered as chemerical,[60] I have been sensibly struck with a sentence in the marquis Beccaria's treatise: this sentence was quoted by congress in 1774, and is as follows:—"In every society there is an effort continually tending to confer on one part the height of power and happiness, and to reduce the others to the extreme of weakness and misery; the intent of good laws is to oppose this effort, and to diffuse their influence universally and equally."[61] Add to this Montesquieu's opinion, that "in a free state every man, who is supposed to be a free agent, ought to be concerned in his own government: therefore, the legislative should reside in the whole body of the people, or their representatives."[62] It is extremely clear that these writers had in view the several orders of men in society, which we call aristocratical, democratical, merchantile, mechanic, &c. and perceived the efforts they are constantly, from interested and ambitious views, disposed to make [efforts?] to elevate themselves and oppress others. Each order must have a share in the business of legislation actually and efficiently. It is deceiving a people to tell them they are electors, and can chuse their legislators, if they cannot, in the nature of things, chuse men from among themselves, and genuinely like themselves. I wish you to take another idea along with you; we are not only to balance these natural efforts, but we are also to guard against accidental combinations; combinations founded in the connections of offices and private interests, both evils which are increased in proportion as the number of men, among which the elected must be, are decreased. To set this matter in a proper point of view, we must form some general ideas and descriptions of the different classes of men, as they may be divided by occupations and politically: the first class is the aristocratical. There are three kinds of aristocracy spoken of in this country—the first is a constitutional one, which does not exist in the United States in our common acceptation of the word. Montesquieu, it is true, observes, that where a part of the persons in a society, for want of property, age, or moral character, are excluded any share in the government, the others, who alone are the constitutional electors and elected, form this aristocracy;[63] this, according to him, exists in each of the United States, where a considerable number of persons, as all convicted of crimes, under age, or not possessed of certain property, are excluded any share in the government;—the second is an aristocratic faction; a junto of unprincipled men, often distinguished for their wealth or abilities, who combine together and make their object their private interests and aggrandizement; the existence of this description is merely accidental, but particularly to be guarded against. The third is the natural aristocracy; this term we use to designate a respectable order of men, the line between whom and the natural democracy is in some degree arbitrary; we may place men on one side of this line, which others may place on the other, and in all disputes between the few and the many, a considerable number are wavering and uncertain themselves on which side they are, or ought to be. In my idea of our natural aristocracy in the United States, I include about four or five thousand men; and among these I reckon those who have been placed in the offices of governors, of members of Congress, and state senators generally, in the principal officers of Congress, of the army and militia, the superior judges, the most eminent professional men, &c. and men of large property[64]—the other persons and orders in the community form the natural democracy; this includes in general the yeomanry, the subordinate officers, civil and military, the fishermen, mechanics and traders, many of the merchants and professional men. It is easy to perceive that men of these two classes, the aristocratical, and democratical, with views equally honest, have sentiments widely different, especially respecting public and private expences, salaries, taxes, &c. Men of the first class associate more extensively, have a high sense of honor, possess abilities, ambition, and general knowledge; men of the second class are not so much used to combining great objects; they possess less ambition, and a larger share of honesty: their dependence is principally on middling and small estates, industrious pursuits, and hard labour, while that of the former is principally on the emoluments of large estates, and of the chief offices of government. Not only the efforts of these two great parties are to be balanced, but other interests and parties also, which do not always oppress each other merely for want of power, and for fear of the consequences; though they, in fact, mutually depend on each other; yet such are their general views, that the merchants alone would never fail to make laws favourable to themselves and oppressive to the farmers, &c. the farmers alone would act on like principles; the former would tax the land, the latter the trade. The manufacturers are often disposed to contend for monopolies, buyers make every exertion to lower prices, and sellers to raise them; men who live by fees and salaries endeavour to raise them, and the part of the people who pay them, endeavour to lower them; the public creditors to augment the taxes, and the people at large to lessen them. Thus, in every period of society, and in all the transactions of men, we see parties verifying the observation made by the Marquis; and those classes which have not their centinels in the government, in proportion to what they have to gain or lose, most infallibly be ruined.

2.8.98 Efforts among parties are not merely confined to property; they contend for rank and distinctions; all their passions in turn are enlisted in political controversies—Men, elevated in society, are often disgusted with the changeableness of the democracy, and the latter are often agitated with the passions of jealousy and envy: the yeomanry possess a large share of property and strength, are nervous and firm in their opinions and habits—the mechanics of towns are ardent and changeable, honest and credulous, they are inconsiderable for numbers, weight and strength, not always sufficiently stable for the supporting free governments: the fishing interest partakes partly of the strength and stability of the landed, and partly of the changeableness of the mechanic interest. As to merchants and traders, they are our agents in almost all money transactions; give activity to government, and possess a considerable share of influence in it. It has been observed by an able writer, that frugal industrious merchants are generally advocates for liberty. It is an observation, I believe, well founded, that the schools produce but few advocates for republican forms of government; [65] gentlemen of the law, divinity, physic, &c. probably form about a fourth part of the people; yet their political influence, perhaps, is equal to that of all the other descriptions of men; if we may judge from the appointments to Congress, the legal characters will often, in a small representation, be the majority; but the more the representatives are encreased, the more of the farmers, merchants, &c. will be found to be brought into the government.

2.8.99 These general observations will enable you to discern what I intend by different classes, and the general scope of my ideas, when I contend for uniting and balancing their interests, feelings, opinions, and views in the legislature; we may not only so unite and balance these as to prevent a change in the government by the gradual exaltation of one part to the depression of others, but we may derive many other advantages from the combination and full representation; a small representation can never be well informed as to the circumstances of the people, the members of it must be too far removed from the people, in general, to sympathize with them, and too few to communicate with them: a representation must be extremely imperfect where the representatives are not circumstanced to make the proper communications to their constituents, and where the constituents in turn cannot, with tolerable convenience, make known their wants, circumstances, and opinions, to their representatives; where there is but one representative to 30,000 or 40,000 inhabitants, it appears to me, he can only mix, and be acquainted with a few respectable characters among his constituents, even double the federal representation, and then there must be a very great distance between the representatives and the people in general represented. On the proposed plan, the state of Delaware, the city of Philadelphia, the state of Rhode Island, the province of Main, the county of Suffolk in Massachusetts will have one representative each; there can be but little personal knowledge, or but few communications, between him and the people at large of either of those districts. It has been observed, that mixing only with the respectable men, he will get the best information and ideas from them; he will also receive impressions favourable to their purposes particularly. Many plausible shifts have been made to divert the mind from dwelling on this defective representation, these I shall consider in another place.[66]

Could we get over all our difficulties respecting a balance of interests and party efforts, to raise some and oppress others, the want of sympathy, information and intercourse between the representatives and the people, an insuperable difficulty will still remain, I mean the constant liability of a small number of representatives to private combinations; the tyranny of the one, or the licentiousness of the multitude, are, in my mind, but small evils, compared with the factions of the few. It is a consideration well worth pursuing, how far this house of representatives will be liable to be formed into private juntos, how far influenced by expectations of appointments and offices, how far liable to be managed by the president and senate, and how far the people will have confidence in them. To obviate difficulties on this head, as well as objections to the representative branch, generally, several observations have been made—these I will now examine, and if they shall appear to be unfounded, the objections must stand unanswered. 2.8.100

That the people are the electors, must elect good men, and attend to the administration. 2.8.101

It is said that the members of Congress, at stated periods, must return home, and that they must be subject to the laws they may make, and to a share of the burdens they may impose.

That the people possess the strong arm to overawe their rulers, and the best checks in their national character against the abuses of power, that the supreme power will remain in them.

That the state governments will form a part of, and a balance in the system.

That Congress will have only a few national objects to attend to, and the state governments many and local ones.

That the new Congress will be more numerous than the present, and that any numerous body is unwieldy and mobbish.

That the states only are represented in the present Congress, and that the people will require a representation in the new one that in fifty or an hundred years the representation will be numerous.

That congress will have no temptation to do wrong; and that no system to enslave the people is practicable.

That as long as the people are free they will preserve free governments; and that when they shall become tired of freedom, arbitrary government must take place.

These observations I shall examine in the course of my letters; and, I think, not only shew that they are not well founded, but point out the fallacy of some of them; and shew that others do not very well comport with the dignified and manly sentiments of a free and enlightened people.

The Federal Farmer.

VIII

January 3, 1788.

Dear Sir,

2.8.102 Before I proceed to examine the objections, I beg leave to add a valuable idea respecting representation, to be collected from De Lome, and other able writers, which essentially tends to confirm my positions: They very justly impute the establishment of general and equal liberty in England to a balance of interests and powers among the different orders of men; aided by a series of fortunate events, that never before, and possibly never again will happen.[67]

2.8.103 Before the Norman conquest the people of England enjoyed much of this liberty. The first of the Norman kings, aided by foreign mercenaries and foreign attendants, obnoxious to the English, immediately laid arbitrary taxes, and established arbitrary courts, and severely oppress[ed] all orders of people: The barons and people, who recollected their former liberties, were induced, by those oppressions, to unite their efforts in their common defence: Here it became necessary for the great men, instead of deceiving and depressing the people, to enlighten and court them; the royal power was too strongly fixed to be annihilated, and rational means were, therefore directed to limiting it within proper bounds. In this long and arduous task, in this new species of contests, the barons and people succeeded, because they had been freemen, and knew the value of the object they were contending for; because they were the people of a small island—one people who found it practicable to meet and deliberate in one assembly, and act under one system of resolves, and who were not obliged to meet in different provincial assemblies, as is the case in large countries, as was the case in France, Spain, &c. where their determinations were inconsistent with each other, and where the king could play off one assembly against another.

2.8.104 It was in this united situation the people of England were for several centuries, enabled to combine their exertions, and by compacts, as Magna Charta, a bill of rights, &c. were able to limit, by degrees, the royal prerogatives, and establish their own liberties. The first combination was, probably, the accidental effect of pre-existing circumstances; but there was an admirable balance of interests in it, which has been the parent of English liberty, and excellent regulations enjoyed since that time. The executive power having been uniformly in the king, and he the visible head of the nation, it was chimerical for the greatest lord or most popular leader, consistent with the state of the government, and opinion of the people, to seriously think of becoming the king's rival, or to aim at even a share of the executive power; the greatest subject's prospect was only in acquiring a respectable influence in the house of commons, house of lords, or in the ministry; circumstances at once made it the interests of the leaders of the people to stand by them. Far otherwise was it with the ephori in Sparta, and tribunes in Rome. The leaders in England have led the people to freedom, in almost all other countries to servitude. The people in England have made use of deliberate exertions, their safest and most efficient weapons. In other countries they have often acted like mobs, and been enslaved by their enemies, or by their own leaders. In England, the people have been led uniformly, and systematically by their representatives to secure their rights by compact, and to abolish innovations upon the government: they successively obtained Magna Charta, the powers of taxation, the power to propose laws, the habeas corpus act, bill of rights, &c. they, in short, secured general and equal liberty, security to their persons and property; and, as an everlasting security and bulwark of their liberties, they fixed the democratic branch in the legislature, and jury trial in the execution of the laws, the freedom of the press, etc.

2.8.105 In Rome, and most other countries, the reverse of all this is true. In Greece, Rome, and wherever the civil law has been adopted, torture has been admitted. In Rome the people were subject to arbitrary confiscations, and even their lives would be arbitrarily disposed of by consuls, tribunes, dictators, masters, &c. half of the inhabitants were slaves, and the other half never knew what equal liberty was; yet in England the people have had king, lords, and commons; in Rome they had consuls, senators and tribunes: why then was the government of England so mild and favorable to the body of the people, and that of Rome an ambitious and oppressive aristocracy? Why in England have the revolutions always ended in stipulations in favour of general liberty, equal laws, and the common rights of the people and in most other countries in favour only of a few influential men? The reasons, in my mind, are obvious: In England the people have been substantially represented in many respects; in the other countries it has not been so. Perhaps a small degree of attention to a few simple facts will illustrate this.—In England, from the oppressions of the Norman kings to the revolution in 1688, during which period of two or three hundred years, the English liberties were ascertained and established, the aristocratic part of that nation was substantially represented by a very large number of nobles, possessing similar interests and feelings with those they represented. The body of the people, about four or five millions, then mostly a frugal landed people, were represented by about five hundred representatives, taken not from the order of men which formed the aristocracy, but from the body of the people, and possessed of the same interests and feelings. De Lome, speaking of the British representation, expressly founds all his reasons on this union; this similitude of interests, feelings, views and circumstances. He observes, the English have preserved their liberties, because they and their leaders or representatives have been strictly united in interests, and in contending for general liberty.[68] Here we see a genuine balance founded in the actual state of things. The whole community, probably, not more than two-fifths more numerous than we now are, were represented by seven or eight hundred men; the barons stipulated with the common people, and the king with the whole. Had the legal distinction between lords and commons been broken down, and the people of that island been called upon to elect forty-five senators, and one hundred and twenty representatives, about the proportion we propose to establish, their whole legislature evidently would have been of the natural aristocracy, and the body of the people would not have had scarcely a single sincere advocate; their interests would have been neglected, general and equal liberty forgot, and the balance lost; contests and conciliations, as in most other countries, would have been merely among the few, and as it might have been necessary to serve their purposes, the people at large would have been flattered or threatened, and probably not a single stipulation made in their favour.

2.8.106 In Rome the people were miserable, though they had three orders, the consuls, senators and tribunes, and approved the laws, and all for want of a genuine representation. The people were too numerous to assemble, and do any thing properly themselves; the voice of a few, the dupes of artifice, was called the voice of the people. It is difficult for the people to defend themselves against the arts and intrigues of the great, but by selecting a suitable number of men fixed to their interests to represent them, and to oppose ministers and senators. And the people's all depends on the number of the men selected, and the manner of doing it. To be convinced of this, we need only attend to the reason of the case, the conduct of the British commons, and of the Roman tribunes: equal liberty prevails in England, because there was a representation of the people, in fact and reality, to establish it; equal liberty never prevailed in Rome, because there was but the shadow of a representation. There were consuls in Rome annually elected to execute the laws; several hundred senators represented the great families; the body of the people annually chose tribunes from among themselves to defend them and to secure their rights; I think the number of tribunes annually chosen never exceeded ten. This representation, perhaps, was not proportionally so numerous as the representation proposed in the new plan; but the difference will not appear to be so great, when it shall be recollected, that these tribunes were chosen annually; that the great patrician families were not admitted to these offices of tribunes, and that the people of Italy who elected the tribunes were a long while, if not always, a small people compared with the people of the United States. What was the consequence of this triffling representation? The people of Rome always elected for their tribunes men conspicuous for their riches, military commands, professional popularity, &c. great commoners, between whom and the noble families there was only the shadowy difference of legal distinction. Among all the tribunes the people chose for several centuries, they had scarcely five real friends to their interests. These tribunes lived, felt and saw, not like the people, but like the great patrician families, like senators and great officers of state, to get into which it was evident, by their conduct, was their sole object. These tribunes often talked about the rights and prerogatives of the people, and that was all; for they never even attempted to establish equal liberty: so far from establishing the rights of the people, they suffered the senate, to the exclusion of the people, to engross the powers of taxation; those excellent and almost only real weapons of defence even the people of England possess. The tribunes obtained that the people should be eligible to some of the great offices of state, and marry, if they pleased, into the noble families; these were advantages in their nature, confined to a few elevated commoners, and of triffling importance to the people at large. Nearly the same observations may be made as to the ephori of Sparta.

We may amuse ourselves with names; but the fact is, men will be governed by the motives and temptations that surround their situation. Political evils to be guarded against are in the human character, and not in the name of patrician or plebian. Had the people of Italy, in the early period of the republic, selected yearly, or biennially, four or five hundred of their best informed men, emphatically from among themselves, these representatives would have formed an honest respectable assembly, capable of combining in them the views and exertions of the people, and their respectability would have procured them honest and able leaders, and we should have seen equal liberty established. True liberty stands in need of a fostering hand; from the days of Adam she has found but one temple to dwell in securely; she has laid the foundation of one, perhaps her last, in America; whether this is to be compleated and have duration, is yet a question. Equal liberty never yet 2.8.107 found many advocates among the great: it is a disagreeable truth, that power perverts mens views in a greater degree, than public employments inform their understandings—they become hardened in certain maxims, and more lost to fellow feelings. Men may always be too cautious to commit alarming and glaring iniquities; but they, as well as systems, are liable to be corrupted by slow degrees. Junius well observes, we are not only to guard against what men will do, but even against what they may do.[69] Men in high public offices are in stations where they gradually lose sight of the people, and do not often think of attending to them, except when necessary to answer private purposes.

2.8.108 The body of the people must have this true representative security placed some where in the nation; and in the United States, or in any extended empire, I am fully persuaded can be placed no where, but in the forms of a federal republic, where we can divide and place it in several state or district legislatures, giving the people in these the means of opposing heavy internal taxes and oppressive measures in the proper stages. A great empire contains the amities and animosities of a world within itself.[70] We are not like the people of England, one people compactly settled on a small island, with a great city filled with frugal merchants, serving as a common centre of liberty and union: we are dispersed, and it is impracticable for any but the few to assemble in one place: the few must be watched, checked, and often resisted—tyranny has ever shewn a prediliction to be in close amity with them, or the one man. Drive it from kings and it flies to senators, to dicemvirs, to dictators, to tribunes, to popular leaders, to military chiefs, &c.

2.8.109 De Lome well observes, that in societies, laws which were to be equal to all are soon warped to the private interests of the administrators, and made to defend the usurpations of a few.[71] The English, who had tasted the sweets of equal laws, were aware of this, and though they restored their king, they carefully delegated to parliament the advocates of freedom.

2.8.110 I have often lately heard it observed, that it will do very well for a people to make a constitution, and ordain, that at stated periods they will chuse, in a certain manner, a first magistrate, a given number of senators and representatives, and let them have all power to do as they please.[72] This doctrine, however it may do for a small republic, as Connecticut, for instance, where the people may chuse so many senators and representatives to assemble in the legislature, in an eminent degree, the interests, the views, feelings, and genuine sentiments of the people themselves, can never be admitted in an extensive country; and when this power is lodged in the hands of a few, not to limit the few, is but one step short of giving absolute power to one man—in a numerous representation the abuse of power is a common injury, and has no temptation—among the few, the abuse of power may often operate to the private emolument of those who abuse it.

The Federal Farmer.

IX

January 4. 1788.

Dear Sir,

The advocates of the constitution say we must trust to the administration, and elect good men for representatives. I admit, that in forming the social compact, we can fix only general principles, and, of necessity, must trust something to the wisdom and integrity of the administration. But the question is, do we not trust too much, and to men also placed in the vortex of temptation, to lay hold of proffered advantages for themselves and their connections, and to oppress the body of the people. 2.8.111

It is one thing to authorise a well organized legislature to make laws, under the restraints of a well guarded constitution, and another to assemble a few men, and to tell them to do what they please. I am not the more shaken in my principles, or disposed to despair of the cause of liberty, because some of our able men have adopted the yielding language of non-resistance, and writers dare insult the people with the signatures of Caesar, Mark Antony, and of other tyrants; because I see even moderate and amiable men, forced to let go of monarchy in 1775, still in love with it, to use the simile of our countrymen, when the political pot boils, the skum will often get uppermost and make its appearance. I believe the people of America, when they shall fully understand any political subject brought before them, will talk in a very different stile, and use the manly language of freedom. 2.8.112

But "the people must elect good men:"—Examine the system, Is it practicable for them to elect fit and proper representatives where the number is so small? "But the people may chuse whom they please."[73] This is an observation, I believe, made without due attention to facts and the state of the community. To explain my meaning, I will consider the descriptions of men commonly presented to the people as candidates for the offices of representatives—we may rank them in three classes: 1. The men who form the natural aristocracy, as before defined. 2. Popular demagogues: these men also are often politically elevated, so as to be seen by the people through the extent of large districts; they often have some abilities, without principle, and rise into notice by their noise and arts. 3. The substantial and respectable part of the democracy: they are a numerous and valuable set of men, who discern and judge well, but from being generally silent in public assemblies are often overlooked: they are the most substantial and best informed men in the several towns, who occasionally fill the middle grades of offices, &c. who hold not a splendid, but a respectable rank in private concerns: these men are extensively diffused through all the counties, towns, and small districts in the union; even they, and their immediate connections, are raised above the majority of the people, and as representatives are only brought to a level with a more numerous part of the commu- 2.8.113

nity, the middle orders, and a degree nearer the mass of the people. Hence it is that the best practical representation, even in a small state, must be several degrees more aristocratical than the body of the people. A representation so formed as to admit but few or none of the third class, is, in my opinion, not deserving of the name—even in armies, courts-martial are so formed as to admit subaltern officers into them. The true idea is, so to open and enlarge the representation as to let in a due proportion of the third class with those of the first. Now, my opinion is, that the representation proposed is so small as that ordinarily very few or none of them can be elected; and, therefore, after all the parade of words and forms the government must possess the soul of aristocracy, or something worse, the spirit of popular leaders.

2.8.114 I observed in a former letter, that the state of Delaware[,] of Rhode-Island[,] the Province of Main, and each of the great counties in Massachusetts &c. would have one member, and rather more than one when the representatives shall be increased to one for each 30,000 inhabitants.[74] In some districts the people are more dispersed and unequal than in others: In Delaware they are compact, in the Province of Main dispersed; how can the elections in either of those districts be regulated so as that a man of the third class can be elected?—Exactly the same principles and motives, the same uncontroulable circumstances, must govern the elections as in the choice of the governors. Call upon the people of either of those districts to chuse a governor, and it will, probably, never happen that they will not bestow a major part, or the greatest number, of their votes on some very conspicuous or very popular character. A man that is known among a few thousands of people, may be quite unknown among thirty or forty thousand. On the whole, it appears to me to be almost a self-evident position, that when we call on thirty or forty thousand inhabitants to unite in giving their votes for one man, it will be uniformly impracticable for them to unite in any men, except those few who have became eminent for their civil or military rank, or their popular legal abilities: it will be found totally impracticable for men in the private walks of life, except in the profession of the law, to become conspicuous enough to attract the notice of so many electors and have their suffrages.[75]

2.8.115 But if I am right, it is asked why so many respectable men advocate the adoption of the proposed system. Several reasons may be given—many of our gentlemen are attached to the principles of monarchy and aristocracy; they have an aversion to democratic republics. The body of the people have acquired large powers and substantial influence by the revolution. In the unsettled state of things, their numerous representatives, in some instances, misused their powers and have induced many good men suddenly to adopt ideas unfavourable to such republics, and which ideas they will discard on reflection. Without scrutinizing into the particulars of the proposed system, we immediately perceive that its general tendency is to collect the powers of government, now in the body of the people in reality, and to place them in the higher orders and fewer hands; no wonder then that all those of and about these orders are attached to it; they feel there is something in this system advantageous to them. On the other hand, the body of the people evidently feel there is something wrong and disadvantageous to them; both descriptions perceive there is something tending to bestow on the former the height of power and happiness, and to reduce the latter to weakness, insignificance, and misery. The people evidently feel all this though they want expressions to convey their ideas. Further, even the respectable part of the democracy, have never yet been able to distinguish clearly where the fallacy lies; they find there are defects in the confederation; they see a system presented, they think something must be done; and, while their minds are in suspence, the zealous advocates force a reluctant consent. Nothing can be a stronger evidence of the nature of this system, than the general sense of the several orders in the community respecting its tendency: the parts taken generally by them proves my position, that notwithstanding the parade of words and forms, the government must possess the soul of aristocracy.

Congress, heretofore, have asked for moderate additional powers, the cry was give them—be federal: but the proper distinction between the cases that produce this disposition, and the system proposed, has not been fairly made and seen in all its consequences. We have seen some of our state representations too numerous and without examining a medium we run into the opposite extreme. It is true, the proper number of federal representatives, is matter of opinion in some degree: but there are extremes which we immediately perceive, and others, which we clearly discover on examination. We should readily pronounce a representative branch of 15 members small in a federal government, having complete powers as to taxes, military matters, commerce, the coin, &c &c. On the other hand, we should readily pronounce a federal representation as numerous as those of the several states, consisting of about 1500 representatives, unwieldly and totally improper. It is asked, has not the wisdom of the convention found the medium? perhaps not: The convention was divided on this point of numbers: at least some of its ablest members urged, that instead of 65 representatives there ought to be 130 in the first instance: They fixed one representative for each 40,000 inhabitants, and at the close of the work, the president suggested, that the representation appeared to be too small and without debate, it was put at, not exceeding one for each 30,000. I mention these facts to shew, that the convention went on no fixed data. In this extensive country it is difficult to get a representation sufficiently numerous: Necessity, I believe, will oblige us to sacrifice in some degree the true genuine principles of representation. But this sacrifice ought to be as little as possible: How far we ought to increase the representation I will not pretend to say; but that we ought to increase it very considerably, is clear—to double it at least, making full allowances for the state representations: and this we may evidently do, and approach accordingly towards safety and perfection, without encountering any inconveniences. It is with great difficulty the people can unite these different interests and views even tolerably, in the state senators, who are more than twice as numerous as the federal representatives, as proposed by the convention; even these senators are considered as so far removed from the people, that they are not allowed immediately to hold their purse strings.

2.8.116

2.8.117 The principle objections made to the increase of the representation are, the expence and difficulty in getting the members to attend.[76] The first cannot be important; the last, if founded, is against any federal government. As to the expence, I presume, the house of representatives will not be in sessions more than four months in the year. We find by experience, that about two-thirds of the members of representative assemblies usually attend; therefore, of the representation proposed by the convention, about forty five members probably will attend, doubling their number, about 90 will probably attend: their pay, in one case, at four dollars a day each (which is putting it high enough) will amount to, yearly, 21,600 dollars; in the other case, 43,200 dollars: difference 21,600 dollars;—reduce the state representatives from 1500 down to 1000, and thereby save the attendance of two-thirds of the 500, say three months in a year at one dollar and a quarter a day each: 37,125 dollars. Thus we may leave the state representations sufficient large, and yet save enough by the reduction nearly to support exceeding well the whole federal representation I propose. Surely we never can be so unwise as to sacrifice, essentially, the all-important principles of representation for so small a sum as 21,600 dollars a year for the United States; a single company of soldiers would cost this sum. It is a fact that can easily be shewn, that we expend three times this sum every year upon useless inferior offices and very triffling concerns. It is also a fact which can be shewn, that the United States in the late war suffered more by a faction in the federal government, than the pay of the federal representation will amount to for twenty years.

2.8.118 As to the attendance—Can we be so unwise as to establish an unsafe and inadequate representative branch, and give it as a reason, that we believe only a few members will be induced to attend; we ought certainly to establish an adequate representative branch, and adopt measures to induce an attendance; I believe that a due proportion of 130 or 140 members may be induced to attend: there are various reasons for the non-attendance of the members of the present congress; it is to be presumed that these will not exist under the new system.

To compensate for the want of a genuine representation in a government, where the purse and sword, and all important powers, are proposed to be lodged, a variety of unimportant things are enumerated by the advocates of it.

2.8.119 In the second place, it is said the members of congress must return home, and share in the burdens they may impose; and, therefore, private motives will induce them to make mild laws, to support liberty, and ease the burdens of the people:[77] this brings us to a mere question of interest under this head.

I think these observations will appear, on examination, altogether fallacious; because this individual interest, which may coincide with the rights and interests of the people, will be far more than balanced by opposite motives and opposite interests. If, on a fair calculation, a man will gain more by measures oppressive to others than he will lose by them, he is interested in their adoption. It is true, that those who govern, generally, by increasing the public burdens increase their own share of them; but by this increase they may, and often do, increase their salaries, fees, and emoluments, in a ten-fold proportion, by increasing salaries, forming armies and navies, and by making offices—If it shall appear the members of congress will have these temptations before them, the argument is on my side—they will view the account, and be induced continually to make efforts advantageous to themselves and connections, and oppressive to others.

We must examine facts—Congress, in its present form, have but few 2.8.120 offices to dispose of worth the attention of the members, or of men of the aristocracy; yet, from 1774 to this time, we find a large proportion of those offices assigned to those who were or had been members of congress, and though the states chuse annually sixty or seventy members, many of them have been provided for: but few men are known to congress in this extensive country, and, probably, but few will be to the president and senate, except those who have or shall appear as members of congress, or those whom the members may bring forward. The states may now chuse yearly ninety-one members of congress; under the new constitution they will have it in their power to chuse exactly the same number, perhaps afterwards, one hundred and fifteen, but these must be chosen once in two and six years; so that, in the course of ten years together, not more than two-thirds so many members of congress will be elected and brought into view, as there now are under the confederation in the same term of time: but at least there will be five, if not ten times, as many offices and places worthy the attention of the members, under the new constitution, as there are under the confederation: therefore, we may fairly presume, that a very great proportion of the members of congress, especially the influential ones, instead of returning to private life, will be provided for with lucrative offices, in the civil or military department, and not only the members, but many of their sons, friends, and connection. These offices will be in the constitutional disposition of the president and senate, and, corruption out of the question, what kind of security can we expect in a representation, so many of the members of which may rationally feel themselves candidates for these offices?—let common sense decide. It is true, that members chosen to offices must leave their seats in congress, and to some few offices they cannot be elected till the time shall be expired for which they were elected members; but this scarcely will effect the biass arising from the hopes and expectations of office.

It is not only in this point of view, the members of congress, by their 2.8.121 efforts, may make themselves and friends powerful and happy, while the people may be oppressed: but there is another way in which they may soon warp laws, which ought to be equal, to their own advantages, by those imperceptible means, and on those doubtful principles which may not alarm. No society can do without taxes; they are the efficient means of safety and defence, and they too have often been the weapons by which the blessings of society have been destroyed. Congress will have power to lay taxes at pleasure for the general welfare; and if they mis-judge of the general welfare, and lay unnecessary oppressive taxes, the constitution will provide, as I shall hereafter shew, no remedy for the people or states—the people must bear them, or have recourse, not to any constitutional checks or remedies, but to that resistence which is the last resort, and founded in self-defence.[78]

2.8.122 It is well stipulated, that all duties, imposts, and excises shall be equal; and that direct taxes shall be apportioned on the several states by a fixed rule, but nothing further. Here commences a dangerous power in matters of taxation, lodged without any regard to the balance of interests of the different orders of men, and without any regard to the internal policy of the states. Congress having assigned to any state its quota, say to New-Jersey, 80,000 dollars in a given tax, congress will be entirely at liberty to apportion that sum on the counties and towns, polls, lands, houses, labour, &c. and appoint the assessors and collectors in that state in what manner they please; there will be nothing to prevent a system of tax laws being made, unduly to ease some descriptions of men and burden others: though such a system may be unjust and injudicious, though we may complain, the answer will be, congress have the power delegated by the people, and, probably, congress has done what it thought best.

2.8.123 By the confederation taxes must be quotaed on the several states by fixed rules, as before mentioned: but then each state's quota is apportioned on the several numbers and classes of citizens in the state, by the state legislature, assessed and collected by state laws. Great pains have been taken to counfound the two cases, which are as distinct as light and darkness; this I shall endeavour to illustrate, when I come to the amendment respecting internal taxes. I shall only observe, at present, that in the state legislatures the body of the people will be genuinely represented, and in congress not; that the right of resisting oppressive measures is inherent in the people, and that a constitutional barrier should be so formed, that their genuine representatives may stop an oppressive ruinous measure in its early progress, before it shall come to maturity, and the evils of it become in a degree fixed.

2.8.124 It has lately been often observed, that the power or body of men intrusted with the national defence and tranquility, must necessarily possess the purse unlimitedly, that the purse and sword must go together[79]—this is new doctrine in a free country, and by no means tenable. In the British government the king is particularly intrusted with the national honor and defence, but the commons solely hold the purse. I think I have amply shewn that the representation in congress will be totally inadequate in matters of taxation,

&c. and, therefore, that the ultimate controul over the purse must be lodged elsewhere.

We are not to expect even honest men rigidly to adhere to the line of strict impartiality, where the interest of themselves or friends is particularly concerned; if we do expect it, we shall deceive ourselves, and make a wrong estimate of human nature. 2.8.125

But it is asked how shall we remedy the evil, so as to complete and perpetuate the temple of equal laws and equal liberty? Perhaps we never can do it. Possibly we never may be able to do it in this immense country, under any one system of laws however modified; nevertheless, at present, I think the experiment worth a making. I feel an aversion to the disunion of the states, and to separate confederacies; the states have fought and bled in a common cause, and great dangers too may attend these confederacies. I think the system proposed capable of very considerable degrees of perfection, if we pursue first principles. I do not think that De Lome, or any writer I have seen, has sufficiently pursued the proper inquiries and efficient means for making representation and balances in government more perfect; it is our task to do this in America. Our object is equal liberty, and equal laws diffusing their influence among all orders of men; to obtain this we must guard against the biass of interest and passions, against interested combinations, secret or open; we must aim at a balance of efforts and strength.

Clear it is, by increasing the representation we lessen the prospects of each member of congress being provided for in public offices; we proportionably lessen official influence and strengthen his prospects of becoming a private citizen, subject to the common burdens, without the compensation of the emoluments of office. By increasing the representation we make it more difficult to corrupt and influence the members; we diffuse them more extensively among the body of the people, perfect the balance, multiply information, strengthen the confidence of the people, and consequently support the laws on equal and free principles. There are two other ways, I think, of obtaining in some degree the security we want; the one is, by excluding more extensively the members from being appointed to offices; the other is, by limiting some of their powers; but these two I shall examine hereafter. 2.8.126

The Federal Farmer.

X

January 7, 1788.

Dear Sir,

It is said that our people have a high sense of freedom, possess power, property, and the strong arm; meaning, I presume, that the body of the 2.8.127 people can take care of themselves, and awe their rulers; and, therefore, particular provision in the constitution for their security may not be essential.[80] When I come to examine these observations, they appear to me too triffling and loose to deserve a serious answer.

2.8.128 To palliate for the smallness of the representation, it is observed, that the state governments in which the people are fully represented, necessarily form a part of the system.[81] This idea ought to be fully examined. We ought to enquire if the convention have made the proper use of these essential parts; the state governments then we are told will stand between the arbitrary exercise of power and the people: true they may, but armless and helpless, perhaps, with the privilege of making a noise when hurt—this is no more than individuals may do. Does the constitution provide a single check for a single measure, by which the state governments can constitutionally and regularly check the arbitrary measures of congress?[82] Congress may raise immediately fifty thousand men, and twenty millions of dollars in taxes, build a navy, model the militia, &c. and all this constitutionally. Congress may arm on every point, and the state governments can do no more than an individual, by petition to congress, suggest their measures are alarming and not right.

2.8.129 I conceive the position to be undeniable, that the federal government will be principally in the hands of the natural aristocracy, and the state governments principally in the hands of the democracy, the representatives of the body of the people. These representatives in Great-Britain hold the purse, and have a negative upon all laws. We must yield to circumstances, and depart something from this plan, and strike out a new medium, so as to give efficacy to the whole system, supply the wants of the union, and leave the several states, or the people assembled in the state legislatures, the means of defence.

2.8.130 It has been often mentioned, that the objects of congress will be few and national, and require a small representation; that the objects of each state will be many and local, and require a numerous representation.[83] This circumstance has not the weight of a feather in my mind. It is certainly unadvisable to lodge in 65 representatives, and 26 senators, unlimited power to establish systems of taxation, armies, navies, model the militia, and to do every thing that may essentially tend soon to change, totally, the affairs of the community; and to assemble 1500 state representatives, and 160 senators, to make fence laws, and laws to regulate the descent and conveyance of property, the administration of justice between man and man, to appoint militia officers, &c.

2.8.131 It is not merely the quantity of information I contend for. Two taxing powers may be inconvenient; but the point is, congress, like the senate of Rome, will have taxing powers, and the people no check—when the power is abused, the people may complain and grow angry, so may the state governments; they may remonstrate and counteract, by passing laws to prohibit the collection of the congressional taxes; but these will be acts of the people, acts of sovereign power, the denier resort unknown to the constitution; acts operating in terrorum, acts of resistence, and not the exercise of any constitutional power to stop or check a measure before matured: a check properly is the stopping, by one branch in the same legislature, a measure proposed by the other in it. In fact the constitution provides for the states no check, properly speaking, upon the measures of congress—Congress can immediately enlist soldiers, and apply to the pockets of the people.

These few considerations bring us to the very strong distinction between 2.8.132 the plan that operates on federal principles, and the plan that operates on consolidated principles. A plan may be federal or not as to its organization; each state may retain its vote or not; the sovereignty of the state may be represented, or the people of it. A plan may be federal or not as to its operations—federal when it requires men and monies of the states, and the states as such make the laws for raising the men and monies—Not federal, when it leaves the states governments out of the question, and operates immediately upon the persons and property of the citizens. The first is the case with the confederation, the second with the new plan: in the first the state governments may be check, in the last none at all. This distinction I shall pursue further hereafter, under the head before mentioned, of amendments as to internal taxes.[84] And here I shall pursue a species of checks which writers have not often noticed.

To excuse the smallness of the representation, it is said the new congress 2.8.133 will be more numerous than the old one.[85] This is not true; and for the facts I refer you to my letter of the 4th instant, to the plan and confederation; besides there is no kind of similitude between the two plans. The confederation is a mere league of the states, and congress is formed with the particular checks, and possess the united powers, enumerated in my letter of the 25th ult. The new plan is totally a different thing: a national government to many purposes administered, by men chosen for two, four, and six years, not recallable, and among whom there will be no rotation; operating immediately in all money and military matters, &c. on the persons and property of the citizens—I think, therefore, that no part of the confederation ought to be adduced for supporting or injuring the new constitution. It is also said that the constitution gives no more power to congress than the confederation, respecting money and military matters; that congress, under the confederation, may require men and monies to any amount, and the states are bound to comply. This is generally true; but, I think, I shall in a subsequent letter satisfactorily prove, that the states have well founded checks for securing their liberties.[86]

I admit the force of the observation, that all the federal powers, by the 2.8.134 confederation, are lodged in a single assembly; however, I think much more may be said in defence of the leading principles of the confederation. I do not object to the qualifications of the electors of representatives, and I fully agree that the people ought to elect one branch.

2.8.135 Further, it may be observed, that the present congress is principally an executive body, which ought not to be numerous; that the house of representatives will be a mere legislative branch, and being the democratic one, ought to be numerous. It is one of the greatest advantages of a government of different branches, that each branch may be conveniently made conformable to the nature of the business assigned it, and all be made conformable to the condition of the several orders of the people. After all the possible checks and limitations we can devise, the powers of the union must be very extensive; the sovereignty of the nation cannot produce the object in view, the defence and tranquility of the whole, without such powers, executive and judicial. I dislike the present congress a single, assembly, because it is impossible to fit it to receive those powers: the executive and judicial powers, in the nature of things, ought to be lodged in a few hands, the legislature in many hands; therefore, want of safety, and unavoidable hasty measures, out of the question, they never can all be lodged in one assembly properly—it, in its very formation, must imply a contradiction.

2.8.136 In objection to increasing the representation, it has also been observed, that it is difficult to assemble a hundred men or more without making them tumultuous and a mere mob;[87] reason and experience do not support this observation. The most respectable assemblies we have any knowledge of and the wisest, have been those, each of which consisted of several hundred members; as the senate of Rome, of Carthage, of Venice, the British Parliament, &c. &c. I think I may without hazarding much, affirm, that our more numerous state assemblies and conventions have universally discovered more wisdom, and as much order, as the less numerous ones: There must be also a very great difference between the characters of two or three hundred men assembled from a single state, and the characters of the number or half the number assembled from all the united states.

2.8.137 It is added, that on the proposed plan the house of representatives in fifty or a hundred years, will consist of several hundred members:[88] The plan will begin with sixty-five, and we have no certainty that the number ever will be encreased, for this plain reason—that all that combination of interests and influence which has produced this plan, and supported so far, will constantly oppose the increase of the representation, knowing that thereby the government will become more free and democratic: But admitting, after a few years, there will be a member for each 30,000 inhabitants, the observation is trifling, the government is in a considerable measure to take its tone from its early movements, and by means of a small representation it may in half of 50 or 100 years, get moved from its basis, or at least so far as to be incapable of ever being recovered. We ought, therefore, on every principle now to fix the government on proper principles, and fit to our present condition—when the representation shall become too numerous, alter it; or we may now make provision, that when the representation shall be increased to a given number, that then there shall be one for each given number of inhabitants, &c.

Another observation is, that congress will have no temptations to do wrong[89]—the men that make it must be very uninformed, or suppose they are talking to children. In the first place, the members will be governed by all those motives which govern the conduct of men, and have before them all the allurements of offices and temptations, to establish unequal burdens, before described. In the second place, they and their friends, probably, will find it for their interests to keep up large armies, navies, salaries, &c. and in laying adequate taxes. In the third place, we have no good grounds to presume, from reason or experience, that it will be agreeable to their characters or views, that the body of the people should continue to have power effectually to interfere in the affairs of government. But it is confidently added, that congress will not have it in their power to oppress or enslave the people, that the people will not bear it.[90] It is not supposed that congress will act the tyrant immediately, and in the face of day light. It is not supposed congress will adopt important measures, without plausible pretences, especially those which may tend to alarm or produce opposition. We are to consider the natural progress of things: that men unfriendly to republican equality will go systematically to work, gradually to exclude the body of the people from any share in the government, first of the substance, and then of the forms. The men who will have these views will not be without their agents and supporters. When we reflect, that a few years ago we established democratic republics, and fixed the state governments as the barriers between congress and the pockets of the people; what great progress has been made in less than seven years to break down those barriers, and essentially to change the principles of our governments, even by the armless few: is it chimerical to suppose that in fifteen or twenty years to come, that much more can be performed, especially after the adoption of the constitution, when the few will be so much better armed with power and influence, to continue the struggle? probably, they will be wise enough never to alarm, but gradually prepare the minds of the people for one specious change after another, till the final object shall be obtained. Say the advocates, these are only possibilities—they are probabilities, a wise people ought to guard against; and the address made use of to keep the evils out of sight, and the means to prevent them, confirm my opinion. 2.8.138

But to obviate all objections to the proposed plan in the last resort: it is said our people will be free, so long as they possess the habits of freemen, and when they lose them, they must receive some other forms of government.[91] To this I shall only observe, that this is very humiliating language, and can, I trust, never suit a manly people, who have contended nobly for liberty, and declared to the world they will be free. 2.8.139

I have dwelt much longer than I expected upon the increasing the repre- 2.8.140

sentation, the democratic interest in the federal system; but I hope the importance of the subject will justify my dwelling upon it. I have pursued it in a manner new, and I have found it necessary to be somewhat prolix, to illustrate the point I had in view. My idea has ever been, when the democratic branch is weak and small, the body of the people have no defence, and every thing to fear; if they expect to find genuine political friends in kings and nobles, in great and powerful men, they deceive themselves. On the other hand, fix a genuine democratic branch in the government, solely to hold the purse, and with the power of impeachment, and to propose and negative laws, cautiously limit the king and nobles, or the executive and the senate, as the case may be, and the people, I conceive, have but little to fear, and their liberties will be always secure.

2.8.141 I think we are now arrived to a new æra in the affairs of men, when the true principles of government will be more fully unfolded than heretofore, and a new world, as it were, grow up in America. In contemplating representation, the next thing is the security of elections. Before I proceed to this, I beg leave to observe, that the pay of the representatives of the people is essentially connected with their interests.

2.8.142 Congress may put the pay of the members unreasonably high, or so low as that none but the rich and opulent can attend; there are very strong reasons for supposing the latter, probably, will be the case, and a part of the same policy, which uniformly and constantly exerts itself to transfer power from the many to the few. Should the pay be well fixed, and made alterable by congress, with the consent of a majority of the state legislatures, perhaps, all the evils to be feared on this head might, in the best practicable manner, be guarded against, and proper security introduced. It is said the state legislatures fix their own pay—the answer is, that congress is not, nor can it ever be well formed on those equal principles the state legislatures are. I shall not dwell on this point, but conclude this letter with one general observation, that the check[s] I contend for in the system proposed, do not, in the least, any of them tend to lessen the energy of it; but giving grounds for the confidence of the people, greatly to increase its real energy, by insuring their constant and hearty support.

The Federal Farmer.

XI

January 10, 1788.

Dear Sir,

2.8.143 I shall now add a few observations respecting the organization of the senate, the manner of appointing it, and its powers.

The senate is an assembly of 26 members, two from each state, though the senators are apportioned on the federal plan, they will vote individually; they represent the states, as bodies politic, sovereign to certain purposes; the states being sovereign and independent, are all considered equal, each with the other in the senate. In this we are governed solely by the ideal equalities of sovereignties; the federal and state governments forming one whole, and the state governments an essential part, which ought always to be kept distinctly in view, and preserved: I feel more disposed, on reflection, to acquiesce in making them the basis of the senate, and thereby to make it the interest and duty of the senators to preserve distinct, and to perpetuate the respective sovereignties they shall represent.[92]

As to the appointments of senators, I have already observed, that they must be appointed by the legislatures, by concurrent acts, and each branch have an equal share of power, as I do not see any probability of amendments, if advisable, in these points, I shall not dwell upon them. 2.8.144

The senate, as a legislative branch, is not large, but as an executive branch quite too numerous. It is not to be presumed that we can form a genuine senatorial branch in the United States, a real representation of the aristocracy and balance in the legislature, any more than we can form a genuine representation of the people. Could we separate the aristocratical and democratical interests; compose the senate of the former, and the house of assembly of the latter, they are too unequal in the United States to produce a balance. Form them on pure principles, and leave each to be supported by its real weight and connections, the senate would be feeble, and the house powerful:—I say, on pure principles; because I make a distinction between a senate that derives its weight and influence from a pure source, its numbers and wisdom, its extensive property, its extensive and permanent connections; and a senate composed of a few men, possessing small property, small and unstable connections, that derives its weight and influence from a corrupt or pernicious source; that is, merely from the power given it by the constitution and laws, to dispose of the public offices, and the annexed emoluments, and by those means to interest officers, and the hungry expectants of offices, in support of its measures. I wish the proposed senate may not partake too much of the latter description.[93] 2.8.145

To produce a balance and checks, the constitution proposes two branches in the legislature; but they are so formed, that the members of both must generally be the same kind of men—men having similar interests and views, feelings and connections—men of the same grade in society, and who associate on all occasions (probably, if there be any difference, the senators will be the most democratic.) Senators and representatives thus circumstanced, as men, though convened in two rooms, to make laws, must be governed generally by the same motives and views, and therefore pursue the same system of politics; the partitions between the two branches will be merely those of the building in which they sit: there will not be found in them 2.8.146 any of those genuine balances and checks, among the real different interests, and efforts of the several classes of men in the community we aim at; nor can any such balances and checks be formed in the present condition of the United States in any considerable degree of perfection: but to give them the greatest degree of perfection practicable, we ought to make the senate respectable as to numbers, the qualifications of the electors and of the elected; to increase the numbers of the representatives, and so to model the elections of them, as always to draw a majority of them substantially from the body of the people. Though I conclude the senators and representatives will not form in the legislature those balances and checks which correspond with the actual state of the people; yet I approve of two branches, because we may notwithstanding derive several advantages from them. The senate, from the mode of its appointment, will probably be influenced to support the state governments, and, from its periods of service will produce stability in legislation, while frequent elections may take place in the other branch. There is generally a degree of competition between two assemblies even composed of the same kind of men; and by this, and by means of every law's passing a revision in the second branch, caution, coolness, and deliberation are produced in the business of making laws. By means of a democratic branch we may particularly secure personal liberty; and by means of a senatorial branch we may particularly protect property. By the division, the house becomes the proper body to impeach all officers for misconduct in office, and the senate the proper court to try them; and in a country where limited powers must be lodged in the first magistrate, the senate, perhaps, may be the most proper body to be found to have a negative upon him in making treaties, and in managing foreign affairs.

2.8.147 Though I agree the federal senate, in the form proposed, may be useful to many purposes, and that it is not very necessary to alter the organization, modes of appointment, and powers of it in several respects; yet, without alterations in others, I sincerely believe it will, in a very few years, become the source of the greatest evils. Some of these alterations, I conceive, to be absolutely necessary, and some of them at least advisable.

1. By the confederation the members of congress are chosen annually. By art 1. sect. 2. of the constitution, the senators shall be chosen for six years. As the period of service must be, in a considerable degree, matter of opinion on this head, I shall only make a few observations, to explain why I think it more advisable to limit it to three or four years.

The people of this country have not been accustomed to so long appointments in their state governments, they have generally adopted annual elections. The members of the present congress are chosen yearly, who, from the nature and multiplicity of their business, ought to be chosen for longer periods than the federal senators—Men six years in office absolutely contract callous habits, and cease, in too great a degree, to feel their dependance, and for the condition of their constitutents. Senators continued in offices three or four years, will be in them longer than any popular erroneous opinions will probably continue to actuate their electors—men appointed for three or four years, will generally be long enough in office to give stability, and amply to acquire political information. By a change of legislators, as often as circumstances will permit, political knowledge is diffused more extensively among the people, and the attention of the electors and elected more constantly kept alive; circumstances of infinite importance in a free country. Other reasons might be added, but my subject is too extensive to admit of my dwelling upon less material points.

2. When the confederation was formed, it was considered essentially necessary that the members of congress should at any time be recalled by their respective states, when the states should see fit, and others be sent in their room. I do not think it less necessary that this principle should be extended to the members of congress under the new constitution, and especially to the senators. I have had occasion several times to observe, that let us form a federal constitution as extensively, and on the best principles in our power, we must, after all, trust a vast deal to a few men, who, far removed from their constituents, will administer the federal government; there is but little danger these men will feel too great a degree of dependance: the necessary and important object to be attended to, is to make them feel dependant enough. Men elected for several years, several hundred miles distant from their states, possessed of very extensive powers, and the means of paying themselves, will not, probably, be oppressed with a sense of dependance and responsibility.

The senators will represent sovereignties, which generally have, and always ought to retain, the power of recalling their agents; the principle of responsibility is strongly felt in men who are liable to be recalled and censured for their misconduct; and, if we may judge from experience, the latter will not abuse the power of recalling their members; to possess it, will, at least be a valuable check. It is in the nature of all delegated power, that the constituents should retain the right to judge concerning the conduct of their representatives; they must exercise the power, and their decision itself, their approving or disapproving that conduct implies a right, a power to continue in office, or to remove from it. But whenever the substitute acts under a constitution, then it becomes necessary that the power of recalling him be expressed. The reasons for lodging a power to recall are stronger, as they respect the senate, than as they respect the representatives; the latter will be more frequently elected, and changed of course, and being chosen by the people at large, it would be more difficult for the people than for the legislatures to take the necessary measures for recalling: but even the people, if the powers will be more beneficial to them than injurious, ought to possess it. The people are not apt to wrong a man who is steady and true to their interests; they may for a while be misled by party representations, and leave a good man out of office unheard; but every recall supposes a deliberate decision, and a fair hearing; and no man who believes his conduct proper, and the result of honest views, will be the less useful in his public character, on account of the examination his actions may be liable to; and a man conscious of the contrary conduct, ought clearly to be restrained by the apprehensions of a trial. I repeat it, it is interested combinations and factions we are particularly to guard against in the federal government, and all the rational means that can be put into the hands of the people to prevent them, ought to be provided and furnished for them. Where there is a power to recall, trusty centinels among the people, or in the state legislatures, will have a fair opportunity to become useful. If the members in congress from the states join in such combinations, or favour them, or pursue a pernicious line of conduct, the most attentive among the people, or in the state legislatures, may formally charge them before their constituents: the very apprehensions of such constitutional charges may prevent many of the evils mentioned, and the recalling the members of a single state, a single senator, or representative, may often prevent many more; nor do I, at present, discover any danger in such proceedings, as every man who shall move for a recall will put his reputation at stake, to shew he has reasonable grounds for his motion; and it is not probable such motions will be made unless there be good apparent grounds for succeeding; nor can the charge or motion be any thing more than the attack of an individual or individuals, unless a majority of the constituents shall see cause to go into the enquiry. Further, the circumstance of such a power being lodged in the constituents, will tend continually to keep up their watchfulness, as well as the attention and dependance of the federal senators and representatives.

3. By the confederation it is provided, that no delegate shall serve more than three years in any term of six years, and thus, by the forms of the government, a rotation of members is produced: a like principle has been adopted in some of the state governments, and also in some antient and modern republics. Whether this exclusion of a man for a given period, after he shall have served a given time, ought to be ingra[f]ted into a constitution or not, is a question, the proper decision materially depends upon the leading features of the government: some governments are so formed as to produce a sufficient fluctuation and change of members of course, in the ordinary course of elections, proper numbers of new members are, from time to time, brought into the legislature, and a proportionate number of old ones go out, mix, and become diffused among the people. This is the case with all numerous representative legislatures, the members of which are frequently elected, and constantly within the view of their constituents. This is the case with our state governments, and in them a constitutional rotation is unimportant. But in a government consisting of but a few members, elected for long periods, and far removed from the observation of the people, but few changes in the ordinary course of elections take place among the members; they become in some measure a fixed body, and often inattentive to the public good, callous, selfish, and the fountain of corruption. To prevent these evils, and to force a principle of pure animation into the federal government, which will be formed much in this last manner mentioned, and to produce attention, activity, and a diffusion of knowledge in the community, we ought to establish among others the principle of rotation. Even good men in office, in time, imperceptibly lose sight of the people, and gradually fall into measures prejudicial to them. It is only a rotation among the members of the federal legislature I shall contend for: judges and officers at the heads of the judicial and executive departments, are in a very different situation, their offices and duties require the information and studies of many years for performing them in a manner advantageous to the people. These judges and officers must apply their whole time to the detail business of their offices, and depend on them for their support: then they always act under masters or superiors, and may be removed from office for misconduct; they pursue a certain round of executive business: their offices must be in all societies confined to a few men, because but few can become qualified to fill them: and were they, by annual appointments, open to the people at large, they are offices of such a nature as to be of no service to them; they must leave these offices in the possession of the few individuals qualified to fill them, or have them badly filled. In the judicial and executive departments also, the body of the people possess a large share of power and influence, as jurors and subordinate officers, among whom there are many and frequent rotations. But in every free country the legislatures are all on a level, and legislation becomes partial whenever, in practice, it rests for any considerable time in a few hands. It is the true republican principle to diffuse the power of making the laws among the people, and so to modify the forms of the government as to draw in turn the well informed of every class into the legislature.

To determine the propriety or impropriety of this rotation, we must take the inconveniencies as well as the advantages attending it into view: on the one hand, by this rotation, we may sometimes exclude good men from being elected. On the other hand, we guard against those pernicious connections, which usually grow up among men left to continue long periods in office, we increase the number of those who make the laws and return to their constituents; and thereby spread information, and preserve a spirit of activity and investigation among the people: hence a balance of interests and exertions are preserved, and the ruinous measures of factions rendered more impracticable. I would not urge the principle of rotation, if I believed the consequence would be an uninformed federal legislature; but I have no apprehension of this in this enlightened country. The members of congress, at any one time, must be but very few, compared with the respectable well informed men in the United States; and I have no idea there will be any want of such men for members of congress, though by a principle of rotation the constitution should exclude from being elected for two years those federal legislators, who may have served the four years immediately preceding, or any four years in the six preceding years. If we may judge from experience and fair calculations, this principle will never operate to exclude at any one period a fifteenth part, even of those men who have been members of congress. Though no man can sit in congress, by the confederation, more than three years in any term of six years, yet not more than three, four, or five men in any one state, have been made ineligible at any one period; and if a good man happen to be excluded by this rotation, it is only for a short time. All things considered, the inconveniencies of the principle must be very inconsiderable compared with the many advantages of it. It will generally be expedient for a man who has served four years in congress to return home, mix with the people, and reside some time with them: this will tend to reinstate him in the interests, feelings, and views similar to theirs, and thereby confirm in him the essential qualifications of a legislator. Even in point of information, it may be observed, the useful information of legislators is not acquired merely in studies in offices, and in meeting to make laws from day to day; they must learn the actual situation of the people, by being among them, and when they have made laws, return home, and observe how they operate. Thus occasionally to be among the people, is not only necessary to prevent or banish the callous habits and self interested views of office in legislators, but to afford them necessary information, and to render them useful: another valuable end is answered by it, sympathy, and the means of communication between them and their constituents, is substantially promoted; so that on every principle legislators, at certain periods, ought to live among their constituents.

Some men of science are undoubtedly necessary in every legislature; but the knowledge, generally, necessary for men who make laws, is a knowledge of the common concerns, and particular circumstances of the people. In a republican government seats in the legislature are highly honorable; I believe but few do, and surely none ought to consider them as places of profit and permanent support. Were the people always properly attentive, they would, at proper periods, call their law makers home, by sending others in their room: but this is not often the case, and therefore, in making constitutions, when the people are attentive, they ought cautiously to provide for those benefits, those advantageous changes in the administration of their affairs, which they are often apt to be inattentive to in practice. On the whole, to guard against the evils, and to secure the advantages I have mentioned, with the greatest degree of certainty, we ought clearly, in my opinion, to increase the federal representation, to secure elections on proper principles, to establish a right to recall members, and a rotation among them.

4. By the art. 2. sect. 2. treaties must be made with the advice and consent of the senate, and two-thirds of those present must concur: also, with consent of the senate, almost all federal officers, civil and military, must be appointed. As to treaties I have my doubts; but as to the appointments of officers, I think we may clearly shew the senate to be a very improper body indeed to have any thing to do with them. I am not perfectly satisfied, that the senate, a branch of the legislature, and court for trying impeachments, ought to have a controuling power in making all treaties; yet, I confess, I do not discern how a restraint upon the president in this important business, can be better or more safely lodged: a power to make and conclude all treaties is too important to be vested in him alone, or in him and an executive council, only sufficiently numerous for other purpose, and the house of representatives is too numerous to be concerned in treaties of peace and of alliance. This power is now lodged in congress, to be exercised by the consent of nine states. The federal senate, like the delegations in the present congress, will represent the states, and the consent of two-thirds of that senate will bear some similitude to the consent of nine states. It is probable the United States will not make more than one treaty, on an average, in two or three years, and this power may always be exercised with great deliberation: perhaps the senate is sufficiently numerous to be trusted with this power, sufficiently small to proceed with secrecy, and sufficiently permanent to exercise this power with proper consistency and due deliberation. To lodge this power in a less respectable and less numerous body might not be safe; we must place great confidence in the hands that hold it, and we deceive ourselves if we give it under an idea, that we can impeach, to any valuable purpose, the man or men who may abuse it.

On a fair construction of the constitution, I think the legislature has a proper controul over the president and senate in settling commercial treaties. By art. 1. sect. 2. the legislature will have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, &c. By art. 2. sect. 2. the president, with the advice and consent of two-thirds of the senate, may make treaties. These clauses must be considered together, and we ought never to make one part of the same instrument contradict another, if it can be avoided by any reasonable construction. By the first recited clause, the legislature has the power, that is, as I understand it, the sole power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, or to make all the rules and regulations respecting trade and commerce between our citizens and foreigners: by the second recited clause, the president and senate have power generally to make treaties.—There are several kinds of treaties—as treaties of commerce, of peace, of alliance, &c. I think the words to "make treaties," may be consistently construed, and yet so as it shall be left to the legislature to confirm commercial treaties; they are in their nature and operation very distinct from treaties of peace and of alliance; the latter generally require secrecy, it is but very seldom they interfere with the laws and internal police of the country; to make them is properly the exercise of executive powers, and the constitution authorises the president and senate to make treaties, and gives the legislature no power, directly or indirectly, respecting these treaties of peace and alliance. As to treaties of commerce, they do not generally require secrecy, they almost always involve in them legislative powers, interfere with the laws and internal police of the country, and operate immediately on persons and property, especially in the commercial towns: (they have in Great-Britain usually been confirmed by parliament;) they consist of rules and regulations respecting commerce; and to regulate commerce, or to make regulations respecting commerce, the federal legislature, by the constitution, has the power. I do not see that any commercial regulations can be made in treaties, that will not infringe upon this power in the legislature: therefore, I infer, that the true construction is, that the president and senate shall make treaties; but all commercial treaties shall be subject to be confirmed by the legislature. This construction will render the clauses consistent, and make the powers of the president and senate, respecting treaties, much less exceptionable.

The Federal Farmer.

XII

January 12, 1788.

Dear Sir,

2.8.148 On carefully examining the parts of the proposed system, respecting the elections of senators, and especially of the representatives, they appear to me to be both ambiguous and very defective. I shall endeavour to pursue a course of reasoning, which shall fairly lead to establishing the impartiality and security of elections, and then to point out an amendment in this respect.

It is well observed by Montesquieu, that in republican governments, the forms of elections are fundamental; and that it is an essential part of the social compact, to ascertain by whom, to whom, when, and in what manner suffrages are to be given.[94]

2.8.149 Wherever we find the regulation of elections have not been carefully fixed by the constitution, or the principles of them, we constantly see the legislatures new modifying its own form, and changing the spirit of the government to answer partial purposes.

By the proposed plan it is fixed, that the qualifications of the electors of the federal representatives shall be the same as those of the electors of state representatives; though these vary some in the several states the electors are fixed and designated.

2.8.150 The qualifications of the representatives are also fixed and designated, and no person under 25 years of age, not an inhabitant of the state, and not having been seven years a citizen of the United States, can be elected; the clear inference is, that all persons 25 years of age, and upwards, inhabitants of the state, and having been, at any period or periods, seven years citizens of the United States, may be elected representatives. They have a right to be elected by the constitution, and the electors have a right to chuse them. This is fixing the federal representation, as to the elected, on a very broad basis: it can be no objection to the elected, that they are Christians, Pagans, Mahometans, or Jews; that they are of any colour, rich or poor, convict or not: Hence many men may be elected, who cannot be electors. Gentlemen who have commented so largely upon the wisdom of the constitution, for excluding from being elected young men under a certain age, would have done well to have recollected, that it positively makes pagans, convicts, &c. eligible. The people make the constitution; they exclude a few persons, by certain descriptions, from being elected, and all not thus excluded are clearly admitted. Now a man 25 years old, an inhabitant of the state, and having been a citizen of the states seven years, though afterwards convicted, may be elected, because not within any of the excluding clauses; the same of a beggar, an absentee, &c.

The right of the electors, and eligibility of the elected being fixed by the people, they cannot be narrowed by the state legislatures, or congress: it is established, that a man being (among other qualifications) an inhabitant of the state, shall be eligible. Now it would be narrowing the right of the people to confine them in their choice to a man, an inhabitant of a particular county or district in the state. Hence it follows, that neither the state legislatures or congress can establish district elections; that is, divide the state into districts, and confine the electors of each district to the choice of a man resident in it. If the electors could be thus limited in one respect, they might in another be confined to chuse a man of a particular religion, of certain property, &c. and thereby half of the persons made eligible by the constitution be excluded. All laws, therefore, for regulating elections must be made on the broad basis of the constitution. 2.8.151

Next, we may observe, that representatives are to be chosen by the people of the state. What is a choice by the people of the state? If each given district in it choose one, will that be a choice within the meaning of the constitution? Must the choice be by plurality of votes, or a majority? In connection with these questions, we must take the 4th sect. art. 1. where it is said the state legislatures shall prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections; but congress may make or alter such regulations. By this clause, I suppose, the electors of different towns and districts in the state may be assembled in different places, to give their votes; but when so assembled, by another clause they cannot, by congress or the state legislatures, be restrained from giving their votes for any man an inhabitant of the state, and qualified as to age, and having been a citizen the time required. But I see nothing in the constitution by which to decide, whether the choice shall be by a plurality or a majority of votes: this, in my mind, is by far the most important question in the business of elections. When we say a repre- 2.8.152 sentative shall be chosen by the people, it seems to imply that he shall be chosen by a majority of them; but states which use the same phraseology in this respect, practice both ways. I believe a majority of the states, chuse by pluralities, and, I think it probable, that the federal house of representatives will decide that a choice of its members by pluralities is constitutional. A man who has the most votes is chosen in Great-Britain. It is this, among other things, that gives every man fair play in the game of influence and corruption. I believe that not much stress was laid upon the objection that congress may assemble the electors at some out of the way place. However, the advocates seem to think they obtain a victory of no small glory and importance, when they can shew, with some degree of colour, that the evils is rather a possibility than a probability.

2.8.153 When I observed that the elections were not secured on proper principles,[95] I had an idea of far more probable and extensive evils, secret mischiefs, and not so glaring transgressions, the exclusions of proper district elections, and of the choice by a majority.

2.8.154 It is easy to perceive that there is an essential difference between elections by pluralities and by majorities, between choosing a man in a small or limited district, and choosing a number of men promiscuously by the people of a large state; and while we are almost secure of judicious unbiassed elections by majorities in such districts, we have no security against deceptions, influence and corruption in states or large districts in electing by pluralities. When a choice is made by a plurality of votes, it is often made by a very small part of the electors, who attend and give their votes, when by a majority, never by so few as one half of them. The partialities and improprieties attending the former mode may be illustrated by a case that lately happened in one of the middle states.—Several representatives were to be chosen by a large number of inhabitants compactly settled, among whom there were four or five thousand voters. Previous to the time of election a number of lists of candidates were published, to divide and distract the voters in general—about half a dozen men of some influence, who had a favourite list to carry, met several times, fixed their list, and agreed to hand it about among all who could probably be induced to adopt it, and to circulate the other lists among their opponents, to divide them. The poll was opened, and several hundred electors, suspecting nothing, attended and put in their votes; the list of the half dozen was carried, and men were found to be chosen, some of whom were very disagreeable to a large majority of the electors: though several hundred electors voted, men on that list were chosen who had only 45, 43, 44, &c. votes each; they had a plurality, that is, more than any other persons: the votes generally were scattered, and those who made even a feeble combination succeeded in placing highest upon the list several very unthought of and very unpopular men. This evil never could have happened in a town where all the voters meet in one place, and consider no man as elected unless he have a majority, or more than half of all the votes; clear it is, that the men on whom thus but a small part of the votes are bestowed, cannot possess the confidence of the people, or have any considerable degree of influence over them.

But as partial, as liable to secret influence, and corruption as the choice by pluralities may be, I think, we cannot avoid it, without essentially increasing the federal representation, and adopting the principles of district elections. There is but one case in which the choice by the majority is practicable, and that is, where districts are formed of such moderate extent that the electors in each can conveniently meet in one place, and at one time, and proceed to the choice of a representative; when, if no man have a majority, or more than half of all the votes the first time, the voters may examine the characters of those brought forward, accommodate, and proceed to repeat their votes till some one shall have that majority. This, I believe, cannot be a case under the constitution proposed in its present form. To explain my ideas, take Massachusetts, for instance, she is entitled to eight representatives, she has 370,000 inhabitants, about 46,000 to one representative; if the elections be so held that the electors throughout the state meet in their several towns or places, and each elector puts in his vote for eight representatives, the votes of the electors will ninety-nine times in a hundred, be so scattered that on collecting the votes from the several towns or places, no men will be found, each of whom have a majority of the votes, and therefore the election will not be made. On the other hand, there may be such a combination of votes, that in thus attempting to chuse eight representatives, the electors may chuse even fifteen. Suppose 10,000 voters to attend and give their votes, each voter will give eight votes, one for each of eight representatives; in the whole 80,000 votes will be given—eight men, each having 5001 votes, in the whole 40,008 will have each a majority, and be chosen—39,092 votes will be bestowed on other men, and if they all be bestowed on seven men, they may have each a considerable majority, and also be chosen. This indeed is a very rare combination: but the bestowing all the votes pretty equally upon nine, ten, or eleven men, and chusing them all, is an event too probable not to be guarded against. 2.8.155

If Massachusetts be divided into eight districts, each having about 46,000 inhabitants, and each district directed to chuse one representative, it will be found totally impracticable for the electors of it to meet in one place; and, when they meet in several towns and places in the district, they will vote for different men, and nineteen times in twenty, so scatter their votes, that no one man will have a majority of the whole and be chosen: we must, therefore, take the man who has the most votes, whether he has three quarters, one quarter, or one tenth part of the whole; the inconveniencies of scattering votes will be increased, as men not of the district, as well as those that are in it, may be voted for. 2.8.156

I might add many other observations to evince the superiority and solid advantages of proper district elections, and a choice by a majority, and to 2.8.157

prove, that many evils attend the contrary practice: these evils we must encounter as the constitution now stands.

2.8.158 I see no way to fix elections on a proper footing, and to render tolerably equal and secure the federal representation, but by increasing the representation, so as to have one representative for each district, in which the electors may conveniently meet in one place, and at one time, and chuse by a majority. Perhaps this might be effected pretty generally, by fixing one representative for each twelve thousand inhabitants; dividing, or fixing the principles for dividing the states into proper districts; and directing the electors of each district to the choice, by a majority, of some men having a permanent interest and residence in it. I speak of a representation tolerably equal, &c. because I am still of opinion, that it is impracticable in this extensive country to have a federal representation sufficiently democratic, or substantially drawn from the body of the people: the principles just mentioned may be the best practical ones we can expect to establish. By thus increasing the representation, we not only make it more democratical and secure, strengthen the confidence of the people in it, and thereby render it more nervous and energetic; but it will also enable the people essentially to change, for the better, the principles and forms of elections. To provide for the people's wandering throughout the state for a representative, may sometimes enable them to elect a more brilliant or an abler man, than by confining them to districts, but generally this latitude will be used to pernicious purposes, especially connected with the choice by plurality: when a man in the remote part of the state, perhaps, obnoxious at home, but ambitious and intriguing, may be chosen to represent the people in another part of the state far distant, and by a small part of them, or by a faction, or by a combination of some particular description of men among them. This has been long the case in Great-Britain, it is the case in several of the states, nor do I think that such pernicious practices will be merely possible in our federal concerns, but highly probable. By establishing district elections, we exclude none of the best men from being elected; and we fix what, in my mind, is of far more importance than brilliant talents, I mean a sameness, as to residence and interests, between the representative and his constituents; and by the election by a majority, he is sure to be the man, the choice of more than half of them.

2.8.159 Though it is impossible to put elections on a proper footing as the constitution stands, yet I think regulations respecting them may be introduced of considerable service: it is not only, therefore, important to enquire how they may be made, but also what body has the controuling power over them. An intelligent, free and unbiassed choice of representatives by the people is of the last importance: we must then carefully guard against all combinations, secret arts, and influence to the contrary. Various expedients have been adopted in different countries and states to effect genuine elections; as the constitution now stands, I confess, I do not discover any better than those adopted in Connecticut, in the choice of counsellers, before mentioned.[96]

The federal representatives are to be chosen every second year (an odd mode of expression). In all the states, except South-Carolina, the people, the same electors, meet twice in that time to elect state representatives. For instance, let the electors in Massachusetts, when they meet to chuse state representatives, put in their votes for eight federal representatives, the number that state may chuse, (merely for distinction sake, we may call these the votes of nomination), and return a list of the men voted for, in the several towns and places, to the legislature, or some proper body; let this list be immediately examined and published, and some proper number, say 15 or 20, who shall have the most votes upon the list, be sent out to the people; and when the electors shall meet the next year to chuse state representatives, let them put in their votes for the eight federal representatives, confining their votes to the proper number so sent out; and let the eight highest of those thus voted for in the two votes (which we may call, by way of distinction, votes of election), be the federal representatives: thus a choice may be made by the people, once in two years, without much trouble and expence, and, I believe, with some degree of security. As soon as the votes of nomination shall be collected and made known, the people will know who are voted for, and who are candidates for their votes the succeeding year; the electors will have near a year to enquire into their characters and politics, and also into any undue means, if any were taken, to bring any of them forward; and such as they find to be the best men, and agreeable to the people, they may vote for in giving the votes of election. By these means the men chosen will ultimately always have a majority, or near a majority, of the votes of the electors, who shall attend and give their votes. The mode itself will lead to the discovery of truth and of political characters, and to prevent private combinations, by rendering them in a great measure of no effect. As the choice is to be made by the people, all combinations and checks must be confined to their votes. No supplying the want of a majority by the legislatures, as in Massachusetts in the choice of senators, &c. can be admitted: the people generally judge right when informed, and, in giving their votes the second time, they may always correct their former errors. 2.8.160

I think we are all sufficiently acquainted with the progress of elections to see, that the regulations, as to times, places, and the manner merely of holding elections, may, under the constitution, easily be made useful or injurious. It is important then to enquire, who has the power to make regulations, and who ought to have it. By the constitution, the state legislatures shall prescribe the times, places, and manner of holding elections, but congress may make or alter such regulations. Power in congress merely to alter those regulations, made by the states, could answer no valuable purposes; the states might make, and congress alter them ad infinitum: and when the state should cease to make, or should annihilate its regulations, congress 2.8.161 would have nothing to alter. But the states shall make regulations, and congress may make such regulations as the clause stands: the true construction is, that when congress shall see fit to regulate the times, places, and manner of holding elections, congress may do it, and state regulations, on this head, must cease; for if state regulations could exist, after congress should make a system of regulations, there would, or might, be two incompatible systems of regulations relative to the same subject.

2.8.162 It has been often urged, that congress ought to have power to make these regulations, otherwise the state legislatures, by neglecting to make provision for elections, or by making improper regulations, may destroy the general government. It is very improbable that any state legislature will adopt measures to destroy the representation of its own constituents in congress, especially when the state must, represented in congress or not, pay its proportion of the expence of keeping up the government, and even of the representatives of the other states, and be subject to their laws. Should the state legislatures be disposed to be negligent, or to combine to break up congress, they have a very simple way to do it, as the constitution now stands—they have only to neglect to chuse senators, or to appoint the electors of the president, and vice-president: there is no remedy provided against these last evils: nor is it to be presumed, that if a sufficient number of state legislatures to break up congress, should, by neglect or otherwise, attempt to do it, that the people, who yearly elect those legislatures, would elect under the regulations of congress. These and many other reasons must evince, that it was not merely to prevent an annihilation of the federal government that congress has power to regulate elections.

2.8.163 It has been urged also, that the state legislatures chuse the federal senators, one branch, and may injure the people, who chuse the other, by improper regulations; that therefore congress, in which the people will immediately have one, the representative branch, ought to have power to interfere in behalf of the people, and rectify such improper regulations. The advocates have said much about the opponents dwelling upon possibilities; but to suppose the people will find it necessary to appeal to congress to restrain the oppressions of the state legislatures, is supposing a possibility indeed. Can any man in his senses suppose that the state legislatures, which are so numerous as almost to be the people themselves, all branches of them depending yearly, for the most part, on the elections of the people, will abuse them in regulating federal elections, and make it proper to transfer the power to congress, a body, one branch of which is chosen once in six years by these very legislatures, and the other biennially, and not half so numerous as even the senatorial branches in those legislatures?

2.8.164 Senators are to be chosen by the state legislatures, where there are two branches the appointment must be, I presume, by a concurrent resolution, in passing which, as in passing all other legislative acts each branch will have a negative; this will give the senatorial branch just as much weight in the appointment as the democratic: the two branches form a legislature only when acting separately, and therefore, whenever the members of the two branches meet, mix and vote individually in one room, for making an election, it is expressly so directed by the constitutions. If the constitution, by fixing the choice to be made by the legislatures, has given each branch an equal vote, as I think it has, it cannot be altered by any regulations.

On the whole, I think, all general principles respecting electors ought to 2.8.165 be carefully established by the constitution, as the qualifications of the electors and of elected: the number of the representatives, and the inhabitants of each given district, called on to chuse a man from among themselves by a majority of votes; leaving it to the legislature only so to regulate, from time to time, the extent of the districts so as to keep the representatives proportionate to the number of inhabitants in the several parts of the country; and so far as regulations as to elections cannot be fixed by the constitution, they ought to be left to the state legislatures, they coming far nearest to the people themselves; at most, congress ought to have power to regulate elections only where a state shall neglect to make them.

The Federal Farmer.

XIII

January 14, 1788.

Dear Sir,

In this letter I shall further examine two clauses in the proposed constitu- 2.8.166 tion respecting appointments to office.[97]—By art. 2. sect. 2. the president shall nominate, and by and with the advice and consent of the senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the supreme court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments, &c. By art. 1, sect. 6. No senator or representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time.

Thus the president must nominate, and the senate concur in the appoint- 2.8.167 ment of all federal officers, civil and military, and the senators and representatives are made ineligible only to the few civil offices abovementioned. To preserve the federal government pure and uncorrupt, peculiar precautions relative to appointments to office will be found highly necessary from the very forms and character of the government itself. The honours and emoluments of public offices are the objects in all communities, that ambitious and necessitous men never lose sight of. The honest, the modest, and the industrious part of the community content themselves, generally, with their private concerns; they do not solicit those offices which are the perpetual source of cabals, intrigues, and contests among men of the former description, men embarrassed, intriguing, and destitute of modesty. Even in the most happy country and virtuous government, corrupt influence in appointments cannot always be avoided; perhaps we may boast of our share of virtue as a people, and if we are only sufficiently aware of the influence, biasses, and prejudices, common to the affairs of men, we may go far towards guarding against the effects of them.

2.8.168 We all agree, that a large standing army has a strong tendency to depress and inslave the people; it is equally true that a large body of selfish, unfeeling, unprincipled civil officers has a like, or a more pernicious tendency to the same point. Military, and especially civil establishments, are the necessary appendages of society; they are deductions from productive labour, and substantial wealth, in proportion to the number of men employed in them; they are oppressive where unnecessarily extended and supported by men unfriendly to the people; they are injurious when too small, and supported by men too timid and dependant. It is of the last importance to decide well upon the necessary number of offices, to fill them with proper characters, and to establish efficiently the means of punctually punishing those officers who may do wrong.

2.8.169 To discern the nature and extent of this power of appointments, we need only to consider the vast number of officers necessary to execute a national system in this extensive country, the prodigious biasses the hopes and expectations of offices have on their conduct, and the influence public officers have among the people—these necessary officers, as judges, state's attornies, clerks, sheriffs, &c. in the federal supreme and inferior courts, admirals and generals, and subordinate officers in the army and navy, ministers, consuls, &c. sent to foreign countries; officers in the federal city, in the revenue, post-office departments, &c. &c. must, probably, amount to several thousands, without taking into view the very inferior ones. There can be no doubt but that the most active men in politics, in and out of congress, will be the foremost candidates for the best of these offices; the man or men who shall have the disposal of them, beyond dispute, will have by far the greatest share of active influence in the government; but appointments must be made, and who shall make them? what modes of appointments will be attended with the fewest inconveniencies? is the question. The senators and representatives are the law makers, create all offices, and whenever they see fit, they impeach and try officers for misconduct; they ought to be in session but part of the year, and as legislators, they must be too numerous to make appointments, perhaps, a few very important ones excepted. In contemplating the necessary officers of the union, there appear to be six different modes in which, in whole or in part, the appointments may be made. 1. By the legislature; 2. by the president and senate—3. by the president and an executive council—4. by the president alone—5. by the heads of the departments—and 6. by the state governments—Among all these, in my opinion, there may be an advantageous distribution of the power of appointments. In considering the legislators, in relation to the subject before us, two interesting questions particularly arise—1. Whether they ought to be eligible to any offices whatever during the period for which they shall be elected to serve, and even for some time afterwards—and 2. How far they ought to participate in the power of appointments. As to the first, it is true that legislators in foreign countries, or in our state governments, are not generally made ineligible to office: there are good reasons for it; in many countries the people have gone on without ever examining the principles of government. There have been but few countries in which the legislators have been a particular set of men periodically chosen: but the principal reason is, that which operates in the several states, viz. the legislators are so frequently chosen, and so numerous, compared with the number of offices for which they can reasonably consider themselves as candidates, that the chance of any individual member's being chosen, is too small to raise his hopes or expectations, or to have any considerable influence upon his conduct. Among the state legislators, one man in twenty may be appointed in some committee business, &c. for a month or two; but on a fair computation, not one man in a hundred sent to the state legislatures is appointed to any permanent office of profit: directly the reverse of this will evidently be found true in the federal administration. Throughout the United States, about four federal senators, and thirty-three representatives, averaging the elections, will be chosen in a year; these few men may rationally consider themselves as the fairest candidates for a very great number of lucrative offices, which must become vacant in the year, and pretty clearly a majority of the federal legislators, if not excluded, will be mere expectants for public offices. I need not adduce further arguments to establish a position so clear, I need only call to your recollection my observations in a former letter, wherein I endeavoured to shew the fallacy of the argument, that the members must return home and mix with the people.[98] It is said, that men are governed by interested motives, and will not attend as legislators, unless they can, in common with others, be eligible to offices of honor and profit.[99] This will undoubtedly be the case with some men, but I presume only with such men as never ought to be chosen legislators in a free country; an opposite principle will influence good men; virtuous patriots, and generous minds, will esteem it a higher honor to be selected as the guardians of a free people; they will be satisfied with a reasonable compensation for their time and service; nor will they wish to be within the vortex of influence. The valuable effects of this principle of making legislators ineligible to offices for a given time, has never yet been sufficiently attended to or considered: I am assured, that it was established by the convention after long debate, and afterwards, on an unfortunate change of a few members, altered.[100] Could the federal legislators be excluded in the manner proposed, I think it would be an important point gained; as to themselves, they would be left to act much more from motives consistent with the public good.

2.8.170 In considering the principle of rotation I had occasion to distinguish the condition of a legislator from that of mere official man[101]—We acquire certain habits, feelings, and opinions, as men and citizens—others, and very different ones, from a long continuance in office: It is, therefore, a valuable observation in many bills of rights, that rulers ought frequently to return and mix with the people. A legislature, in a free country, must be numerous; it is in some degree a periodical assemblage of the people, frequently formed—the principal officers in the executive and judicial departments, must have more permanency in office. Hence it may be inferred, that the legislature will remain longer uncorrupted and virtuous; longer congenial to the people, than the officers of those departments. If it is not, therefore, in our power to preserve republican principles, for a series of ages, in all the departments of government, we may a long while preserve them in a well formed legislature. To this end we ought to take every precaution to prevent legislators becoming mere office-men; chuse them frequently, make them recallable, establish rotation among them, make them ineligible to offices, and give them as small a share as possible in the disposal of them. Add to this, a legislature, in the nature of things, is not formed for the detail business of appointing officers; there is also generally an impropriety in the same men's making offices and filling them, and a still greater impropriety in their impeaching and trying the officers they appoint. For these, and other reasons, I conclude, the legislature is not a proper body for the appointment of officers in general. But having gone through with the different modes of appointment, I shall endeavour to shew what share in the distribution of the power of appointments the legislature must, from necessity, rather than from propriety, take. 2. Officers may be appointed by the president and senate—this mode, for general purposes, is clearly not defensible. All the reasoning touching the legislature will apply to the senate; the senate is a branch of the legislature, which ought to be kept pure and unbiassed; it has a part in trying officers for misconduct, and in creating offices, it is too numerous for a council of appointment, or to feel any degree of responsibility: if it has an advantage of the legislature, in being the least numerous, it has a disadvantage in being more unsafe: add to this, the senate is to have a share in the important branch of power respecting treaties. Further, this sexennial senate of 26 members, representing 13 sovereign states, will not, in practice, be found to be a body to advise, but to order and dictate in fact; and the president will be a mere primus inter pares. The consequence will be, that the senate, with these efficient means of influence, will not only dictate, probably, to the president, but manage the house, as the constitution now stands; and under appearances of a balanced system, in reality, govern alone. There may also, by this undue connection, be particular periods when a very popular president may have a very improper influence upon the senate and upon the legislature. A council of appointment must very probably sit all, or near all, the year—the senate will be too important and too expensive a body for this. By giving the senate, directly or indirectly, an undue influence over the representatives, and the improper means of fettering, embarrassing, or controuling the president or executive, we give the government, in the very out set, a fatal and pernicious tendency to that middle undesirable point—aristocracy. When we, as a circumstance not well to be avoided, admit the senate to a share of power in making treaties, and in managing foreign concerns, we certainly progress full far enough towards this most undesirable point in government. For with this power, also, I believe, we must join that of appointing ambassadors, other foreign ministers, and consuls, being powers necessarily connected.—In every point of view, in which I can contemplate this subject, it appears extremely clear to me, that the senate ought not generally to be a council of appointment. The legislature, after the people, is the great fountain of power, and ought to be kept as pure and uncorrupt as possible, from the hankerings, biasses, and contagion of offices—then the streams issuing from it, will be less tainted with those evils. It is not merely the number of impeachments, that are to be expected to make public officers honest and attentive in their business. A general opinion must pervade the community, that the house, the body to impeach them for misconduct, is disinterested, and ever watchful for the public good; and that the judges who shall try impeachments, will not feel a shadow of biass. Under such circumstances, men will not dare transgress, who, not deterred by such accusers and judges, would repeatedly misbehave. We have already suffered many and extensive evils, owing to the defects of the confederation, in not providing against the misconduct of public officers. When we expect the law to be punctually executed, not one man in ten thousand will disobey it: it is the probable chance of escaping punishment that induces men to transgress. It is one important mean to make the government just and honest, rigidly and constantly to hold, before the eyes of those who execute it, punishment, and dismission from office, for misconduct. These are principles no candid man, who has just ideas of the essential features of a free government, will controvert. They are, to be sure, at this period, called visionary, speculative and anti-governmental—but in the true stile of courtiers, selfish politicians, and flatterers of despotism—discerning republican men of both parties see their value. They are said to be of no value, by empty boasting advocates for the constitution, who, by their weakness and conduct, in fact, injure its cause much more than most of its opponents. From their high sounding promises, men are led to expect a defence of it, and to have their doubts removed. When a number of long pieces appear, they, instead of the defence, &c. they expected, see nothing but a parade of names—volumes written without ever coming to the point—cases quoted between which and ours there is not the least similitude—and partial extracts made from histories and governments, merely to serve a purpose. Some of them, like the true admirers of royal and senatorial robes, would fain prove, that nations who have thought like freemen and philosophers about government, and endeavoured to be free, have often been the most miserable: if a single riot, in the course of five hundred years happened in a free country, if a salary, or the interest of a public or private debt was not paid at the moment, they seem to lay more stress upon these triffles (for triffles they are in a free and happy country) than upon the oppressions of despotic government for ages together. As to the lengthy writer in New-York[102] you mention, I have attentively examined his pieces; he appears to be a candid good-hearted man, to have a good stile, and some plausible ideas; but when we carefully examine his pieces, to see where the strength of them lies; when the mind endeavours to fix on those material parts, which ought to be the essence of all volumnious productions, we do not find them: the writer appears constantly to move on a smooth surface, the part of his work, like the parts of a cob-house, are all equally strong and all equally weak, and all like those works of the boys, without an object; his pieces appear to have but little relation to the great question, whether the constitution is fitted to the condition and character of this people or not. But to return—3. Officers may be appointed by the president and an executive council—when we have assigned to the legislature the appointment of a few important officers—to the president and senate the appointment of those concerned in managing foreign affairs—to the state governments the appointment of militia officers, and authorise the legislature, by legislative acts, to assign to the president alone, to the heads of the departments, and courts of law respectively, the appointment of many inferior officers; we shall then want to lodge some where a residuum of power, a power to appoint all other necessary officers, as established by law. The fittest receptacle for this residuary power is clearly, in my opinion, the first executive magistrate, advised and directed by an executive council of seven or nine members, periodically chosen from such proportional districts as the union may for the purpose be divided into. The people may give their votes for twice the number of counsellers wanted, and the federal legislature take twice the number also from the highest candidates, and from among them chuse the seven or nine, or number wanted. Such a council may be rationally formed for the business of appointments; whereas the senate, created for other purposes, never can be—Such councils forms a feature in some of the best executives in the union—they appear to be essential to every first magistrate, who may frequently want advice.

2.8.171 To authorise the president to appoint his own council would be unsafe: to give the sole appointment of it to the legislature, would confer an undue and unnecessary influence upon that branch. Such a council for a year would be less expensive than the senate for four months. The president may nominate, and the counsellers always be made responsible for their advice and opinions, by recording and signing whatever they advise to be done. They and the president, to many purposes, will properly form an independent executive branch; have an influence unmixed with the legislative, which the executive never can have while connected with a powerful branch of the legislature. And yet the influence arising from the power of appointments be less dangerous, because in less dangerous hands—hands properly adequate to possess it. Whereas the senate, from its character and situation, will add a dangerous weight to the power itself, and be far less capable of responsibility, than the council proposed. There is another advantage the residuum of power, as to appointments, which the president and council need possess, is less than that the president and senate must have. And as such a council would render the sessions of the senate unnecessary many months in the year, the expences of the government would not be increased, if they would not be lessened by the institution of such a council. I think I need not dwell upon this article, as the fitness of this mode of appointment will perhaps amply appear by the evident unfitness of the others.

4. Officers may be appointed by the president alone. It has been almost 2.8.172 universally found, when a man has been authorized to exercise power alone, he has never done it alone; but, generally, aided his determinations by, and rested on the advice and opinions of others. And it often happens when advice is wanted, the worst men, the most interested creatures, the worst advice is at hand, obtrude themselves, and misdirect the mind of him who would be informed and advised. It is very seldom we see a single executive depend on accidental advice and assistance; but each single executive has, almost always, formed to itself a regular council, to be assembled and consulted on important occasions; this proves that a select council, of some kind, is, by experience, generally found necessary and useful. But in a free country, the exercise of any considerable branch of power ought to be under some checks and controuls. As to this point, I think the constitution stands well, the legislature may, when it shall deem it expedient, from time to time, authorise the president alone to appoint particular inferior officers, and when necessary to take back the power. His power, therefore, in this respect, may always be increased or decreased by the legislature, as experience, the best instructor, shall direct: always keeping him, by the constitution, within certain bounds.

The Federal Farmer.

XIV

January 17, 1788.

Dear Sir,

To continue the subject of appointments:—Officers, in the fifth place, 2.8.173 may be appointed by the heads of departments or courts of law. Art. 2. sect.

2. respecting appointments, goes on—"But congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers as they think proper in the president alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments." The probability is, as the constitution now stands, that the senate, a branch of the legislature, will be tenacious of the power of appointment, and much too sparingly part with a share of it to the courts of law, and heads of departments. Here again the impropriety appears of the senate's having, generally, a share in the appointment of officers. We may fairly presume, that the judges, and principal officers in the departments, will be able well informed men in their respective branches of business; that they will, from experience, be best informed as to proper persons to fill inferior offices in them; that they will feel themselves responsible for the execution of their several branches of business, and for the conduct of the officers they may appoint therein.—From these, and other considerations, I think we may infer, that impartial and judicious appointments of subordinate officers will, generally, be made by the courts of law, and the heads of departments. This power of distributing appointments, as circumstances may require, into several hands, in a well formed disinterested legislature, might be of essential service, not only in promoting beneficial appointments, but, also, in preserving the balance in government: a feeble executive may be strengthened and supported by placing in its hands more numerous appointments; an executive too influential may be reduced within proper bounds, by placing many of the inferior appointments in the courts of law, and heads of departments; nor is there much danger that the executive will be wantonly weakened or strengthened by the legislature, by thus shifting the appointments of inferior officers, since all must be done by legislative acts, which cannot be passed without the consent of the executive, or the consent of two-thirds of both branches—a good legislature will use this power to preserve the balance and perpetuate the government. Here again we are brought to our ultimatum:—is the legislature so constructed as to deserve our confidence?

2.8.174 6. Officers may be appointed by the state governments. By art. 1. sect. 8. the respective states are authorised exclusively to appoint the militia-officers. This not only lodges the appointments in proper places, but it also tends to distribute and lodge in different executive hands the powers of appointing to offices, so dangerous when collected into the hands of one or a few men.

2.8.175 It is a good general rule, that the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, ought to be kept distinct; but this, like other general rules, has its exceptions; and without these exceptions we cannot form a good government, and properly balance its parts,[103] and we can determine only from reason, experience, and a critical inspection of the parts of the government, how far it is proper to intermix those powers. Appointment, I believe, in all mixed governments, have been assigned to different hands—some are made by the executive, some by the legislature, some by the judges and some by the people. It has been thought adviseable by the wisest nations, that the legislature should so far exercise executive and judicial powers as to appoint some officers, judge of the elections of its members, and impeach and try officers for misconduct—that the executive should have a partial share in legislation—that judges should appoint some subordinate officers, and regulate so far as to establish rules for their own proceedings. Where the members of the government, as the house, the senate, the executive, and judiciary, are strong and complete, each in itself, the balance is naturally produced, each party may take the powers congenial to it, and we have less need to be anxious about checks, and the subdivision of powers.

If after making the deductions, already alluded to, from the general power 2.8.176 to appoint federal officers the residuum shall be thought to be too large and unsafe, and to place an undue influence in the hands of the president and council, a further deduction may be made, with many advantages, and, perhaps, with but a few inconveniencies; and that is, by giving the appointment of a few great officers to the legislature—as of the commissioners of the treasury—of the comptroller, treasurer, master coiner, and some of the principal officers in the money department—of the sheriffs or marshalls of the United States—of states attornies, secretary of the home department, and secretary at war, perhaps, of the judges of the supreme court—of major-generals and admirals.[104] The appointments of these officers, who may be at the heads of the great departments of business, in carrying into execution the national system, involve in them a variety of considerations; they will not often occur, and the power to make them ought to remain in safe hands. Officers of the above description are appointed by the legislatures in some of the states, and in some not. We may, I believe, presume that the federal legislature will possess sufficient knowledge and discernment to make judicious appointments: however, as these appointments by the legislature tend to increase a mixture of power, to lessen the advantages of impeachments and responsibility, I would by no means contend for them any further than it may be necessary for reducing the power of the executive within the bounds of safety. To determine with propriety how extensive power the executive ought to possess relative to appointments, we must also examine the forms of it, and its other powers; and these forms and other powers I shall now proceed briefly to examine.

By art. 2. sect. 1. the executive power shall be vested in a president 2.8.177 elected for four years, by electors to be appointed from time to time, in such manner as the state legislatures shall direct—the electors to be equal in numbers to the federal senators and representatives: but congress may determine the time of chusing senators, and the day on which they shall give their votes; and if no president be chosen by the electors, by a majority of votes, the states, as states in congress, shall elect one of the five highest on the list for president. It is to be observed, that in chusing the president, the principle of electing by a majority of votes is adopted; in chusing the vice-president, that of electing by a plurality. Viewing the principles and checks established in the election of the president, and especially considering the several states may guard the appointment of the electors as they shall judge best, I confess there appears to be a judicious combination of principles and precautions.[105] Were the electors more numerous than they will be, in case the representation be not increased, I think, the system would be improved; not that I consider the democratic character so important in the choice of the electors as in the choice of representatives: be the electors more or less democratic, the president will be one of the very few of the most elevated characters. But there is danger, that a majority of a small number of electors may be corrupted and influenced, after appointed electors, and before they give their votes, especially if a considerable space of time elapse between the appointment and voting. I have already considered the advisory council in the executive branch: there are two things further in the organization of the executive, to which I would particularly draw your attention; the first, which, is a single executive, I confess, I approve; the second, by which any person from period to period may be re-elected president, I think very exceptionable.

2.8.178 Each state in the union has uniformly shewn its preference for a single executive, and generally directed the first executive magistrate to act in certain cases by the advice of an executive council. Reason, and the experience of enlightened nations, seem justly to assign the business of making laws to numerous assemblies; and the execution of them, principally, to the direction and care of one man. Independent of practice, a single man seems to be peculiarly well circumstanced to superintend the execution of laws with discernment and decision, with promptitude and uniformity: the people usually point out a first man—he is to be seen in civilized as well as uncivilized nations—in republics as well as in other governments. In every large collection of people there must be a visible point serving as a common centre in the government, towards which to draw their eyes and attachments. The constitution must fix a man, or a congress of men, superior in the opinion of the people to the most popular men in the different parts of the community, else the people will be apt to divide and follow their respective leaders.[106] Aspiring men, armies and navies, have not often been kept in tolerable order by the decrees of a senate or an executive council. The advocates for lodging the executive power in the hands of a number of equals, as an executive council, say, that much wisdom may be collected in such a council, and that it will be safe; but they agree, that it cannot be so prompt and responsible as a single man—they admit that such a council will generally consist of the aristocracy, and not stand so indifferent between it and the people as a first magistrate. But the principal objection made to a single man is, that when possessed of power he will be constantly struggling for more, disturbing the government, and encroaching on the rights of others. It must be admitted, that men, from the monarch down to the porter, are constantly aiming at power and importance; and this propensity must be as constantly guarded against in the forms of the government. Adequate powers must be delegated to those who govern, and our security must be in limiting, defining, and guarding the exercise of them, so that those given shall not be abused, or made use of for openly or secretly seizing more. Why do we believe this abuse of power peculiar to a first magistrate? Is it because in the wars and contests of men, one man has often established his power over the rest? Or are men naturally fond of accumulating powers in the hands of one man? I do not see any similitude between the cases of those tyrants, who have sprung up in the midst of wars and tumults, and the cases of limited executives in established governments; nor shall we, on a careful examination, discover much likeness between the executives in Sweden, Denmark, Holland, &c. which have, from time to time, increased their powers, and become more absolute, and the executives, whose powers are well ascertained and defined, and which remain, by the constitution, only for a short and limited period in the hands of any one man or family. A single man, or family, can long and effectually direct its exertions to one point. There may be many favourable opportunities in the course of a man's life to seize on additional powers, and many more where powers are hereditary; and there are many circumstances favourable to usurpations, where the powers of the man or family are undefined, and such as often may be unduly extended before the people discover it. If we examine history attentively, we shall find that such exertions, such opportunities, and such circumstances as these have attended all the executives which have usurped upon the rights of the people, and which appear originally to have been, in some degree, limited. Admitting that moderate and even well defined powers, long in the hands of the same man or family, will, probably, be unreasonably increased, it will not follow that even extensive powers placed in the hands of a man only for a few years will be abused. The Roman consuls and Carthagenian suffetes possessed extensive powers while in office; but being annually appointed, they but seldom, if ever, abused them. The Roman dictators often possessed absolute power while in office; but usually being elected for short periods of time, no one of them for ages usurped upon the rights of the people. The kings of France, Spain, Sweden, Denmark, &c. have become absolute merely from the encroachments and abuse of power made by the nobles. As to kings, and limited monarchs, generally, history furnishes many more instances in which their powers have been abridged or annihilated by the nobles or people, or both, than in which they have been increased or made absolute; and in almost all the latter cases we find the people were inattentive and fickle, and evidently were not born to be free. I am the more particular respecting this subject, because I have heard many mistaken observations relative to it. Men of property, and even men who hold powers for themselves and posterity, have too much to lose, wantonly to hazard a shock of the political system; the game must be large, and the chance of winning great, to induce them to risque what they have, for the uncertain prospect of gaining more. Our executive may be altogether elective, and possess no power, but as the substitute of the people, and that well limited, and only for a limited time. The great object is, in a republican government, to guard effectually against perpetuating any portion of power, great or small, in the same man or family; this perpetuation of power is totally uncongenial to the true spirit of republican governments: on the one hand the first executive magistrate ought to remain in office so long as to avoid instability in the execution of the laws; on the other, not so long as to enable him to take any measures to establish himself. The convention, it seems, first agreed that the president should be chosen for seven years, and never after to be eligible. Whether seven years is a period too long or not, is rather matter of opinion; but clear it is, that this mode is infinitely preferable to the one finally adopted. When a man shall get the chair, who may be re-elected, from time to time, for life, his greatest object will be to keep it; to gain friends and votes, at any rate; to associate some favourite son with himself, to take the office after him: whenever he shall have any prospect of continuing the office in himself and family, he will spare no artifice, no address, and no exertions, to increase the powers and importance of it; the servile supporters of his wishes will be placed in all offices, and tools constantly employed to aid his views and sound his praise. A man so situated will have no permanent interest in the government to lose, by contests and convulsions in the state, but always much to gain, and frequently the seducing and flattering hope of succeeding. If we reason at all on the subject, we must irresistably conclude, that this will be the case with nine-tenths of the presidents; we may have, for the first president, and, perhaps, one in a century or two afterwards (if the government should withstand the attacks of others) a great and good man, governed by superior motives; but these are not events to be calculated upon in the present state of human nature.

2.8.179 A man chosen to this important office for a limited period, and always afterwards rendered, by the constitution, ineligible, will be governed by very different considerations: he can have no rational hopes or expectations of retaining his office after the expiration of a known limited time, or of continuing the office in his family, as by the constitution there must be a constant transfer of it from one man to another, and consequently from one family to another. No man will wish to be a mere cypher at the head of the government: the great object of each president then will be, to render his government a glorious period in the annals of his country. When a man constitutionally retires from office, he retires without pain; he is sensible he retires because the laws direct it, and not from the success of his rivals, nor with that public disapprobation which being left out, when eligible, implies. It is said, that a man knowing that at a given period he must quit his office, will unjustly attempt to take from the public, and lay in store the means of support and splendour in his retirement;[107] there can, I think, be but very little in this observation. The same constitution that makes a man eligible for a given period only, ought to make no man eligible till he arrive to the age of forty or forty-five years: if he be a man of fortune, he will retire with dignity to his estate; if not, he may, like the Roman consuls, and other eminent characters in republics, find an honorable support and employment in some respectable office. A man who must, at all events, thus leave his office, will have but few or no temptations to fill its dependant offices with his tools, or any particular set of men; whereas the man constantly looking forward to his future elections, and, perhaps, to the aggrandizement of his family, will have every inducement before him to fill all places with his own props and dependants. As to public monies, the president need handle none of them, and he may always rigidly be made account for every shilling he shall receive.

On the whole, it would be, in my opinion, almost as well to create a limited monarchy at once, and give some family permanent power and interest in the community, and let it have something valuable to itself to lose in convulsions in the state, and in attempts of usurpation, as to make a first magistrate eligible for life, and to create hopes and expectations in him and his family, of obtaining what they have not. In the latter case, we actually tempt them to disturb the state, to foment struggles and contests, by laying before them the flattering prospect of gaining much in them without risking any thing. 2.8.180

The constitution provides only that the president shall hold his office during the term of four years; that, at most, only implies, that one shall be chosen every fourth year; it also provides, that in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the president and vice-president, congress may declare what officer shall act as president; and that such officers shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a president shall be elected: it also provides that congress may determine the time of chusing electors, and the day on which they shall give their votes. Considering these clauses together, I submit this question—whether in case of a vacancy in the office of president, by the removal, death, resignation, or inability of the president and vice-president, and congress should declare, that a certain officer, as secretary for foreign affairs, for instance, shall act as president, and suffer such officer to continue several years, or even for his life, to act as president, by omitting to appoint the time for chusing electors of another president, it would be any breach of the constitution? This appears to me to be an intended provision for supplying the office of president, not only for any remaining portion of the four years, but in cases of emergency, until another president shall be elected; and that at a period beyond the expiration of the four years: we do not know that it is impossible; we do not know that it is improbable, in case a popular officer should thus be declared the acting president, but that he might continue for 2.8.181 life, and without any violent act, but merely by neglects and delays on the part of congress.

2.8.182 I shall conclude my observations on the organization of the legislature and executive, with making some remarks, rather as a matter of amusement, on the branch, or partial negative, in the legislation:—The third branch in the legislature may answer three valuable purposes, to impede in their passage hasty and intemperate laws, occasionally to assist the senate or people, and to prevent the legislature from encroaching upon the executive or judiciary. In Great Britain the king has a complete negative upon all laws, but he very seldom exercises it. This may be well lodged in him, who possesses strength to support it, and whose family has independent and hereditary interests and powers, rights and prerogatives, in the government, to defend: but in a country where the first executive officer is elective, and has no rights, but in common with the people, a partial negative in legislation, as in Massachusetts and New-York, is, in my opinion, clearly best: in the former state, as before observed, it is lodged in the governor alone; in the latter, in the governor, chancellor, and judges of the supreme court—the new constitution lodges it in the president. This is simply a branch of legislative power, and has in itself no relation to executive or judicial powers. The question is, in what hands ought it to be lodged, to answer the three purposes mentioned the most advantageously? The prevailing opinion seems to be in favour of vesting it in the hands of the first executive magistrate. I will not say this opinion is ill founded. The negative, in one case, is intended to prevent hasty laws, not supported and revised by two-thirds of each of the two branches; in the second, it is to aid the weaker branch; and in the third, to defend the executive and judiciary. To answer these ends, there ought, therefore, to be collected in the hands which hold this negative, firmness, wisdom, and strength; the very object of the negative is occasional opposition to the two branches. By lodging it in the executive magistrate, we give him a share in making the laws, which he must execute; by associating the judges with him, as in New York, we give them a share in making the laws, upon which they must decide as judicial magistrates; this may be a reason for excluding the judges: however, the negative in New-York is certainly well calculated to answer its great purposes: the governor and judges united must possess more firmness and strength, more wisdom and information, than either alone, and also more of the confidence of the people; and as to the balance among the departments, why should the executive alone hold the scales, and the judicial be left defenceless? I think the negative in New-York is found best in practice; we see it there frequently and wisely put upon the measures of the two branches; whereas in Massachusetts it is hardly ever exercised, and the governor, I believe, has often permitted laws to pass to which he had substantial objections, but did not make them; he, however, it is to be observed, is annually elected.

The Federal Farmer.

XV

January 18, 1788.

Dear Sir,

Before I proceed to examine particularly the powers vested, or which ought to be, vested in each branch of the proposed government, I shall briefly examine the organization of the remaining branch, the judicial, referring the particular examining of its powers to some future letters.[108] 2.8.183

In forming this branch, our objects are—a fair and open, a wise and impartial interpretation of the laws—a prompt and impartial administration of justice, between the public and individuals, and between man and man. I believe, there is no feature in a free government more difficult to be well formed than this, especially in an extensive country, where the courts must be numerous, or the citizens travel to obtain justice. 2.8.184

The confederation impowers congress to institute judicial courts in four cases. 1. For settling disputes between individual states. 2. For determining, finally, appeals in all cases of captures. 3. For the trial of piracies and felonies committed on the high seas: And, 4. For the administration of martial law in the army and navy. The state courts in all other cases possess the judicial powers, in all questions arising on the laws of nations, of the union, and the states individually—nor does congress appear to have any controul over state courts, judges or officers. The business of the judicial department is, properly speaking, judicial in part, in part executive, done by judges and juries, by certain recording and executive officers, as clerks, sheriffs, etc. they are all properly limbs, or parts, of the judicial courts, and have it in charge, faithfully to decide upon, and execute the laws, in judicial cases, between the public and individuals, between man and man. The recording and executive officers, in this department, may well enough be formed by legislative acts, from time to time: but the offices, the situation, the powers and duties of judges and juries, are too important, as they respect the political system, as well as the administration of justice, not to be fixed on general principles by the constitution. It is true, the laws are made by the legislature; but the judges and juries, in their interpretations, and in directing the execution of them, have a very extensive influence for preserving or destroying liberty, and for changing the nature of the government. It is an observation of an approved writer, that judicial power is of such a nature, that when we have ascertained and fixed its limits, with all the caution and precision we can, it will yet be formidable, somewhat arbitrary and despotic—that is, after all our cares, we must leave a vast deal to the discretion and interpretation—to the wisdom, integrity, and politics of the judges[109]—These men, such is the state even of the best laws, may do wrong, perhaps, in a thousand cases, sometimes with, and sometimes without design, yet it may be impracticable to convict them of misconduct. These considerations shew, how cautious a free people ought to be in form- 2.8.185

ing this, as well as the other branches of their government, especially when connected with other considerations equally deserving of notice and attention. When the legislature makes a bad law, or the first executive magistrates usurp upon the rights of the people, they discover the evil much sooner, than the abuses of power in the judicial department; the proceedings of which are far more intricate, complex, and out of their immediate view. A bad law immediately excites a general alarm; a bad judicial determination, though not less pernicious in its consequences, is immediately felt, probably, by a single individual only, and noticed only by his neighbours, and a few spectators in the court. In this country, we have been always jealous of the legislature, and especially the executive; but not always of the judiciary: but very few men attentively consider the essential parts of it, and its proceedings, as they tend to support or to destroy free government: only a few professional men are in a situation properly to do this; and it is often alledged, that instances have not frequently occurred, in which they have been found very alert watchmen in the cause of liberty, or in the cause of democratic republics. Add to these considerations, that particular circumstances exist at this time to increase our inattention to limiting properly the judicial powers, we may fairly conclude, we are more in danger of sowing the seeds of arbitrary government in this department than in any other.[110] In the unsettled state of things in this country, for several years past, it has been thought, that our popular legislatures have, sometimes, departed from the line of strict justice, while the law courts have shewn a disposition more punctually to keep to it. We are not sufficiently attentive to the circumstances, that the measures of popular legislatures naturally settle down in time, and gradually approach a mild and just medium; while the rigid systems of the law courts naturally become more severe and arbitrary, if not carefully tempered and guarded by the constitution, and by laws, from time to time. It is true, much has been written and said about some of these courts lately, in some of the states; but all has been about their fees, &c. and but very little to the purposes, as to their influence upon the freedom of the government.

2.8.186 By art. 3. sect. 1. the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts, as congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish—the judges of them to hold their offices during good behaviour, and to receive, at stated times, a compensation for their services, which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office; but which, I conceive, may be increased. By the same art. sect. 2. the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction, "in all cases affecting ambassadors, and other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, and appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, in all other federal causes, with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the congress shall make." By the same section, the judicial power shall extend in law and equity to all the federal cases therein enumerated. By the same section the jury trial, in criminal causes, except in cases of impeachment, is established; but not in civil causes, and the whole state may be considered as the vicinage in cases of crimes. These clauses present to view the constitutional features of the federal judiciary: this has been called a monster by some of the opponents, and some, even of the able advocates, have confessed they do not comprehend it. For myself, I confess, I see some good things in it, and some very extraordinary ones. "There shall be one supreme court." There ought in every government to be one court, in which all great questions in law shall finally meet and be determined: in Great-Britain, this is the house of lords, aided by all the superior judges; in Massachusetts, it is, at present, the supreme judicial court, consisting of five judges; in New-York, by the constitution, it is a court consisting of the president of the senate, the senators, chancellor and judges of the supreme court; and in the United States the federal supreme court, or this court in the last report, may, by the legislature, be made to consist of three, five, fifty, or any other number of judges. The inferior federal courts are left by the constitution to be instituted and regulated altogether as the legislature shall judge best; and it is well provided, that the judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour. I shall not object to the line drawn between the original and appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court; though should we for safety, &c. be obliged to form a numerous supreme court, and place in it a considerable number of respectable characters, it will be found inconvenient for such a court, originally, to try all the causes affecting ambassadors, consuls, &c. Appeals may be carried up to the supreme court, under such regulations as congress shall make. Thus far the legislature does not appear to be limited to improper [proper?] rules or principles in instituting judicial courts: indeed the legislature will have full power to form and arrange judicial courts in the federal cases enumerated, at pleasure, with these eight exceptions only. 1. There can be but one supreme federal judicial court. 2. This must have jurisdiction as to law and fact in the appellate causes. 3. Original jurisdiction, when foreign ministers and the states are concerned. 4. The judges of the judicial courts must continue in office during good behaviour—and, 5. Their salaries cannot be diminished while in office. 6. There must be a jury trial in criminal causes. 7. The trial of crimes must be in the state where committed—and, 8. There must be two witnesses to convict of treason.

In all other respects Congress may organize the judicial department according to their discretion; the importance of this power, among others proposed by the legislature (perhaps necessarily) I shall consider hereafter. Though there must, by the constitution, be but one judicial court, in which all the rays of judicial powers as to law, equity, and fact, in the cases enumerated must meet; yet this may be made by the legislature, a special court, consisting of any number of respectable characters or officers, the federal legislators excepted, to superintend the judicial department, to try 2.8.187 the few causes in which foreign ministers and the states may be concerned, and to correct errors, as to law and fact, in certain important causes on appeals. Next below this judicial head, there may be several courts, such as are usually called superior courts, as a court of chancery, a court of criminal jurisdiction, a court of civil jurisdiction, a court of admiralty jurisdiction, a court of exchequer, &c. giving an appeal from these respectively to the supreme judicial court. These superior courts may be considered as so many points to which appeals may be brought up, from the various inferior courts, in the several branches of judicial causes. In all these superior and inferior courts, the trial by jury may be established in all cases, and the law and equity properly separated. In this organization, only a few very important causes, probably, would be carried up to the supreme court.—The superior courts would, finally, settle almost all causes. This organization, so far as it would respect questions of law, inferior, superior, and a special supreme court, would resemble that of New-York in a considerable degree, and those of several other states. This, I imagine, we must adopt, or else the Massachusetts plan; that is, a number of inferior courts, and one superior or supreme court, consisting of three, or five, or seven judges, in which one supreme court all the business shall be immediately collected from the inferior ones. The decision of the inferior courts, on either plan, probably will not much be relied on; and on the latter plan, there must be a prodigious accumulation of powers and business in all cases touching law, equity and facts, and all kinds of causes in a few hands, for whose errors of ignorance or design, there will be no possible remedy. As the legislature may adopt either of these, or any other plan, I shall not dwell longer on this subject.

2.8.188 In examining the federal judiciary, there appears to be some things very extraordinary and very peculiar. The judges or their friends may seize every opportunity to raise the judges salaries; but by the constitution they cannot be diminished. I am sensible how important it is that judges shall always have adequate and certain support; I am against their depending upon annual or periodical grants, because these may be withheld, or rendered too small by the dissent or narrowness of any one branch of the legislature; but there is a material distinction between periodical grants, and salaries held under permanent and standing laws: the former at stated periods cease, and must be renewed by the consent of all and every part of the legislature; the latter continue of course, and never will cease or be lowered, unless all parts of the legislature agree to do it. A man has as permanent an interest in his salary fixed by a standing law, so long as he may remain in office, as in any property he may possess; for the laws regulating the tenure of all property, are always liable to be altered by the legislature. The same judge may frequently be in office thirty or forty years; there may often be times, as in cases of war, or very high prices, when his salary may reasonably be increased one half or more; in a few years money may become scarce again, and prices fall, and his salary, with equal reason and propriety be decreased and lowered: not to suffer this to be done by consent of all the branches of the legislature, is, I believe, quite a novelty in the affairs of government. It is true, by a very forced and unnatural construction, the constitution of Massachusetts, by the governor and minority in the legislature, was made to speak this kind of language. Another circumstance ought to be considered; the mines which have been discovered are gradually exhausted, and the precious metals are continually wasting: hence the probability is, that money, the nominal representative of property, will gradually grow scarcer hereafter, and afford just reasons for gradually lowering salaries. The value of money depends altogether upon the quantity of it in circulation, which may be also decreased, as well as encreased, from a great variety of causes.

The supreme court, in cases of appeals, shall have jurisdiction both as to law and fact: that is, in all civil causes carried up the supreme court by appeals, the court, or judges, shall try the fact and decide the law. Here an essential principle of the civil law is established, and the most noble and important principle of the common law exploded. To dwell a few minutes on this material point: the supreme court shall have jurisdiction both as to law and fact. What is meant by court? Is the jury included in the term, or is it not?[111] I conceive it is not included: and so the members of convention, I am very sure, understand it. Court, or curia, was a term well understood long before juries existed; the people, and the best writers, in countries where there are no juries, uniformly use the word court, and can only mean by it the judge or judges who determine causes: also, in countries where there are juries we express ourselves in the same manner; we speak of the court of probate, court of chancery, justices court, alderman's court, &c. in which there is no jury. In our supreme courts, common pleas, &c. in which there are jury trials, we uniformly speak of the court and jury, and consider them as distinct. Were it necessary I might site a multitude of cases from law books to confirm, beyond controversy, this position, that the jury is not included, or a part of the court. 2.8.189

But the supreme court is to have jurisdiction as to law and fact, under such regulations as congress shall make. I confess it is impossible to say how far congress may, with propriety, extend their regulations in this respect. I conceive, however, they cannot by any reasonable construction go so far as to admit the jury, on true common law principles, to try the fact, and give a general verdict. I have repeatedly examined this article: I think the meaning of it is, that the judges in all final questions, as to property and damages, shall have complete jurisdiction, to consider the whole cause, to examine the facts, and on a general view of them, and on principles of equity, as well as law, to give judgment.

As the trial by jury is provided for in criminal causes, I shall confine my observations to civil causes—and in these, I hold it is the established right of 2.8.190 the jury by the common law, and the fundamental laws of this country, to give a general verdict in all cases when they chuse to do it, to decide both as to law and fact, whenever blended together in the issue put to them. Their right to determine as to facts will not be disputed, and their right to give a general verdict has never been disputed, except by a few judges and lawyers, governed by despotic principles. Coke, Hale, Holt, Blackstone, De Lome, and almost every other legal or political writer, who has written on the subject, has uniformly asserted this essential and important right of the jury. Juries in Great-Britain and America have universally practised accordingly. Even Mansfield, with all his wishes about him, dare not directly avow the contrary. What fully confirms this point is, that there is no instance to be found, where a jury was ever punished for finding a general verdict, when a special one might, with propriety, have been found. The jury trial, especially politically considered, is by far the most important feature in the judicial department in a free country, and the right in question is far the most valuable part, and the last that ought to be yielded, of this trial.[112] Juries are constantly and frequently drawn from the body of the people, and freemen of the country; and by holding the jury's right to return a general verdict in all cases sacred, we secure to the people at large, their just and rightful controul in the judicial department. If the conduct of judges shall be severe and arbitrary, and tend to subvert the laws, and change the forms of government, the jury may check them, by deciding against their opinions and determinations, in similar cases. It is true, the freemen of a country are not always minutely skilled in the laws, but they have common sense in its purity, which seldom or never errs in making and applying laws to the condition of the people, or in determining judicial causes, when stated to them by the parties. The body of the people, principally, bear the burdens of the community; they of right ought to have a controul in its important concerns, both in making and executing the laws, otherwise they may, in a short time, be ruined. Nor is it merely this controul alone we are to attend to: the jury trial brings with it an open and public discussion of all causes, and excludes secret and arbitrary proceedings. This, and the democratic branch in the legislature, as was formerly observed, are the means by which the people are let into the knowledge of public affairs—are enabled to stand as the guardians of each others rights, and to restrain, by regular and legal measures, those who otherwise might infringe upon them. I am not unsupported in my opinion of the value of the trial by jury; not only British and American writers, but De Lome, and the most approved foreign writers, hold it to be the most valuable part of the British constitution, and indisputably the best mode of trial ever invented.

2.8.191 It was merely by the intrigues of the popish clergy, and of the Norman lawyers, that this mode of trial was not used in maritime, ecclesiastical, and military courts, and the civil law proceedings were introduced; and, I believe, it is more from custom and prejudice, than for any substantial reasons, that we do not in all the states establish the jury in our maritime as well as other courts.

In the civil law process the trial by jury is unknown; the consequence is, 2.8.192 that a few judges and dependant officers, possess all the power in the judicial department. Instead of the open fair proceedings of the common law, where witnesses are examined in open court, and may be cross examined by the parties concerned—where council is allowed, &c. we see in the civil law process judges alone, who always, long previous to the trial, are known and often corrupted by ministerial influence, or by parties. Judges once influenced, soon become inclined to yield to temptations, and to decree for him who will pay the most for their partiality. It is, therefore, we find in the Roman, and almost all governments, where judges alone possess the judicial powers and try all cases, that bribery has prevailed. This, as well as the forms of the courts, naturally lead to secret and arbitrary proceedings—to taking evidence secretly—exparte, &c. to perplexing the cause—and to hasty decisions:—but, as to jurors, it is quite impracticable to bribe or influence them by any corrupt means; not only because they are untaught in such affairs, and possess the honest characters of the common freemen of a country; but because it is not, generally, known till the hour the cause comes on for trial, what persons are to form the jury.

But it is said, that no words could be found by which the states could 2.8.193 agree to establish the jury-trial in civil causes.[113] I can hardly believe men to be serious, who make observations to this effect. The states have all derived judicial proceedings principally from one source, the British system; from the same common source the American lawyers have almost universally drawn their legal information. All the states have agreed to establish the trial by jury, in civil as well as in criminal causes. The several states, in congress, found no difficulty in establishing it in the Western Territory, in the ordinance passed in July 1787. We find, that the several states in congress, in establishing government in that territory, agreed, that the inhabitants of it, should always be entitled to the benefit of the trial by jury. Thus, in a few words, the jury trial is established in its full extent; and the convention with as much ease, have established the jury trial in criminal cases. In making a constitution, we are substantially to fix principles.—If in one state, damages on default are assessed by a jury, and in another by the judges—if in one state jurors are drawn out of a box, and in another not—if there be other trifling variations, they can be of no importance in the great question. Further, when we examine the particular practices of the states, in little matters in judicial proceedings, I believe we shall find they differ near as much in criminal processes as in civil ones. Another thing worthy of notice in this place—the convention have used the word equity, and agreed to establish a chancery jurisdiction; about the meaning and extent of which, we all know, the several states disagree much more than about jury trials—in adopting the latter, they have very generally pursued the British plan; but as to the former, we see the states have varied, as their fears and opinions dictated.

2.8.194 By the common law, in Great Britain and America, there is no appeal from the verdict of the jury, as to facts, to any judges whatever—the jurisdiction of the jury is complete and final in this; and only errors in law are carried up to the house of lords, the special supreme court in Great Britain; or to the special supreme courts in Connecticut, New-York, New-Jersey, &c. Thus the juries are left masters as to facts: but, by the proposed constitution, directly the opposite principle is established. An appeal will lay in all appellate causes from the verdict of the jury, even as to mere facts, to the judges of the supreme court. Thus, in effect, we establish the civil law in this point; for if the jurisdiction of the jury be not final, as to facts, it is of little or no importance.

2.8.195 By art. 3. sect. 2. "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States," &c. What is here meant by equity? what is equity in a case arising under the constitution?[114] possibly the clause might have the same meaning, were the words "in law and equity," omitted. Cases in law must differ widely from cases in law and equity. At first view, by thus joining the word equity with the word law, if we mean any thing, we seem to mean to give the judge a discretionary power. The word equity, in Great Britain, has in time acquired a precise meaning—chancery proceedings there are now reduced to system—but this is not the case in the United States. In New-England, the judicial courts have no powers in cases in equity, except those dealt out to them by the legislature, in certain limited portions, by legislative acts. In New-York, Maryland, Virginia, and South-Carolina, powers to decide, in cases of equity, are vested in judges distinct from those who decide in matters of law: and the states generally seem to have carefully avoided giving unlimitedly, to the same judges, powers to decide in cases in law and equity. Perhaps, the clause would have the same meaning were the words, "this constitution," omitted: there is in it either a careless complex misuse of words, in themselves of extensive signification, or there is some meaning not easy to be comprehended. Suppose a case arising under the constitution—suppose the question judicially moved, whether, by the constitution, congress can suppress a state tax laid on polls, lands, or as an excise duty, which may be supposed to interfere with a federal tax. By the letter of the constitution, congress will appear to have no power to do it: but then the judges may decide the question on principles of equity as well as law. Now, omitting the words, "in law and equity," they may decide according to the spirit and true meaning of the constitution, as collected from what must appear to have been the intentions of the people when they made it. Therefore, it would seem, that if these words mean any thing, they must have a further meaning: yet I will not suppose it intended to lodge an arbitrary power or discretion in the judges, to decide as their conscience, their opinions, their caprice, or their politics might dictate. Without dwelling on this obscure clause, I will leave it to the examination of others.

The Federal Farmer.

XVI

January 20, 1788.

Dear Sir,

Having gone through with the organization of the government, I shall now proceed to examine more particularly those clauses which respect its powers. I shall begin with those articles and stipulations which are necessary for accurately ascertaining the extent of powers, and what is given, and for guarding, limiting, and restraining them in their exercise.[115] We often find, these articles and stipulations placed in bills of rights; but they may as well be incorporated in the body of the constitution, as selected and placed by themselves. The constitution, or whole social compact, is but one instrument, no more or less, than a certain number of articles or stipulations agreed to by the people, whether it consists of articles, sections, chapters, bills of rights, or parts of any other denomination, cannot be material. Many needless observations, and idle distinctions, in my opinion, have been made respecting a bill of rights. On the one hand, it seems to be considered as a necessary distinct limb of the constitution, and as containing a certain number of very valuable articles, which are applicable to all societies: and, on the other, as useless, especially in a federal government, possessing only enumerated power—nay, dangerous, as individual rights are numerous, and not easy to be enumerated in a bill of rights, and from articles, or stipulations, securing some of them, it may be inferred, that others not mentioned are surrendered.[116] There appears to me to be general indefinite propositions without much meaning—and the man who first advanced those of the latter description, in the present case, signed the federal constitution, which directly contradicts him.[117] The supreme power is undoubtedly in the people, and it is a principle well established in my mind, that they reserve all powers not expressly delegated by them to those who govern; this is as true in forming a state as in forming a federal government. There is no possible distinction but this founded merely in the different modes of proceeding which take place in some cases. In forming a state constitution, under which to manage not only the great but the little concerns of a community: the powers to be possessed by the government are often too numerous to be enumerated; the people to adopt the shortest way often give general powers, indeed all powers, to the government, in some general words, and then, by a particular enumeration, take back, or rather say they however reserve certain rights as sacred, and which no laws shall be made to violate: hence the idea that all powers are given which are not reserved: but in forming a federal constitution, which ex vi termine, supposes state governments existing, and which is only to manage a few great national concerns, we often find it easier to enumerate particularly the powers to be delegated to the federal head, than to enumerate particularly the individual rights to be reserved; and the principle will operate in its full force, when we carefully adhere to it. When we particularly enumerate the powers given, we ought either carefully to enumerate the rights reserved, or be totally silent about them; we must either particularly enumerate both, or else suppose the particular enumeration of the powers given adequately draws the line between them and the rights reserved, particularly to enumerate the former and not the latter, I think most advisable: however, as men appear generally to have their doubts about these silent reservations, we might advantageously enumerate the powers given, and then in general words, according to the mode adopted in the 2d art. of the confederation, declare all powers, rights and privileges, are reserved, which are not explicitly and expressly given up. People, and very wisely too, like to be express and explicit about their essential rights, and not to be forced to claim them on the precarious and unascertained tenure of inferences and general principles, knowing that in any controversy between them and their rulers, concerning those rights, disputes may be endless, and nothing certain:—But admitting, on the general principle, that all rights are reserved of course, which are not expressly surrendered, the people could with sufficient certainty assert their rights on all occasions, and establish them with ease, still there are infinite advantages in particularly enumerating many of the most essential rights reserved in all cases; and as to the less important ones, we may declare in general terms, that all not expressly surrendered are reserved. We do not by declarations change the nature of things, or create new truths, but we give existence, or at least establish in the minds of the people truths and principles which they might never otherwise have thought of, or soon forgot. If a nation means its systems, religious or political, shall have duration, it ought to recognize the leading principles of them in the front page of every family book. What is the usefulness of a truth in theory, unless it exists constantly in the minds of the people, and has their assent:—we discern certain rights, as the freedom of the press, and the trial by jury, &c. which the people of England and of America of course believe to be sacred, and essential to their political happiness, and this belief in them is the result of ideas at first suggested to them by a few able men, and of subsequent experience; while the people of some other countries hear these rights mentioned with the utmost indifference; they think the privilege of existing at the will of a despot much preferable to them. Why this difference amongst beings every way formed alike. The reason of the difference is obvious—it is the effect of education, a series of notions impressed upon the minds of the people by examples, precepts and declarations. When the people of England got together, at the time they formed Magna Charta, they did not consider it sufficient, that they were indisputably entitled to certain natural and unalienable rights, not depending on silent titles, they, by a declaratory act, expressly recognized them, and explicitly declared to all the world, that they were entitled to enjoy those rights; they made an instrument in writing, and enumerated those they then thought essential, or in danger, and this wise men saw was not sufficient; and therefore, that the people might not forget these rights, and gradually become prepared for arbitrary government, their discerning and honest leaders caused this instrument to be confirmed near forty times, and to be read twice a year in public places, not that it would lose its validity without such confirmations, but to fix the contents of it in the minds of the people, as they successively come upon the stage.—Men, in some countries do not remain free, merely because they are entitled to natural and unalienable rights; men in all countries are entitled to them, not because their ancestors once got together and enumerated them on paper, but because, by repeated negociations and declarations, all parties are brought to realize them, and of course to believe them to be sacred. Were it necessary, I might shew the wisdom of our past conduct, as a people in not merely comforting ourselves that we were entitled to freedom, but in constantly keeping in view, in addresses, bills of rights, in news-papers, &c. the particular principles on which our freedom must always depend.[118]

2.8.196

It is not merely in this point of view, that I urge the engrafting in the 2.8.197 constitution additional declaratory articles. The distinction, in itself just, that all powers not given are reserved, is in effect destroyed by this very constitution, as I shall particularly demonstrate—and even independent of this, the people, by adopting the constitution, give many general undefined powers to congress, in the constitutional exercise of which, the rights in question may be effected. Gentlemen who oppose a federal bill of rights, or further declaratory articles, seem to view the subject in a very narrow imperfect manner. These have for their objects, not only the enumeration of the rights reserved, but principally to explain the general powers delegated in certain material points, and to restrain those who exercise them by fixed known boundaries. Many explanations and restrictions necessary and useful, would be much less so, were the people at large all well and fully acquainted with the principles and affairs of government. There appears to be in the constitution, a studied brevity, and it may also be probable, that several explanatory articles were omitted from a circumstance very common. What we have long and early understood ourselves in the common concerns of the community, we are apt to suppose is understood by others, and need not be expressed; and it is not unnatural or uncommon for the ablest men most frequently to make this mistake. To make declaratory articles unnecessary in an instrument of government, two circumstances must exist; the rights reserved must be indisputably so, and in their nature defined; the powers delegated to the government, must be precisely defined by the words that convey them, and clearly be of such extent and nature as that, by no reasonable construction, they can be made to invade the rights and prerogatives intended to be left in the people.

2.8.198 The first point urged, is, that all power is reserved not expressly given, that particular enumerated powers only are given, that all others are not given, but reserved, and that it is needless to attempt to restrian congress in the exercise of powers they possess not. This reasoning is logical, but of very little importance in the common affairs of men; but the constitution does not appear to respect it even in any view. To prove this, I might cite several clauses in it. I shall only remark on two or three. By article 1, section 9, "No title of nobility shall be granted by congress" Was this clause omitted, what power would congress have to make titles of nobility? in what part of the constitution would they find it? The answer must be, that congress would have no such power—that the people, by adopting the constitution, will not part with it. Why then by a negative clause, restrain congress from doing what it would have no power to do? This clause, then, must have no meaning, or imply, that were it omitted, congress would have the power in question, either upon the principle that some general words in the constitution may be so construed as to give it, or on the principle that congress possess the powers not expressly reserved. But this clause was in the confederation, and is said to be introduced into the constitution from very great caution. Even a cautionary provision implies a doubt, at least, that it is necessary; and if so in this case, clearly it is also alike necessary in all similar ones. The fact appears to be, that the people in forming the confederation, and the convention, in this instance, acted, naturally, they did not leave the point to be settled by general principles and logical inferences; but they settle the point in a few words, and all who read them at once understand them.

2.8.199 The trial by jury in criminal as well as in civil causes, has long been considered as one of our fundamental rights, and has been repeatedly recognized and confirmed by most of the state conventions.[119] But the constitution expressly establishes this trial in criminal, and wholly omits it in civil causes. The jury trial in criminal causes, and the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, are already as effectually established as any of the fundamental or essential rights of the people in the United States. This being the case, why in adopting a federal constitution do we now establish these, and omit all others, or all others, at least with a few exceptions, such as again agreeing there shall be no ex post facto laws, no titles of nobility, &c. We must consider this constitution, when adopted, as the supreme act of the people, and in construing it hereafter, we and our posterity must strictly adhere to the letter and spirit of it, and in no instance depart from them: in construing the federal constitution, it will be not only impracticable, but improper to refer to the state constitutions. They are entirely distinct instruments and inferior acts: besides, by the people's now establishing certain fundamental rights, it is strongly implied, that they are of opinion, that they would not otherwise be secured as a part of the federal system, or be regarded in the federal administration as fundamental. Further, these same rights, being established by the state constitutions, and secured to the people, our recognizing them now, implies, that the people thought them insecure by the state establishments, and extinguished or put afloat by the new arrangement of the social system, unless re-established.—Further, the people, thus establishing some few rights, and remaining totally silent about others similarly circumstanced, the implication indubitably is, that they mean to relinquish the latter, or at least feel indifferent about them. Rights, therefore, inferred from general principles of reason, being precarious and hardly ascertainable in the common affairs of society, and the people, in forming a federal constitution, explicitly shewing they conceive these rights to be thus circumstanced, and accordingly proceed to enumerate and establish some of them, the conclusion will be, that they have established all which they esteem valuable and sacred. On every principle, then, the people especially having began, ought to go through enumerating, and establish particularly all the rights of individuals, which can by any possibility come in question in making and executing federal laws. I have already observed upon the excellency and importance of the jury trial in civil as well as in criminal causes, instead of establishing it in criminal causes only; we ought to establish it generally;—instead of the clause of forty or fifty words relative to this subject, why not use the language that has always been used in this country, and say, "the people of the United States shall always be entitled to the trial by jury." This would shew the people still hold the right sacred, and enjoin it upon congress substantially to preserve the jury trial in all cases, according to the usage and custom of the country. I have observed before, that it is the jury trial we want; the little different appendages and modifications tacked to it in the different states, are no more than a drop in the ocean: the jury trial is a solid uniform feature in a free government; it is the substance we would save, not the little articles of form.

Security against expost facto laws, the trial by jury, and the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, are but a part of those inestimable rights the people of the United States are entitled to, even in judicial proceedings, by the course of the common law. These may be secured in general words, as in New-York, the Western Territory, &c. by declaring the people of the United States shall always be entitled to judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, as used and established in the said states. Perhaps it would be better to enumerate the particular essential rights the people are entitled to in these proceedings, as has been done in many of the states, and as has been done in England. In this case, the people may proceed to declare, that no man shall be held to answer to any offence, till the same be fully described to him; nor to furnish evidence against himself: that, except in the government of the army and navy, no person shall be tried for any offence, whereby he may incur loss of life, or an infamous punishment, until he be first indicted by a grand jury: that every person shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favourable to him, and to meet the witnesses against him face to face: that every person shall be entitled to obtain right and justice freely and without delay; that all persons shall have a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches and seizures of their persons, houses, papers, or possessions; and that all warrants shall be deemed contrary to this right, if the foundation of them be not previously supported by oath, and there be not in them a special designation of persons or objects of search, arrest, or seizure: and that no person shall be exiled or molested in his person or effects, otherwise than by the judgment of his peers, or according to the law of the land. A celebrated writer observes upon this last article, that in itself it may be said to comprehend the whole end of political society.[120] These rights are not necessarily reserved, they are established, or enjoyed but in few countries: they are stipulated rights, almost peculiar to British and American laws. In the execution of those laws, individuals, by long custom, by magna charta, bills of rights &c. have become entitled to them. A man, at first, by act of parliament, became entitled to the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus—men are entitled to these rights and benefits in the judicial proceedings of our state courts generally: but it will by no means follow, that they will be entitled to them in the federal courts, and have a right to assert them, unless secured and established by the constitution or federal laws. We certainly, in federal processes, might as well claim the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, as to claim trial by a jury—the right to have council—to have witnesses face to face—to be secure against unreasonable search warrants, &c. was the constitution silent as to the whole of them:—but the establishment of the former, will evince that we could not claim them without it; and the omission of the latter, implies they are relinquished, or deemed of no importance. These are rights and benefits individuals acquire by compact; they must claim them under compacts, or immemorial usage—it is doubtful, at least, whether they can be claimed under immemorial usage in this country; and it is, therefore, we generally claim them under compacts, as charters and constitutions.

2.8.200

2.8.201 The people by adopting the federal constitution, give congress general powers to institute a distinct and new judiciary, new courts, and to regulate all proceedings in them, under the eight limitations mentioned in a former letter; and the further one, that the benefits of the habeas corpus act shall be enjoyed by individuals. Thus general powers being given to institute courts, and regulate their proceedings, with no provision for securing the rights principally in question, may not congress so exercise those powers, and constitutionally too, as to destroy those rights? clearly, in my opinion, they are not in any degree secured. But, admitting the case is only doubtful, would it not be prudent and wise to secure them and remove all doubts, since all agree the people ought to enjoy these valuable rights, a very few men excepted, who seem to be rather of opinion that there is little or nothing in them? Were it necessary I might add many observations to shew their value and political importance.

The constitution will give congress general powers to raise and support armies. General powers carry with them incidental ones, and the means necessary to the end. In the exercise of these powers, is there any provision in the constitution to prevent the quartering of soldiers on the inhabitants? you will answer, there is not. This may sometimes be deemed a necessary measure in the support of armies; on what principle can the people claim the right to be exempt from this burden? they will urge, perhaps, the practice of the country, and the provisions made in some of the state constitutions—they will be answered, that their claim thus to be exempt is not founded in nature, but only in custom and opinion, or at best, in stipulations in some of the state constitutions, which are local, and inferior in their operation, and can have no controul over the general government—that they had adopted a federal constitution—had noticed several rights, but had been totally silent about this exemption—that they had given general powers relative to the subject, which, in their operation, regularly destroyed the claim. Though it is not to be presumed, that we are in any immediate danger from this quarter, yet it is fit and proper to establish, beyond dispute, those rights which are particularly valuable to individuals, and essential to the permanency and duration of free government. An excellent writer observes, that the English, always in possession of their freedom, are frequently unmindful of the value of it:[121] we, at this period, do not seem to be so well off, having, in some instances abused ours; many of us are quite disposed to barter it away for what we call energy, coercion, and some other terms we use as vaguely as that of liberty—There is often as great a rage for change and novelty in politics, as in amusements and fashions. 2.8.202

All parties apparently agree, that the freedom of the press is a fundamental right, and ought not to be restrained by any taxes, duties, or in any manner whatever. Why should not the people, in adopting a federal constitution, declare this, even if there are only doubts about it. But, say the advocates, all powers not given are reserved:—true; but the great question is, are not powers given, in the excercise of which this right may be destroyed? The people's or the printers claim to a free press, is founded on the fundamental laws, that is, compacts, and state constitutions, made by the people. The people, who can annihilate or alter those constitutions, can annihilate or limit this right. This may be done by giving general powers, as well as by using particular words. No right claimed under a state constitution, will avail against a law of the union, made in pursuance of the federal constitution: therefore the question is, what laws will congress have a right 2.8.203 to make by the constitution of the union, and particularly touching the press? By art. 1. sect. 8. congress will have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excise. By this congress will clearly have power to lay and collect all kind of taxes whatever—taxes on houses, lands, polls, industry, merchandize, &c.—taxes on deeds, bonds, and all written instruments—on writs, pleas, and all judicial proceedings, on licences, naval officers papers, &c. on newspapers, advertisements, &c. and to require bonds of the naval officers, clerks, printers, &c. to account for the taxes that may become due on papers that go through their hands. Printing, like all other business, must cease when taxed beyond its profits; and it appears to me, that a power to tax the press at discretion, is a power to destroy or restrain the freedom of it. There may be other powers given, in the exercise of which this freedom may be effected; and certainly it is of too much importance to be left thus liable to be taxed, and constantly to constructions and inferences. A free press is the channel of communication as to mercantile and public affairs; by means of it the people in large countries ascertain each others sentiments; are enabled to unite, and become formidable to those rulers who adopt improper measures. Newspapers may sometimes be the vehicles of abuse, and of many things not true; but these are but small inconveniencies, in my mind, among many advantages. A celebrated writer, I have several times quoted, speaking in high terms of the English liberties, says, "lastly the key stone was put to the arch, by the final establishment of the freedom of the press."[122] I shall not dwell longer upon the fundamental rights, to some of which I have attended in this letter, for the same reasons that these I have mentioned, ought to be expressly secured, lest in the exercise of general powers given they may be invaded: it is pretty clear, that some other of less importance, or less in danger, might with propriety also be secured.

I shall now proceed to examine briefly the powers proposed to be vested in the several branches of the government, and especially the mode of laying and collecting internal taxes.

The Federal Farmer.

XVII

January 23, 1788.

Dear Sir,

2.8.204 I believe the people of the United States are full in the opinion, that a free and mild government can be preserved in their extensive territories, only under the substantial forms of a federal republic. As several of the ablest advocates for the system proposed, have acknowledged this (and I hope the confessions they have published will be preserved and remembered) I shall not take up time to establish this point.[123] A question then arises, how far that system partakes of a federal republic.—I observed in a former letter, that it appears to be the first important step to a consolidation of the states; that its strong tendency is to that point.[124]

But what do we mean by a federal republic? and what by a consolidated government? To erect a federal republic, we must first make a number of states on republican principles; each state with a government organized for the internal management of its affairs: The states, as such, must unite under a federal head, and delegate to it powers to make and execute laws in certain enumerated cases, under certain restrictions; this head may be a single assembly, like the present congress, or the Amphictionic council; or it may consist of a legislature, with one or more branches; of an executive, and of a judiciary. To form a consolidated, or one entire government, there must be no state, or local governments, but all things, persons and property, must be subject to the laws of one legislature alone; to one executive, and one judiciary. Each state government, as the government of New Jersey, &c. is a consolidated, or one entire government, as it respects the counties, towns, citizens and property within the limits of the state.—The state governments are the basis, the pillar on which the federal head is placed, and the whole together, when formed on elective principles, constitute a federal republic. A federal republic in itself supposes state or local governments to exist, as the body or props, on which the federal head rests, and that it cannot remain a moment after they cease. In erecting the federal government, and always in its councils, each state must be known as a sovereign body; but in erecting this government, I conceive, the legislature of the state, by the expressed or implied assent of the people, or the people of the state, under the direction of the government of it, may accede to the federal compact: Nor do I conceive it to be necessarily a part of a confederacy of states, that each have an equal voice in the general councils. A confederated republic being organized, each state must retain powers for managing its internal police, and all delegate to the union power to manage general concerns: The quantity of power the union must possess is one thing, the mode of exercising the powers given, is quite a different consideration; and it is the mode of exercising them, that makes one of the essential distinctions between one entire or consolidated government, and a federal republic; that is, however the government may be organized, if the laws of the union, in most important concerns, as in levying and collecting taxes, raising troops, &c. operate immediately upon the persons and property of individuals, and not on states, extend to organizing the militia, &c. the government, as to its administration, as to making and executing laws, is not federal, but consolidated. To illustrate my idea—the union makes a requisition, and assigns to each state its quota of men or monies wanted; each state, by its own laws and officers, in its own way, furnishes its quota: here the state governments stand between the union and individuals; the laws of the union operate only on states, as such, and federally: Here nothing can be done without the meetings of the state legislatures—but in the other case the union, though the state legislatures should not meet for years together, proceeds immediately, by its own laws and officers, to levy and collect monies of individuals, to inlist men, form armies, &c. [H]ere the laws of the union operate immediately on the body of the people, on persons and property; in the same manner the laws of one entire consolidated government operate.—These two modes are very distinct, and in their operation and consequences have directly opposite tendencies: The first makes the existence of the state governments indispensable, and throws all the detail business of levying and collecting the taxes, &c. into the hands of those governments, and into the hands, of course, of many thousand officers solely created by, and dependent on the state. The last entirely excludes the agency of the respective states, and throws the whole business of levying and collecting taxes, &c. into the hands of many thousand officers solely created by, and dependent upon the union, and makes the existence of the state government of no consequence in the case. It is true, congress in raising any given sum in direct taxes, must by the constitution, raise so much of it in one state, and so much in another, by a fixed rule, which most of the states some time since agreed to: But this does not effect the principle in question, it only secures each state against any arbitrary proportions. The federal mode is perfectly safe and eligible, founded in the true spirit of a confederated republic; there could be no possible exception to it, did we not find by experience, that the states will sometimes neglect to comply with the reasonable requisitions of the union. It being according to the fundamental principles of federal republics, to raise men and monies by requisitions, and for the states individually to organize and train the militia, I conceive, there can be no reason whatever for departing from them, except this, that the states sometimes neglect to comply with reasonable requisitions, and that it is dangerous to attempt to compel a delinquent state by force, as it may often produce a war. We ought, therefore, to enquire attentively, how extensive the evils to be guarded against are, and cautiously limit the remedies to the extent of the evils. I am not about to defend the confederation, or to charge the proposed constitution with imperfections not in it; but we ought to examine facts, and strip them of the false colourings often given them by incautious observations, by unthinking or designing men. We ought to premise, that laws for raising men and monies, even in consolidated governments, are not often punctually complied with. Historians, except in extraordinary cases, but very seldom take notice of the detail collection of taxes; but these facts we have fully proved, and well attested; that the most energetic governments have relinquished taxes frequently, which were of many years standing. These facts amply prove, that taxes assessed, have remained many years uncollected. I agree there have been instances in the republics of Greece, Holland &c. in the course of several centuries, of states neglecting to pay their quotas of requisitions; but it is a circumstance certainly deserving of attention, whether these nations which have depended on requisitions principally for their defence, have not raised men and monies nearly as punctually as entire governments, which have taxed directly; whether we have not found the latter as often distressed for the want of troops and monies as the former. It has been said that the Amphictionic council, and the Germanic head, have not possessed sufficient powers to controul the members of the republic in a proper manner. Is this, if true, to be imputed to requisitions? Is it not principally to be imputed to the unequal powers of those members, connected with this important circumstance, that each member possessed power to league itself with foreign powers, and powerful neighbours, without the consent of the head. After all, has not the Germanic body a government as good as its neighbours in general? and did not the Grecian republic remain united several centuries, and form the theatre of human greatness? No government in Europe has commanded monies more plentifully than the government of Holland. As to the United States, the separate states lay taxes directly, and the union calls for taxes by way of requisitions; and is it a fact, that more monies are due in proportion on requisitions in the United States, than on the state taxes directly laid?—It is but about ten years since congress begun to make requisitions, and in that time, the monies, &c. required, and the bounties given for men required of the states, have amounted, specie value, to about 36 millions dollars, about 24 millions of dollars of which have been actually paid; and a very considerable part of the 12 millions not paid, remains so not so much from the neglect of the states, as from the sudden changes in paper money, &c. which in a great measure rendered payments of no service, and which often induced the union indirectly to relinquish one demand, by making another in a different form. Before we totally condemn requisitions, we ought to consider what immense bounties the states gave, and what prodigious exertions they made in the war, in order to comply with the requisitions of congress; and if since the peace they have been delinquent, ought we not carefully to enquire, whether that delinquency is to be imputed solely to the nature of requisitions? ought it not in part to be imputed to two other causes? I mean first, an opinion, that has extensively prevailed, that the requisitions for domestic interest have not been founded on just principles; and secondly, the circumstance, that the government itself, by proposing imposts, &c. has departed virtually from the constitutional system; which proposed changes, like all changes proposed in government, produce an inattention and negligence in the execution of the government in being.

2.8.205

I am not for depending wholly on requisitions; but I mention these few facts to shew they are not so totally futile as many pretend. For the truth of many of these facts I appeal to the public records; and for the truth of the others, I appeal to many republican characters, who are best informed in the 2.8.206 affairs of the United States. Since the peace, and till the convention reported, the wisest men in the United States generally supposed, that certain limited funds would answer the purposes of the union: and though the states are by no means in so good a condition as I wish they were, yet, I think, I may very safely affirm, they are in a better condition than they would be had congress always possessed the powers of taxation now contended for. The fact is admitted, that our federal government does not possess sufficient powers to give life and vigor to the political system; and that we experience disappointments, and several inconveniencies; but we ought carefully to distinguish those which are merely the consequences of a severe and tedious war, from those which arise from defects in the federal system. There has been an entire revolution in the United States within thirteen years, and the least we can compute the waste of labour and property at, during that period, by the war, is three hundred million of dollars. Our people are like a man just recovering from a severe fit of sickness. It was the war that disturbed the course of commerce, introduced floods of paper money, the stagnation of credit, and threw many valuable men out of steady business. From these sources our greatest evils arise; men of knowledge and reflection must perceive it;—but then, have we not done more in three or four years past, in repairing the injuries of the war, by repairing houses and estates, restoring industry, frugality, the fisheries, manufactures, &c. and thereby laying the foundation of good government, and of indiviudal and political happiness, than any people ever did in a like time; we must judge from a view of the country and facts, and not from foreign newspapers, or our own, which are printed chiefly in the commercial towns, where imprudent living, imprudent importations, and many unexpected disappointments, have produced a despondency, and a disposition to view every thing on the dark side. Some of the evils we feel, all will agree, ought to be imputed to the defective administration of the governments. From these and various considerations, I am very clearly of opinion, that the evils we sustain, merely on account of the defects of the confederation, are but as a feather in the balance against a mountain, compared with those which would, infallibly, be the result of the loss of general liberty, and that happiness men enjoy under a frugal, free, and mild government.

2.8.207 Heretofore we do not seem to have seen danger any where, but in giving power to congress, and now no where but in congress wanting powers; and, without examining the extent of the evils to be remedied, by one step, we are for giving up to congress almost all powers of any importance without limitation. The defects of the confederation are extravagantly magnified, and every species of pain we feel imputed to them: and hence it is inferred, there must be a total change of the principles, as well as forms of government: and in the main point, touching the federal powers, we rest all on a logical inference, totally inconsistent with experience and sound political reasoning.[125]

It is said, that as the federal head must make peace and war, and provide for the common defence, it ought to possess all powers necessary to that end: that powers unlimited, as to the purse and sword, to raise men and monies, and form the militia, are necessary to that end; and, therefore, the federal head ought to possess them. This reasoning is far more specious than solid: it is necessary that these powers so exist in the body politic, as to be called into exercise whenever necessary for the public safety; but it is by no means true, that the man, or congress of men, whose duty it more immediately is to provide for the common defence, ought to possess them without limitation. But clear it is, that if such men, or congress, be not in a situation to hold them without danger to liberty, he or they ought not to possess them. It has long been thought to be a well founded position, that the purse and sword ought not to be placed in the same hands in a free government. Our wise ancestors have carefully separated them—placed the sword in the hands of their king, even under considerable limitations, and the purse in the hands of the commons alone: yet the king makes peace and war, and it is his duty to provide for the common defence of the nation. This authority at least goes thus far—that a nation, well versed in the science of government, does not conceive it to be necessary or expedient for the man entrusted with the common defence and general tranquility, to possess unlimitedly the powers in question, or even in any considerable degree. Could he, whose duty it is to defend the public, possess in himself independently, all the means of doing it consistent with the public good, it might be convenient: but the people of England know that their liberties and happiness would be in infinitely greater danger from the king's unlimited possession of these powers, than from all external enemies and internal commotions to which they might be exposed: therefore, though they have made it his duty to guard the empire, yet they have wisely placed in other hands, the hands of their representatives, the power to deal out and controul the means. In Holland their high mightinesses must provide for the common defence, but for the means they depend, in a considerable degree, upon requisitions made on the state or local assemblies. Reason and facts evince, that however convenient it might be for an executive magistrate, or federal head, more immediately charged with the national defence and safety, solely, directly, and independently to possess all the means; yet such magistrate, or head, never ought to possess them, if thereby the public liberties shall be endangered. The powers in question never have been, by nations wise and free, deposited, nor can they ever be, with safety, any where, but in the principal members of the national system;—where these form one entire government, as in Great-Britain, they are separated and lodged in the principal members of it. But in a federal republic, there is quite a different organization; the people form this kind of government, generally, because their territories are too extensive to admit of their assembling in one legislature, or of executing the laws on free principles under one entire govern- 2.8.208

ment. They convene in their local assemblies, for local purposes, and for managing their internal concerns, and unite their states under a federal head for general purposes. It is the essential characteristic of a confederated republic, that this head be dependant on, and kept within limited bounds by, the local governments; and it is because, in these alone, in fact, the people can be substantially assembled or represented. It is, therefore, we very universally see, in this kind of government, the congressional powers placed in a few hands, and accordingly limited, and specifically enumerated: and the local assemblies strong and well guarded, and composed of numerous members. Wise men will always place the controuling power where the people are substantially collected by their representatives. By the proposed system, the federal head will possess, without limitation, almost every species of power that can, in its exercise, tend to change the government, or to endanger liberty; while in it, I think it has been fully shewn, the people will have but the shadow of representation, and but the shadow of security for their rights and liberties. In a confederated republic, the division of representation, &c. in its nature, requires a correspondent division and deposit of powers relative to taxes and military concerns: and I think the plan offered stands quite alone, in confounding the principles of governments in themselves totally distinct. I wish not to exculpate the states for their improper neglects in not paying their quotas of requisitions; but, in applying the remedy, we must be governed by reason and facts. It will not be denied, that the people have a right to change the government when the majority chuse it, if not restrained by some existing compact—that they have a right to displace their rulers, and consequently to determine when their measures are reasonable or not—and that they have a right, at any time, to put a stop to those measures they may deem prejudicial to them, by such forms and negatives as they may see fit to provide. From all these, and many other well founded considerations, I need not mention, a question arises, what powers shall there be delegated to the federal head, to insure safety, as well as energy, in the government? I think there is a safe and proper medium pointed out by experience, by reason, and facts. When we have organized the government, we ought to give power to the union, so far only as experience and present circumstances shall direct, with a reasonable regard to time to come. Should future circumstances, contrary to our expectations, require that further powers be transferred to the union, we can do it far more easily, than get back those we may now imprudently give. The system proposed is untried: candid advocates and opposers admit, that it is, in a degree, a mere experiment, and that its organization is weak and imperfect; surely then, the safe ground is cautiously to vest power in it, and when we are sure we have given enough for ordinary exigencies, to be extremely careful how we delegate powers, which, in common cases, must necessarily be useless or abused, and of very uncertain effect in uncommon ones.

By giving the union power to regulate commerce, and to levy and collect taxes by imposts, we give it an extensive authority, and permanent productive funds, I believe quite as adequate to the present demands of the union, as exises and direct taxes can be made to the present demands of the separate states. The state governments are now about four times as expensive as that of the union; and their several state debts added together, are nearly as large as that of the union—Our impost duties since the peace have been almost as productive as the other sources of taxation, and when under one general system of regulations, the probability is, that those duties will be very considerably increased: Indeed the representation proposed will hardly justify giving to congress unlimited powers to raise taxes by imposts, in addition to the other powers the union must necessarily have. It is said, that if congress possess only authority to raise taxes by imposts, trade probably will be overburdened with taxes, and the taxes of the union be found inadequate to any uncommon exigencies: To this we may observe, that trade generally finds its own level, and will naturally and necessarily leave off any undue burdens laid upon it: further, if congress alone possess the impost, and also unlimited power to raise monies by excises and direct taxes, there must be much more danger that two taxing powers, the union and states, will carry excises and direct taxes to an unreasonable extent, especially as these have not the natural boundaries taxes on trade have. However, it is not my object to propose to exclude congress from raising monies by internal taxes, as by duties, excises, and direct taxes, but my opinion is, that congress, especially in its proposed organization, ought not to raise monies by internal taxes, except in strict conformity to the federal plan; that is, by the agency of the state governments in all cases, except where a state shall neglect, for an unreasonable time, to pay its quota of a requisition; and never where so many of the state legislatures as represent a majority of the people, shall formally determine an excise law or requisition is improper, in their next session after the same be laid before them. We ought always to recollect that the evil to be guarded against is found by our own experience, and the experience of others, to be mere neglect in the states to pay their quotas; and power in the union to levy and collect the neglecting states' quotas with interest, is fully adequate to the evil. By this federal plan, with this exception mentioned, we secure the means of collecting the taxes by the usual process of law, and avoid the evil of attempting to compel or coerce a state; and we avoid also a circumstance, which never yet could be, and I am fully confident never can be, admitted in a free federal republic; I mean a permanent and continued system of tax laws of the union, executed in the bowels of the states by many thousand officers, dependent as to the assessing and collecting federal taxes, solely upon the union. On every principle then, we ought to provide, that the union render an exact account of all monies raised by imposts and other taxes; and that whenever monies shall be wanted for the purposes of the union, beyond the proceeds of the impost duties, requisitions shall be made on the states for the monies so wanted; and that the power of laying and collecting shall never be exercised, except in cases where a state shall neglect, a given time, to pay its quota. This mode seems to be strongly pointed out by the reason of the case, and spirit of the government; and I believe, there is no instance to be found in a federal republic, where the congressional powers ever extended generally to collecting monies by direct taxes or excises. Creating all these restrictions, still the powers of the union in matters of taxation, will be too unlimited; further checks, in my mind, are indispensably necessary. Nor do I conceive, that as full a representation as is practicable in the federal government, will afford sufficient security: the strength of the government, and the confidence of the people, must be collected principally in the local assemblies; every part or branch of the federal head must be feeble, and unsafely trusted with large powers. A government possessed of more power than its constituent parts will justify, will not only probably abuse it, but be unequal to bear its own burden; it may as soon be destroyed by the pressure of power, as languish and perish for want of it.

2.8.209

2.8.210 There are two ways further of raising checks, and guarding against undue combinations and influence in a federal system. The first is, in levying taxes, raising and keeping up armies, in building navies, in forming plans for the militia, and in appropriating monies for the support of the military, to require the attendance of a large proportion of the federal representatives, as two-thirds or three-fourths of them; and in passing laws, in these important cases, to require the consent of two-thirds or three-fourths of the members present. The second is, by requiring that certain important laws of the federal head, as a requisition or a law for raising monies by excise shall be laid before the state legislatures, and if disapproved of by a given number of them, say by as many of them as represent a majority of the people, the law shall have no effect. Whether it would be adviseable to adopt both, or either of these checks, I will not undertake to determine. We have seen them both exist in confederated republics. The first exists substantially in the confederation, and will exist in some measure in the plan proposed, as in chusing a president by the house, in expelling members; in the senate, in making treaties, and in deciding on impeachments, and in the whole in altering the constitution. The last exists in the United Netherlands, but in a much greater extent. The first is founded on this principle, that these important measures may, sometimes, be adopted by a bare quorum of members, perhaps, from a few states, and that a bare majority of the federal representatives may frequently be of the aristocracy, or some particular interests, connections, or parties in the community, and governed by motives, views, and inclinations not compatible with the general interest.—The last is founded on this principle, that the people will be substantially represented, only in their state or local assemblies; that their principal security must be found in them; and that, therefore, they ought to have ultimately a constitutional controul over such interesting measures.

I have often heard it observed, that our people are well informed, and will not submit to oppressive governments; that the state governments will be their ready advocates, and possess their confidence, mix with them, and enter into all their wants and feelings.[126] This is all true; but of what avail will these circumstances be, if the state governments, thus allowed to be the guardians of the people, possess no kind of power by the forms of the social compact, to stop in their passage, the laws of congress injurious to the people. State governments must stand and see the law take place; they may complain and petition—so may individuals; the members of them, in extreme cases, may resist, on the principles of self-defence—so may the people and individuals. 2.8.211

It has been observed, that the people, in extensive territories, have more power, compared with that of their rulers, than in small states.[127] Is not directly the opposite true? The people in a small state can unite and act in concert, and with vigour; but in large territories, the men who govern find it more easy to unite, while people cannot; while they cannot collect the opinions of each part, while they move to different points, and one part is often played off against the other. 2.8.212

It has been asserted, that the confederate head of a republic at best, is in general weak and dependent;—that the people will attach themselves to, and support their local governments, in all disputes with the union.[128] Admit the fact: is it any way to remove the inconvenience by accumulating powers upon a weak organization? The fact is, that the detail administration of affairs, in this mixed republics, depends principally on the local governments; and the people would be wretched without them: and a great proportion of social happiness depends on the internal administration of justice, and on internal police. The splendor of the monarch, and the power of the government are one thing. The happiness of the subject depends on very different causes: but it is to the latter, that the best men, the greatest ornaments of human nature, have most carefully attended: it is to the former tyrants and oppressors have always aimed, 2.8.213

The Federal Farmer.

XVIII

January 25, 1788.

Dear Sir,

I am persuaded, a federal head never was formed, that possessed half the powers which it could carry into full effect, altogether independently of the state or local governments, as the one, the convention has proposed, will possess. Should the state legislatures never meet, except merely for chusing federal senators and appointing electors, once in four and six years, the 2.8.214 federal head may go on for ages to make all laws relative to the following subjects, and by its own courts, officers, and provisions, carry them into full effect, and to any extent it may deem for the general welfare, that is, for raising taxes, borrowing and coining monies, and for applying them—for forming and governing armies and navies and for directing their operations—for regulating commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes—for regulating bankruptcies, weights and measures, post-offices and post-roads, and captures on land and water—for establishing a uniform rule of naturalization, and for promoting the progress of science and useful arts—for defining and punishing piracies and felonies committed on the high seas, the offences of counterfeiting the securities and current coin of the United States, and offences against the law of nations, and for regulating all maritime concerns—for organizing, arming and disciplining the militia (the respective states training them, and appointing the officers)—for calling them forth when wanted, and for governing them when in the service of the union—for the sole and exclusive government of a federal city or town, not exceeding ten miles square, and of places ceded for forts, magazines arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings—for granting letters of marque and reprisal, and making war—for regulating the times, places, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives—for making and concluding all treaties, and carrying them into execution—for judicially deciding all questions arising on the constitution laws, and treaties of the union, in law and equity, and questions arising on state laws also, where ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, where the United States, individual states, or a state, where citizens of different states, and where foreign states, or a foreign subject, are parties or party—for impeaching and trying federal officers—for deciding on elections, and for expelling members, &c. All these enumerated powers we must examine and contemplate in all their extent and various branches, and then reflect, that the federal head will have full power to make all laws whatever respecting them; and for carrying into full effect all powers vested in the union, in any department, or officers of it, by the constitution, in order to see the full extent of the federal powers, which will be supreme, and exercised by that head at pleasure, conforming to the few limitations mentioned in the constitution. Indeed, I conceive, it is impossible to see them in their full extent at present: we see vast undefined powers lodged in a weak organization, but cannot, by the enquiries of months and years, clearly discern them in all their numerous branches. These powers in feeble hands, must be tempting objects for ambition and a love of power and fame.

2.8.215 But, say the advocates, they are all necessary for forming an energetic federal government; all necessary in the hands of the union, for the common defence and general welfare. In these great points they appear to me to go from the end to the means, and from the means to the end, perpetually begging the question.[129] I think in the course of these letters, I shall sufficiently prove, that some of these powers need not be lodged in the hands of the union—that others ought to be exercised under better checks, and in part, by the agency of the states—some I have already considered, some in my mind, are not liable to objections, and the others, I shall briefly notice in this closing letter.

The power to controul the military forces of the country, as well as the revenues of it, requires serious attention. Here again I must premise, that a federal republic is a compound system, made up of constituent parts, each essential to the whole: we must then expect the real friends of such a system will always be very anxious for the security and preservation of each part, and to this end, that each constitutionally possess its natural portion of power and influence—and that it will constantly be an object of concern to them, to see one part armed at all points by the constitution, and in manner destructive in the end, even of its own existence, and the others left constitutionally defenceless. 2.8.216

The military forces of a free country may be considered under three general descriptions—1. The militia. 2. the navy—and 3. the regular troops—and the whole ought ever to be, and understood to be, in strict subordination to the civil authority; and that regular troops, and select corps, ought not to be kept up without evident necessity. Stipulations in the constitution to this effect, are perhaps, too general to be of much service, except merely to impress on the minds of the people and soldiery, that the military ought ever to be subject to the civil authority, &c. But particular attention, and many more definite stipulations, are highly necessary to render the military safe, and yet useful in a free government; and in a federal republic, where the people meet in distinct assemblies, many stipulations are necessary to keep a part from transgressing, which would be unnecessary checks against the whole met in one legislature, in one entire government.—A militia, when properly formed, are in fact the people themselves, and render regular troops in a great measure unnecessary. The powers to form and arm the militia, to appoint their officers, and to command their services, are very important; nor ought they in a confederated republic to be lodged, solely, in any one member of the government. First, the constitution ought to secure a genuine and guard against a select militia, by providing that the militia shall always be kept well organized, armed, and disciplined, and include, according to the past and general usage of the states, all men capable of bearing arms; and that all regulations tending to render this general militia useless and defenceless, by establishing select corps of militia, or distinct bodies of military men, not having permanent interests and attachments in the community to be avoided. I am persuaded, I need not multiply words to convince you of the value and solidity of this principle, as it respects general liberty, and the duration of a free and mild government: having this principle well fixed by the constitution, then the federal head may prescribe a general uniform plan, on which the respective 2.8.217 states shall form and train the militia, appoint their officers and solely manage them, except when called into the service of the union, and when called into that service, they may be commanded and governed by the union. This arrangement combines energy and safety in it; it places the sword in the hands of the solid interest of the community, and not in the hands of men destitute of property, of principle, or of attachment to the society and government, who often form the select corps of peace or ordinary establishments: by it, the militia are the people, immediately under the management of the state governments, but on a uniform federal plan, and called into the service, command, and government of the union, when necessary for the common defence and general tranquility. But, say gentlemen, the general militia are for the most part employed at home in their private concerns, cannot well be called out, or be depended upon; that we must have a select militia; that is, as I understand it, particular corps or bodies of young men, and of men who have but little to do at home, particularly armed and disciplined in some measure, at the public expence, and always ready to take the field. These corps, not much unlike regular troops, will ever produce an inattention to the general militia; and the consequence has ever been, and always must be, that the substantial men, having families and property, will generally be without arms, without knowing the use of them, and defenceless; whereas, to preserve liberty, it is essential that the whole body of the people always possess arms, and be taught alike, especially when young, how to use them; nor does it follow from this, that all promiscuously must go into actual service on every occasion. The mind that aims at a select militia, must be influenced by a truly anti-republican principle; and when we see many men disposed to practice upon it, whenever they can prevail, no wonder true republicans are for carefully guarding against it. As a farther check, it may be proper to add, that the militia of any state shall not remain in the service of the union, beyond a given period, without the express consent of the state legislature.

2.8.218 As to the navy, I do not see that it can have any connection with the local governments. The want of employment for it, and the want of monies in the hands of the union, must be its proper limitation. The laws for building or increasing it, as all the important laws mentioned in a former letter, touching military and money matters, may be checked by requiring the attendance of a large proportion of the representatives, and the consent of a large proportion of those present, to pass them as before mentioned.

2.8.219 By art. 1. sect. 8. "Congress shall have power to provide for organizing, arming, and discipling the militia": power to provide for—does this imply any more than power to prescribe a general uniform plan? And must not the respective states pass laws (but in conformity to the plan) for forming and training the militia.

2.8.220 In the present state of mankind, and of conducting war, the government of every nation must have power to raise and keep up regular troops: the question is, how shall this power be lodged? In an entire government, as in Great-Britain, where the people assemble by their representatives in one legislature, there is no difficulty, it is of course properly lodged in that legislature: But in a confederated republic, where the organization consists of a federal head, and local governments, there is no one part in which it can be solely, and safely lodged. By art. 1. sect. 8. "congress shall have power to raise and support armies," &c. By art. 1 sect. 10. "no state, without the consent of congress, shall keep troops, or ships of war, in time of peace." It seems fit the union should direct the raising of troops, and the union may do it in two ways; by requisitions on the states, or by direct taxes—the first is most conformable to the federal plan, and safest; and it may be improved, by giving the union power, by its own laws and officers, to raise the states quota that may neglect, and to charge it with the expence; and by giving a fixed quorum of the state legislatures power to disapprove the requisition. There would be less danger in this power to raise troops, could the state governments keep a proper controul over the purse and over the militia; but after all the precautions we can take, without evidently fettering the union too much, we must give a large accumulation of powers to it, in these and other respects. There is one check, which, I think, may be added with great propriety—that is, no land forces shall be kept up, but by legislative acts annually passed by congress, and no appropriation of monies for their support shall be for a longer term than one year. This is the constitutional practice in Great-Britain, and the reasons for such checks in the United States appear to be much stronger. We may also require that these acts be passed by a special majority, as before mentioned. There is another mode still more guarded, and which seems to be founded in the true spirit of a federal system: it seems proper to divide those powers we can with safety, lodge them in no one member of the government alone; yet substantially to preserve their use, and to ensure duration to the government, by modifying the exercise of them—it is to empower congress to raise troops by direct levies, not exceeding a given number, say 2000 in time of peace, and 12,000 in a time of war, and for such further troops as may be wanted, to raise them by requisitions qualified as before mentioned. By the above recited clause no state shall keep troops, &c. in time of peace—this clearly implies, it may do it in time of war: this must be on the principle, that the union cannot defend all parts of the republic, and suggests an idea very repugnant to the general tendency of the system proposed, which is to disarm the state governments: a state in a long war may collect forces sufficient to take the field against the neighbouring states. This clause was copied from the confederation, in which it was of more importance than in the plan proposed, because under this the separate states, probably, will have but small revenues.

By article 1. section 8. congress shall have power to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, throughout the United States. It is to be observed, that the separate states have ever been in possession of the 2.8.221 power, and in the use of it, of making bankrupt laws, militia laws, and laws in some other cases, respecting which, the new constitution, when adopted, will give the union power to legislate, &c.—but no words are used by the constitution to exclude the jurisdiction of the several states, and whether they will be excluded or not, or whether they and the union will have concurrent jurisdiction or not, must be determined by inference; and from the nature of the subject; if the power, for instance, to make uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies, is in its nature indivisible, or incapable of being exercised by two legislatures independently, or by one in aid of the other, then the states are excluded, and cannot legislate at all on the subject, even though the union should neglect or find it impracticable to establish uniform bankrupt laws. How far the union will find it practicable to do this, time only can fully determine. When we consider the extent of the country, and the very different ideas of the different parts in it, respecting credit, and the mode of making men's property liable for paying their debts, we may, I think, with some degree of certainty, conclude that the union never will be able to establish such laws; but if practicable, it does not appear to me, on further reflection, that the union ought to have the power;[130] it does not appear to me to be a power properly incidental to a federal head, and, I believe, no one ever possessed it; it is a power that will immediately and extensively interfere with the internal police of the separate states, especially with their administering justice among their own citizens. By giving this power to the union, we greatly extend the jurisdiction of the federal judiciary, as all questions arising on bankrupt laws, being laws of the union, even between citizens of the same state, may be tried in the federal courts; and I think it may be shewn, that by the help of these laws, actions between citizens of different states, and the laws of the federal city, aided by no overstrained judicial fictions, almost all civil causes may be drawn into those courts. We must be sensible how cautious we ought to be in extending unnecessarily the jurisdiction of those courts, for reasons I need not repeat. This article of power too, will considerably increase, in the hands of the union, an accumulation of powers, some of a federal and some of a unfederal nature, too large without it.

2.8.222 The constitution provides, that congress shall have the sole and exclusive government of what is called the federal city, a place not exceeding ten miles square, and of all places ceded for forts, dock-yards, &c. I believe this is a novel kind of provision in a federal republic; it is repugnant to the spirit of such a government, and must be founded in an apprehension of a hostile disposition between the federal head and the state governments; and it is not improbable, that the sudden retreat of congress from Philadelphia, first gave rise to it.—With this apprehension, we provide, the government of the union shall have secluded places, cities, and castles of defence, which no state laws whatever shall invade. When we attentively examine this provision in all its consequences, it opens to view scenes almost without bounds. A federal, or rather a national city, ten miles square, containing a hundred square miles, is about four times as large as London; and for forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings, congress may possess a number of places or towns in each state. It is true, congress cannot have them unless the state legislatures cede them; but when once ceded, they never can be recovered, and though the general temper of the legislatures may be averse to such cessions, yet many opportunities and advantages may be taken of particular times and circumstances of complying assemblies, and of particular parties, to obtain them. It is not improbable, that some considerable towns or places, in some intemperate moments, or influenced by anti-republican principles, will petition to be ceded for the purposes mentioned in the provision. There are men, and even towns, in the best republics, which are often fond of withdrawing from the government of them, whenever occasion shall present. The case is still stronger; if the provision in question holds out allurements to attempt to withdraw, the people of a state must ever be subject to state as well as federal taxes; but the federal city and places will be subject only to the latter, and to them by no fixed proportion, nor of the taxes raised in them, can the separate states demand any account of congress.—These doors opened for withdrawing from the state governments entirely, may, on other accounts, be very alluring and pleasing to those anti-republican men who prefer a place under the wings of courts.

If a federal town be necessary for the residence of congress and the public officers, it ought to be a small one, and the government of it fixed on republican and common law principles, carefully enumerated and established by the constitution. It is true, the states, when they shall cede places, may stipulate, that the laws and government of congress in them, shall always be formed on such principles; but it is easy to discern, that the stipulations of a state, or of the inhabitants of the place ceded, can be of but little avail against the power and gradual encroachments of the union. The principles ought to be established by the federal constitution, to which all the states are parties; but in no event can there be any need of so large a city and places for forts, &c. totally exempted from the laws and jurisdictions of the state governments. If I understand the constitution, the laws of congress, constitutionally made, will have complete and supreme jurisdiction to all federal purposes, on every inch of ground in the United States, and exclusive jurisdiction on the high seas, and this by the highest authority, the consent of the people. Suppose ten acres at West-Point shall be used as a fort of the union, or a sea port town as a dock-yard, the laws of the union in those places respecting the navy, forces of the union, and all federal objects, must prevail, be noticed by all judges and officers, and executed accordingly: and I can discern no one reason for excluding from these places, the operation of state laws, as to mere state purposes; for instance, for the collection of state taxes in them, recovering debts, deciding questions of property arising within them on state laws, punishing, by state laws, theft, trespasses, and offences committed in them by mere citizens against the state laws.

2.8.223

2.8.224 The city, and all the places in which the union shall have this exclusive jurisdiction, will be immediately under one entire government, that of the federal head; and be no part of any state, and consequently no part of the United States. The inhabitants of the federal city and places, will be as much exempt from the laws and controul of the state governments, as the people of Canada or Nova Scotia will be. Neither the laws of the states respecting taxes, the militia, crimes or property, will extend to them; nor is there a single stipulation in the constitution, that the inhabitants of this city, and these places, shall be governed by laws founded on principles of freedom. All questions, civil and criminal, arising on the laws of these places, which must be the laws of congress, must be decided in the federal courts; and also, all questions that may, by such judicial fictions as these courts may consider reasonable, be supposed to arise within this city, or any of these places, may be brought into these courts; and by a very common legal fiction, any personal contract may be supposed to have been made in any place. A contract made in Georgia may be supposed to have been made in the federal city, in Pennsylvania; the courts will admit the fiction, and not in these cases, make it a serious question, where it was in fact made. Every suit in which an inhabitant of a federal district may be a party, of course may be instituted in the federal courts—also, every suit in which it may be alledged, and not denied, that a party in it is an inhabitant of such a district—also, every suit to which a foreign state or subject, the union, a state, citizens of different states, in fact, or by reasonable legal fictions, may be a party or parties: And thus, by means of bankrupt laws, federal districts, &c. almost all judicial business, I apprehend may be carried into the federal courts, without essentially departing from the usual course of judicial proceedings.[131] The courts in Great Britain have acquired their powers, and extended, very greatly, their jurisdictions by such fictions and suppositions as I have mentioned. The constitution, in these points, certainly involves in it principles, and almost hidden cases, which may unfold, and in time exhibit consequences we hardly think of. The power of naturalization, when viewed in connection with the judicial powers and cases, is, in my mind, of very doubtful extent. By the constitution itself, the citizens of each state will be naturalized citizens of every state, to the general purposes of instituting suits, claiming the benefits of the laws, &c. And in order to give the federal courts jurisdiction of an action, between citizens of the same state, in common acceptation, may not a court allow the plaintiff to say, he is a citizen of one state, and the defendant a citizen of another, without carrying legal fictions so far, by any means, as they have been carried by the courts of King's Bench and Exchequer, in order to bring causes within their cognizance—Further, the federal city and districts, will be totally distinct from any state, and a citizen of a state will not of course be a subject of any of them; and to avail himself of the privileges and immunities of them, must he not be naturalized by congress in them? and may not congress make any proportion of the citizens of the states naturalized subjects of the federal city and districts, and thereby entitle them to sue or defend, in all cases, in the federal courts? I have my doubts, and many sensible men, I find, have their doubts, on these points; and we ought to observe, they must be settled in the courts of law, by their rules, distinctions, and fictions. To avoid many of these intricacies and difficulties, and to avoid the undue and unnecessary extension of the federal judicial powers, it appears to me, that no federal districts ought to be allowed, and no federal city or town, except perhaps a small town, in which the government shall be republican, but in which congress shall have no jurisdiction over the inhabitants, but in common with the other inhabitants of the states. Can the union want, in such a town, any thing more than a right to the soil on which it may set its buildings, and extensive jurisdiction over the federal buildings, and property, its own members, officers, and servants in it? As to all federal objects, the union will have complete jurisdiction over them, of course any where, and every where. I still think, that no actions ought to be allowed to be brought in the federal courts, between citizens of different states, at least, unless the cause be of very considerable importance: that no action against a state government, by any citizen or foreigner, ought to be allowed; and no action, in which a foreign subject is party, at least, unless it be of very considerable importance, ought to be instituted in the federal courts—I confess, I can see no reason whatever, for a foreigner, or for citizens of different states, carrying sixpenny causes into the federal courts; I think the state courts will be found by experience, to be bottomed on better principles, and to administer justice better than the federal courts.

The difficulties and dangers I have supposed, will result from so large a federal city, and federal districts, from the extension of the federal judicial powers, &c. are not, I conceive, merely possible, but probable. I think, pernicious political consequences will follow from them, and from the federal city especially, for very obvious reasons, a few of which I will mention. 2.8.225

We must observe, that the citizens of a state will be subject to state as well as federal taxes, and the inhabitants of the federal city and districts, only to such taxes as congress may lay—We are not to suppose all our people are attached to free government, and the principles of the common law, but that many thousands of them will prefer a city governed, not on republican principles—This city, and the government of it, must indubitably take their tone from the characters of the men, who from the nature of its situation and institution, must collect there. This city will not be established for productive labour, for mercantile, or mechanic industry; but for the residence of government, its officers and attendants. If hereafter it should ever become a place of trade and industry, in the early periods of its exis- 2.8.226

tence, when its laws and government must receive their fixed tone, it must be a mere court, with its appendages, the executive, congress, the law courts, gentlemen of fortune and pleasure, with all the officers, attendants, suitors, expectants and dependants on the whole, however brilliant and honourable this collection may be, if we expect it will have any sincere attachments to simple and frugal republicanism, to that liberty and mild government, which is dear to the laborious part of a free people, we most assuredly deceive ourselves. This early collection will draw to it men from all parts of the country, of a like political description: we see them looking towards the place already.

2.8.227 Such a city, or town, containing a hundred square miles, must soon be the great, the visible, and dazzling centre, the mistress of fashions, and the fountain of politics. There may be a free or shackled press in this city, and the streams which may issue from it may overflow the country, and they will be poisonous or pure, as the fountain may be corrupt or not. But not to dwell on a subject that must give pain to the virtuous friends of freedom, I will only add, can a free and enlightened people create a common head so extensive, so prone to corruption and slavery, as this city probably will be, when they have it in their power to form one pure and chaste, frugal and republican.

2.8.228 Under the confederation congress has no power whereby to govern its own officers and servant[s]; a federal town, in which congress might have special jurisdiction, might be expedient; but under the new constitution, without a federal town, congress will have all necessary powers of course over its officers and servants; indeed it will have a complete system of powers to all the federal purposes mentioned in the constitution; so that the reason for a federal town under the confederation, will by no means exist under the constitution.—Even if a trial by jury should be admitted in the federal city, what man, with any state attachments or republican virtue about him, will submit to be tried by a jury of it.

2.8.229 I might observe more particularly upon several other parts of the constitution proposed; but it has been uniformly my object in examining a subject so extensive, and difficult in many parts to be illustrated, to avoid unimportant things, and not to dwell upon points not very material. The rule for apportioning requisitions on the states, having some time since been agreed to by eleven states, I have viewed as settled. The stipulation that congress, after twenty one years may prohibit the importation of slaves, is a point gained, if not so favourable as could be wished for. As monopolies in trade perhaps, can in no case be useful, it might not be amiss to provide expressly against them. I wish the power to reprieve and pardon was more cautiously lodged, and under some limitations. I do not see why congress should be allowed to consent that a person may accept a present, office, or title of a foreign prince, &c. As the state governments, as well as the federal, are essential parts of the system, why should not the oath taken by the officers be expressly to support the whole? As to debts due to and from the union, I think the constitution intends, on examining art. 4. sect. 8. and art. 6. that they shall stand on the same ground under the constitution as under the confederation. In the article respecting amendments, it is stipulated, that no state shall ever be deprived of its equal vote in the senate without its consent; and that alterations may be made by the consent of three-fourths of the states. Stipulations to bind the majority of the people may serve one purpose, to prevent frequent motions for change; but these attempts to bind the majority, generally give occasion for breach of contract. The states all agreed about seven years ago, that the confederation should remain unaltered, unless every state should agree to alterations: but we now see it agreed by the convention, and four states, that the old confederacy shall be destroyed, and a new one, of nine states, be erected, if nine only shall come in. Had we agreed, that a majority should alter the confederation, a majority's agreeing would have bound the rest: but now we must break the old league, unless all the states agree to alter, or not proceed with adopting the constitution. Whether the adoption by nine states will not produce a nearly equal and dangerous division of the people for and against the constitution—whether the circumstances of the country were such as to justify the hazarding a probability of such a situation, I shall not undertake to determine. I shall leave it to be determined hereafter, whether nine states, under a new federal compact, can claim the benefits of any treaties made with a confederation of thirteen, under a distinct compact and form of existence—whether the new confederacy can recover debts due to the old confederacy, or the arrears of taxes due from the states excluded.

It has been well observed, that our country is extensive, and has no 2.8.230 external enemies to press the parts together: that, therefore, their union must depend on strong internal ties.[132] I differ with the gentlemen who make these observations only in this, they hold the ties ought to be strengthened by a considerable degree of internal consolidation, and my object is to form them and strengthen them, on pure federal principles. Whatever may be the fate of many valuable and necessary amendments in the constitution proposed, the ample discussion and respectable opposition it will receive, will have a good effect—they will operate to produce a mild and prudent administration, and to put the wheels of the whole system in motion on proper principles—they will evince, that true republican principles and attachments are still alive and formidable in this country. These, in view, I believe, even men quite disposed to make a bad use of the system, will long hesitate before they will resolve to do it. A majority, from a view of our situation, and influenced by many considerations, may acquiese in the adoption of this constitution; but, it is evident that a very great majority of the people of the United States think it, in many parts, an unnecessary and unadviseable departure from true republican and federal principles.

The Federal Farmer.

To the Republican.

1. It is intriguing to speculate why the letters begin in this way, especially since the "letters" of "last winter" could throw definitive light on the authorship; but my own speculations and search have been fruitless. There seems to be no record of any such letters or of the possible identity of the addressee, the Republican.

2. For an elaboration of the extreme parties, see I, 2.8.6–7; V, 2.8.62; VI, 2.8.68–73; VII, 2.8.97–98.

3. Alexander Pope, Essay on Man, epistle 3, lines 303–4. Pope's couplet was frequently discussed in the ratification literature, the classic case being the treatment in The Federalist no. 68, 461. See also Penn 3.12.4; [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.36. Generally the Anti-Federalist writers were more critical of the maxim than The Federal Farmer is here (but see III, 2.8.24–25; IX, 2.8.111; and he is specifically criticized on this point by a fellow Anti-Federalist writer, A Countryman (6.6.39). For Federalist discussions of the importance of good administration, see Poplicola 4.11.1 n.1.

4. The "critical" character of this period was not simply an invention of the Federalists or of Federalist historians. See VI, 2.8.70; Brutus I, 2.9.2; Old Whig IV, 3.3.18; Philadelphiensis I, 3.9.2.; Centinel IV, 2.7.91 n. 45.

5. The author is thinking of such men as Abraham Clark of New Jersey; Richard Caswell and Willie Jones of North Carolina; Patrick Henry, Thomas Nelson, and Richard Henry Lee of Virginia; all of whom were critics of the Constitution who had been elected to the Constitutional Convention but had declined to serve or failed to attend. See Farrand III, 557–59. Cf. Federal Farmer V, 2.8.62, and Lee's letter to Randolph, on 26 March 1787, expressing his confidence in the gentlemen appointed to the Convention (Lee, Letters II, 415). The discussion of the parties favoring and opposing the Constitution is continued in V, 2.8.62; VI, 2.8.68–73.

6. Pickering replied, "In the proposed Constitution there is no foundation for an aristocracy; for its officers (including in this term as well the legislative as the executive branches) do not hold their places by hereditary right, nor for life, nor by electing one another; neither is any portion of wealth or property a necessary qualification." Pickering and Upham, The Life of Timothy Pickering II, 353. However, it is not a conventional but the natural aristocracy that The Federal Farmer is concerned with. See III, 2.8.25; VII, 2.8.97.

7. Note that all of these, including the first, are described as forms under which the United States may exist as one nation. As Merrill Jensen says, the issue was not whether there was a "nation" before 1787. "There was a new nation, as the men of the time agreed: they disagreed as to whether the new nation should have a federal or a national government." Jensen, New Nation xiv. They also disagreed, however, about whether a nation could exist as a nation without a national government. Cf. James Wilson's similar statement of alternatives in his 24 November speech before the Pennsylvania ratifying convention. McMaster and Stone 225 ff; Elliot II, 427 ff.

8. See III, 2.8.35, where The Federal Farmer adds to the legitimate powers of the general government the regulation of trade between the states, but omits to mention the militia and bankruptcies. On bankruptcy laws, see XVIII, 2.8.221, where he concludes that the power to pass bankruptcy laws should not be given to the federal government.

9. The Federal Farmer displays a significant shift in terminology in this connection. Here he makes the then standard distinction between a federal plan, on the one side, a plan of consolidation, on the other side, and what he calls a "partial consolidation" in the middle, consisting of a combination of federal and consolidated or national principles. The distinctions are fundamentally identical to those drawn by Publius in The Federalist no. 39, 253–57. In his sixth essay, however, the advocates of the earlier and merely advisory "federal plan" become one kind of "pretended federalists" (the others being the advocates of the earlier "consolidation"), while the proponents of the earlier "partial consolidation" become the "true" or "honest federalists." See VI, 2.8.72. See Martin Diamond's essays, "What the Framers Meant by Federalism," A Nation of States, ed. Robert Goldwin, 2d ed. (Chicago 1974) 25–42; and "The Federalists' View of Federalism," Essays on Federalism (Claremont, Cal., 1961). On the characteristics of the "federal republic," see XVII, 2.8.204–5. For other important Anti-Federal discussions of the meaning of a federal system or federal republic, see Brutus I, 2.9.4–21; [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.6–10; Henry 5.16.1–2; Clinton 6.13.2, 27.

10. Cf. Monroe's discussion of the desirability of consolidation if it were practicable, 5.21.12 n. 3.

11. On the question of a free and equal representation, see The Federalist nos. 35–36. Representation is one of The Federal Farmer's major themes. See III, 2.8.25–26, 39; V, 2.8.59–60; VI, 2.8.76–77; VII–XII, 2.8.93–165; XV, 2.8.190. The other major Anti-Federal discussions of representation will be found in Brutus I, 2.9.14–16; DeWitt 4.3.14; Cornelius 4.10.9; [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.22–32; V, 5.1.71–73; Chase 5.3.20; Republicus 5.13.3; Impartial Examiner 5.14.28–32.

12. On jury trials see IV, 2.8.44, 53–55; VI, 2.8.80; XV, 2.8.190–94.

13. A semicolon has been omitted here.

14. However, as Publius shrewdly argues, if the remote states share least in the circulation of the ordinary benefits of union, their exposed position gives them an unusually great dependence on the aid of the Union. The remote states get less out of the Union, but they need what they do get more, and thus the "proper equilibrium" is maintained. The Federalist no. 14, 87.

15. See below, n. 19.

16. See McMaster and Stone 144–45 (Wilson); Ford, Pamphlets 148–49 (An American Citizen), 361 (Iredell); Ford, Essays 165 (A Landholder), 397–98 (Hugh Williamson); Ford, Pamphlets 241 (Aristides). This point is made frequently by Federalists during the state ratification debates.

17. On the need for and functions of a Bill of Rights, see IV, 2.8.46–56; XVI, 2.8.196–203. On kinds of rights, see VI, 2.8.80–86.

18. Publius answers this argument (and its continuation in the next paper) in The Federalist no. 27. In no. 8, Publius describes in some detail an effect similar to that alluded to here by The Federal Farmer; but he derives it from a different cause, namely dissension among the states under an inadequate general government.

19. On the connection between free laws and the character of the people, see II, 2.8.18; V, 2.8.59; VII, 2.8.93–96; X, 2.8.127, 139; XVIII, 2.8.227. See also Cato III, 2.6.15–20; Centinel I, 2.7.9; Brutus I, 2.9.16; Federal Republican 3.6.21; Philadelphiensis II, 3.9.9; Turner 4.18; Columbian Patriot 4.28.2. This question is, of course, immediately connected with the question of representation; see above, n. 11.

20. An Anti-Federalist essayist, A Countryman from Dutchess County (6.6.42–64), points out that there is a substantial difficulty in the contention that good citizens should acquiesce even if essential alterations are not made.

21. On the natural aristocracy, see VI, 2.8.97.

22. A Countryman from Dutchess County makes the point, nearly always passed over even by the Anti-Federalists, that the Senate is not entirely on the federal plan, for each senator has one vote: whereas "by the present confederation, which is a union of the states, not a consolidation, all the delegates, from a state, have but one vote, and in the state senate, which is on the plan of consolidation, each senator has a vote" (6.6.45). Cf. [Pennsylvania] Farmer 3.14.14–15; Republicus 5.13.12. In the Additional Letters (XI, 2.8.143 ff) The Federal Farmer records a more favorable opinion of the "federal" basis of the senate. It should be noted that many Federalists defend the "federal" basis of the Senate as sound in principle and even assume that senators will be subject to instructions from their states. See especially Elliot II, 26 (Cabot), 47 (King); Ford, Pamphlets 40 (A Citizen of America), 206–7 (Fabius), 223 ff. (Aristides); Ford, Essays 29 (Cassius); Pennsylvania Gazette 30 January 1788 (A Freeman); Virginia Independent Chronicle Extraordinary 9 April 1788 (A Freeholder); Maryland Journal 1 August 1788 (Speech Intended to Have Been Delivered in Maryland Convention).

23. Publius presumably refers to The Federal Farmer when, in no. 68, 457–58, he writes that "the most plausible of [the opponents], who has appeared in print, has even deigned to admit that the election of the President is pretty well guarded." See Federal Farmer XIV, 2.8.177. James Wilson also noted that the scheme for selecting the President "is not objected to." McMaster and Stone 398. For criticism, however, see Republicus 5.13.13.

24. See Brutus IV, 2.9.48 n. 34.

25. Cf. The Federalist no. 35, 216–18.

26. Publius replies that if the government were interested in a system of influence, "the most certain road to the accomplishment of its aim would be to employ the State officers as much as possible, and to attach them to the Union by an accumulation of their emoluments." The Federalist no. 36, 228. The question of executive influence is discussed more fully and in broader terms in XIII, 2.8.166–72. Cf. Brutus III, 2.9.42 n. 29.

27. See Centinel II, 2.7.52 n. 30.

28. See Citizen of America, An Examination . . . , Ford, Pamphlets 49; and statement by Roger Sherman and Oliver Ellsworth, quoted by Old Whig VI, 3.3.37 and n. 35.

29. On the concurrent taxing powers of the national and state governments, see The Federalist nos. 32–34; no. 36, 227–29. Publius' basic argument is that a concurrent jurisdiction in this case was the only admissible substitute for an entire subordination of the states. For other Federal and Anti-Federal discussions of concurrent power to tax see McMaster and Stone 260 (Whitehill), 268–69 (Smilie); Ford, Pamphlets 50–51 (Webster); Ford, Essays 235–36 (Sherman); Elliot II, 333, 337, 372 (Smith); 339 (Williams), 346 (R. R. Livingston), 361–64 (Hamilton), 372 (Lansing); Elliot III, 306, 332 (Madison); Elliot IV, 75 (Spenser); Brutus I, 2.9.5; Old Whig VI, 3.3.33–39; Mason 5.17.1.

30. See above, n. 11.

31. The arguments here about the select militia and the posse commitatus versus military execution are answered directly, though not by name, in The Federalist no. 29, 182ff. Regarding the former, Publius professes himself perplexed how to treat the objections, but his raillery touches a sensitive point: "Where in the name of common sense are our fears to end if we may not trust our sons, our brothers, our neighbours, our fellow-citizens?" Ibid. 185.

32. On further reflection, The Federal Farmer concluded that the power to pass bankruptcy laws should not be given to the federal government. See XVIII, 2.8.221.

33. The judiciary is discussed fully in XV, 2.8.183–95. See Pickering's well-argued replies to The Federal Farmer's contentions on this head; Pickering and Upham, The Life of Timothy Pickering II, 359–60, 366–67.

34. See Democratic Federalist 3.5.6 n. 6.

35. See above, n. 28.

36. See above, n. 17.

37. Cf. Chief Justice Marshall's argument in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, 403 (1819); and Publius in The Federalist no. 39, 253–54.

38. See Ford, Essays 163 (A Landholder); Ford, Pamphlets 77 (A Citizen of New York); The Federalist no. 84; Edmund Pendleton, letter to Lee, 14 June 1788, David John Mays, ed., The Letters and Papers of Edmund Pendleton (Charlottesville 1967) II, 532; A Native of Virginia, Observations upon the Proposed Plan of Federal Government (Petersburg 1787), reprinted in The Writings of James Monroe ed. S. M. Hamilton (1898–1903) I, 352 ff. (but not written by Monroe). For Anti-Federal rebuttals, see One of the Common People 4.8.1 n. 1; [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.2.

39. This argument is not entirely consistent with the preceding one, but Federalists, notably James Wilson, made them both. See [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.14 n. 9. See McMaster and Stone 143–44 (Wilson), 189 (Plain Truth), 377 (McKean); Ford, Essays 45–46 (Cassius); Ford, Pamphlets 242 (Aristides), 356 ff. (Iredell); Elliot IV, 259 (Pinckney). For Anti-Federal replies see Martin 2.4.38 n. 9; Brutus II, 2.9.26; Cincinnatus I, 6.1.4; DeWitt 4.3.7.

40. See Impartial Examiner 5.4.5; Henry 5.16.24. On this whole question, see Federal Farmer XVI, 2.8.196 ff.

41. See Brutus II, 2.9.30 n. 22.

42. See above, nn. 12, 16.

43. John Adams, Defence I, preface (Works IV, 290–91).

44. See VI, 2.8.71. For other Anti-Federal discussions of the ever-alert aristocracy, see [Maryland] Farmer IV, 5.1.26–32; Henry 5.16.7–8; Plebeian 6.11.2.

45. Dickinson, Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania XI.

46. See above, n. 19, and III, 2.8.39; see VI, 2.8.97; see below, n. 91. Cf. the arguments of A Citizen of America (Noah Webster) and A Landholder (Oliver Ellsworth), Ford, Pamphlets 57–61; Ford, Essays 166.

47. See above, n. 11.

48. See Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.6–12; Centinel III, 2.7.70.

49. See below, Philadelphiensis I, 3.9.2–6.

50. Delaware, Pennsylvania, New Jersey.

51. On the parties, see above, n. 2; on the forms of "federalism" see above, nn. 7, 9. On Anti-Federal attacks on the framers, see Centinel III, 2.7.70.

52. The author probably refers here principally to the vigorous replies to and attacks on Mason, Gerry, and Lee made by A Landholder (Oliver Ellsworth) in a series of essays published in late 1787. See Ford, Essays 150–66, 173–77. A Landholder described Lee as possessing a "factious spirit" and an "implacable hatred to General Washington," and suggested that he was "the author of most of the scurrility poured out in the New York papers against the new constitution." Ford, Essays 161. Other Federalist writers referred to Lee, and especially to Mason and Gerry by name (all of them having published criticisms of the Constitution over their own names); but on the whole the Anti-Federalists at least equaled their opponents in personal attacks.

53. The Letters of Junius [Woodfall's Junius]; see VIII, 2.8.107 and n. 69.

54. "It is a pity that the expectations which actuated the authors of the existing confederation, neither have nor can be realized:—accustomed to see and admire the glorious spirit which moved all ranks of people in the most gloomy moments of the war, observing their steadfast attachment to Union, and the wisdom they so often manifested both in choosing and confiding in their rulers, those gentlemen were led to flatter themselves that the people of America only required to know what ought to be done, to do it. The amiable mistake induced them to institute a national government in such a manner, as though very fit to give advice, was yet destitute of power, and so constructed as to be very unfit to be trusted with it. They seem not to have been sensible that mere advice is a sad substitute for laws; nor to have recollected that the advice even of the allwise and best of Beings, has been always disregarded by a great majority of all the men that ever lived." A Citizen of New York [John Jay], "An Address to the People of the State of New-York," 1787, Ford, Pamphlets 71.

The Articles of Confederation, A Citizen of Philadelphia wrote, "was an honest and solemn covenant among our infant States, and virtue and common danger supplied its defects." McMaster and Stone 106.

55. Note that in the sequel the distinction made here is not maintained, and the list given is of "unalienable or fundamental rights in the United States" VI, 2.8.86. See II, 2.8.19, where The Federal Farmer also writes of "unalienable and fundamental rights."

56. See above, n. 19.

57. See above, n. 11.

58. The second point is not reached until letter XII, 2.8.148, at which time the numbering is abandoned.

59. See above, V, 2.8.59.

60. See above, II, 2.8.15. Publius contends that "the idea of an actual representation of all classes of the people by persons of each class is altogether visionary." The Federalist no. 35, 219. The Federal Farmer is not referring specifically to The Federalist, however, since the essay of Publius was first published on 5 January 1788, while this essay of The Federal Farmer is dated 31 December 1787.

61. Cesare Bonesana Beccaria, An Essay on Crimes and Punishments (London 1767), Introduction; quoted in "Address to Inhabitants of Quebec, October 26, 1774" (written by R. H. Lee), Journals of the Continental Congress 1, 106. This edition of Beccaria's book, like the other early English translations, followed Beccaria's original (1764) organization of chapters. Beccaria himself later accepted an improved organization made in the 1766 translation into French by André Morellet. This is the preferable text, and it is the one used in the modern collection of Beccaria's works and in a recent Library of Liberal Arts paperback edition of On Crimes and Punishments. Unfortunately, the specific passage here, which was quoted by the Continental Congress and by several Anti-Federalists and which was the first sentence in the original introduction, was considerably altered in the revision, making the modern editions different in this crucial respect from those available to the American founding generation. See Cesare Beccaria, Opere, ed. Sergie Romagnoli (Florence 1958) I, 39; II, 862–63; Cesare Beccaria, On Crimes and Punishments, trans. Henry Paolucci (Indianapolis 1963).

62. The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6.

63. See Ibid. II, ch. 2.

64. John Adams gave good and influential expression to the stock of ideas on the natural aristocracy upon which the Anti-Federalists drew. See his Defence, letter 25 (Works IV, 396–98). For other Anti-Federalist discussions of the natural aristocracy, see above, III, 2.8.25; Cato VI, 2.6.43; Brutus III, 2.9.42; [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.26–32; Smith 6.12.22 n. 24. For Federalist replies, see McMaster and Stone 335–36 (Wilson); Elliot II, 256 (Hamilton); Carlisle Gazette 24 October 1787 (A Citizen).

65. While the thought is a common one, I have not been able to find the specific source of the observation about merchants. Regarding the schools, John Adams wrote: "Monarchies and aristocracies are in possession of the voice and influence of every university and academy in Europe. Democracy, simple democracy, never had a patron among men of letters. Democratical mixtures in government have lost almost all the advocates they ever had out of England and America." John Adams, Defence, preface (Works IV, 289).

66. This consideration takes place in letters VIII–X, 2.8.102–42.

67. J. L. DeLolme, The Constitution of England, 3d. ed. (London 1781). DeLolme's ideas of balanced government are different in important respects from The Federal Farmer's. See IX, 2.8.125.

68. DeLolme, The Constitution of England II, ch. 6. DeLolme's emphasis is considerably different from The Federal Farmer's. Indeed, the reference here is to a footnote at the conclusion of a chapter in which DeLolme has argued the advantages of having a small, select body to represent the people.

69. The Letters of Junius I, letter 18.

70. Cf. The Federalist no. 10; Cato II, 2.6.8 n. 6.

71. DeLolme, The Constitution of England II, ch. 5.

72. The Federalists do not make quite such a broad argument. But see below, n. 73, and Ford, Pamphlets 86 (A Citizen of New York), 123–25, 131 (A Citizen of Philadelphia); McMaster and Stone 274–75, 280 (McKean); Elliot II, 44 (Brooks), 87 (Bowdoin); Elliot III, 536–37 (Madison); Gazette of the State of Georgia 15 November 1787 (Demosthenes Minor); Virginia Independent Chronicle 2 April 1788 (Cassius). Cf. Martin 2.4.39 ff; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.31–37; Symmes 4.5 passim; Agrippa X, 4.6.43; XII, 4.6.58; Turner 4.18.1; Republican Federalist 4.13.21; Henry 5.16.7; Elliot III, 489 (Monroe), 494 (Mason).

73. ". . . it is a most illiberal reflection thrown out by this antifederal demagogue [Centinel] against the freemen of America, who, I trust, will always elect to this important trust men of integrity and abilities." A Federalist, McMaster and Stone 172. See The Federalist 35, 219; McMaster and Stone 172 (A Federalist), 193 (Plain Truth), 275 (McKean); 304, 337, 395 (Wilson); 439 (Candid); Elliot II, 257 (Hamilton); Elliot III, 372 (Madison). See Smith 6.12.34 n. 32.

74. See above, VIII, 2.8.99.

75. Cf. above, n. 11.

76. See McMaster and Stone 287–88 (Wilson), 171 (A Federalist); Ford, Pamphlets 169 (Fabius), 337 (Marcus); Elliot II, 38 (Dana), 273–74 (Hamilton).

77. McMaster and Stone 351–53 (Wilson), 274 (McKean), 439 (Candid); Ford, Pamphlets 124 (A Citizen of Philadelphia), 225 (Aristides), 360 (Marcus); Ford, Essays 219–20, 222–23 (A Countryman); cf. Cornelius 4.10.8–9.

78. See X, 2.8.128–29.

79. See The Federalist nos. 23, 26, 28, 31; Ford, Essays 149, 156–57 (A Landholder); McMaster and Stone 147–48, 410–11 (Wilson).

80. "While Americans remain in their present enlightened condition, and warmly attached to the cause of liberty, they cannot be enslaved. Should the general government become so lost to all sense of honor and the freedom of the people, as to attempt to enslave them, they who are the descendents of a race of men who have dethroned kings, would make an American Congress tremble, strip them of their public honors and reduce them to the lowest state of degradation." Elliot II, 169–70 (Stillman). See Ford, Pamphlets 55–56 (A Citizen of America). Also McMaster and Stone 136 (A Mechanic); Ford, Essays 166 (A Landholder); Ford, Pamphlets 127 (A Citizen of Philadelphia); 174, 202 (Fabius), 233, 256 (Aristides); Elliot III, 10 (Nicholas); Elliot IV, 95 (Iredell); The Federalist nos. 26, 28, 46, 60. See below, n. 91.

81. The Federalists seldom make quite this argument. See Ford, Pamphlets 152–53 (An American Citizen); cf. the views of Publius, The Federalist no. 28; Wilson, McMaster and Stone 147, 264; and Aristides, Ford, Pamphlets 255. For arguments that the states will not be destroyed because they are an indispensable part of the new government, see Centinel II, 2.7.36 n. 16.

82. See XVII, 2.8.210; The Federalist no. 16, 103. For other discussions of this important question see Brutus X, 2.9.128 n. 84.

83. See The Federalist no. 55; Ford, Essays 240 (A Citizen of New Haven), 152 (A Landholder); McMaster and Stone 288, 394 (Wilson).

84. See XVII, 2.8.204–5, 209–10; above, X, 2.8.128. On the insignificance of the states' functions as "boards of election" see Federal Republican 3.6.37; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.24.

85. See McMaster and Stone 192 (Plain Truth), 336 (Wilson); Ford, Essays 240 (A Citizen of New Haven).

86. XVII, 2.8.204–13.

87. See Ford, Essays 151–52 (A Landholder); McMaster and Stone 288 (Wilson); The Federalist no. 55, 374.

88. See The Federalist no. 58, 391–95. Also Ford, Essays 152 (A Landholder), 236 (A Citizen of New Haven); Ford, Pamphlets 169, 170 (Fabius); McMaster and Stone 288 (Wilson), 370 (McKean); Elliot II, 238, 253 (Hamilton).

89. Ford, Essays 164 (A Landholder).

90. McMaster and Stone 292 (Hartley), 305 (Wilson); Ford, Pamphlets 127 (A Citizen of Philadelphia); Elliot IV, 185 (Iredell); see below, n. 91.

91. See above, nn. 46, 80. See Ford, Pamphlets 86 (A Citizen of New York); 180, 186, 188 (Fabius); Ford, Essays 166 (A Landholder); Elliot II, 200 (Huntingdon); Elliot III, 14 (Nicholas), 536–37 (Madison); Virginia Independent Chronicle 30 January 1788 (Civis Rusticus); State Gazette of South Carolina 6 December 1787 (Maecenas).

92. See above, III, 2.8.28.

93. Cf. Madison's discussion of the Senate in the Constitutional Convention, Farrand I, 151–52 (7 June).

94. The Spirit of Laws II, ch. 2.

95. See II, 2.8.15.

96. See VI, 2.8.89.

97. On the subject of appointments, the specific subject of this and the following letters, see The Federalist no. 76. The broader questions treated here—especially the relations between the legislature and the executive—need to be considered in the light of Publius' full treatment of the executive in nos. 67–77.

98. See above, IX, 2.8.119–23.

99. See Ford, Pamphlets 140, 144 (An American Citizen), 228 (Aristides); McMaster and Stone 337 (Wilson). See also The Federalist no. 57, 386; no. 60, 403; and Farrand II, 283–84 (14 August; Charles Pinckney).

100. In its early deliberations the Convention accepted the provision of the Virginia resolution for ineligibility. The decisive shift toward the milder prohibition that found its way into the Constitution came on 3 September. See Farrand II, 489–92. See above, Martin 2.4.46–48.

101. See above, XI, 2.8.147.

102. Presumably Publius. Thirty-eight numbers of The Federalist had appeared by the date of this letter (14 January). Publius' papers on the executive did not come until the middle of March, and he was thus able to take up the contentions of The Federal Farmer.

103. See The Federalist no. 48; Centinel II, 2.7.50 n. 29; Lee's letter to Randolph, 5.6.

104. A certain irony here is matched by Publius in his almost opposite observation on executive power. See The Federalist no. 72, 456–87.

105. See above, III, 2.8.29.

106. The argument here should be compared with Publius' defense of unity in the executive. The Federalist nos. 71–72. The Federal Farmer's argument is the more traditional one, the immediate source of which may have been Blackstone's defense of monarchy, though The Federal Farmer of course rejects the hereditary principle. See particularly Blackstone's discussion of the royal dignity in Commentaries on the Laws of England I, 241.

107. Although Publius had not yet made the argument to this effect that appears in The Federalist no. 72, 488–89, it should be compared with The Federal Farmer's argument here. The argument was of course a very common one among the Federalists. Cf. Ford, Essays 234, 237 (A Citizen of New Haven); Farrand II, 53 (19 July; Gouverneur Morris); Elliot II, 320–21 (Hamilton), 293 (R. R. Livingston); Elliot III, 485–86 (Randolph); Elliot IV, 103–4 (Davie), 315 (Gen. C. C. Pinckney). The Anti-Federalist argument is well presented by Cato [South Carolina] 5.10.2.

108. Some objects of the power of the judiciary are in fact treated later in this essay, others are taken up in XVIII, 2.8.214–30, although the subject is not given separate treatment.

109. See DeLolme, The Constitution of England I, ch. 12, end.

110. Cf. The Federalist no. 78, 522–23: "Whoever attentively considers the different departments of power must perceive that, in a government in which they are separated from each other, the judiciary, from the nature of its functions, will always be the least dangerous to the political rights of the Constitution; because it will be least in a capacity to annoy or injure them. . . . [T]he judiciary is beyond comparison the weakest of the three departments of power. . . .[T]hough individual oppression may now and then proceed from the courts of justice, the general liberty of the people can never be endangered from that quarter; I mean so long as the judiciary remains truly distinct from both the legislature and the executive."

111. Some Federalists argued that review of facts would be by a second jury. See A Citizen of America, Examination . . . , Ford, Pamphlets 53; The Federalist no. 81, 550. On the general issue of review of law and fact, see A Democratic Federalist 3.5.6 n. 6.

112. See above, n. 12.

113. See above, n. 16.

114. See The Federalist no. 80, 539–40.

115. On bills of rights see above, II, 2.8.19–20.

116. See above, nn. 38, 39, 40. For Federalist arguments that a bill of rights would be dangerous, see The Federalist no. 84, 579; McMaster and Stone 143–44, 253–54 (Wilson), 189 (Plain Truth), 296 (Yeates); Ford, Pamphlets 242 (Aristides), 360 (Marcus); Elliot III, 191 (Randolph), 620 (Madison); Elliot IV, 141 (Maclaine), 142 (Johnston), 149, 167 (Iredell), 316 (General Pinckney).

117. James Wilson, "Address to the Citizens of Philadelphia," McMaster and Stone, 143–44. See Brutus II, 2.9.30 n. 22.

118. For other expressions of this important theme, see Old Whig IV, 3.3.21–24; Impartial Examiner 5.14.5, 10; Henry 5.16.35–38; Delegate Who Has Catched Cold 5.19.13–17; Sentiments of Many, passim. A good statement of this view of a bill of rights is provided by Edmund Randolph in commenting on the Virginia Declaration of Rights. See Bernard Schwartz, The Bill of Rights (New York 1971) I, 249.

119. See II, 2.8.16 n. 12.

120. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England III, 379.

121. [While the precise reference has not been located, the context suggests De-

Lolme, The Constitution of England, perhaps II, ch. 21. See text at n. 122 below (XVI, 2.8.203), which was located in DeLolme; see also text at n. 67 (VIII, 2.8.102), where The Federal Farmer identifies DeLolme and praises him.—M.D.]

122. DeLolme, The Constitution of England I, ch. 3.

123. See McMaster and Stone 264, 390 (Wilson); Ford, Pamphlets 39 (A Citizen of America), 121 (A Citizen of Philadelphia), 207 (Fabius), 247–48 (Aristides); Ford, Essays 238 (A Citizen of New Haven); Elliot II, 46 (Ames); Elliot IV, 58 (Davies). Publius, it should be noted, does not acknowledge this proposition. See The Federalist nos. 9, 15, 39. See Centinel V, 2.7.94.

124. I, 2.8.1.

125. Cf. The Federalist, esp. no. 23, 147–51; no. 31, 193–96.

126. See above, n. 80.

127. See The Federalist no. 28, 179; cf. the argument here with The Federalist no. 10.

128. See The Federalist no. 17, 107; no. 27, 172–73; McMaster and Stone 302, 325 (Wilson), Elliot II, 46 (Ames); 239, 267, 304, 354 (Hamilton); Elliot III, 18 (Nicholas), 257–59 (Madison). Cf. below, Brutus XI, 2.9.130 n. 87.

129. See Brutus V, 2.9.58–59; VI, 2.9.77–78.

130. See above, I, 2.8.10.

131. See Brutus XII, 2.9.155–57.

132. James Wilson, Philadelphia ratifying convention, McMaster and Stone 324.

Essays of Brutus

NEW YORK JOURNAL
October 1787–April 1788

The essays of Brutus are among the most important Anti-Federalist writings. In clear and forceful argument Brutus takes up in a highly competent way the major Anti-Federalist themes, such as consolidation,[1] the small republic, a bill of rights, and representation.[2] He provides the best Anti-Federalist rebuttal of the powerful Federalist argument, well known in the form given it by Publius, that the federal government must be given unlimited powers to meet the unlimited contingencies implicit in its vast responsibility. He provides an extended and excellent discussion—the best in the Anti-Federalist literature—of the judiciary to be established under the Constitution and its far-reaching implications.[3] In these latter respects and in general, the Brutus essays are the most direct Anti-Federal confrontation of the arguments of The Federalist.

The essays appeared in the New York Journal between October 1787 and April 1788, during which time the first seventy-seven papers of The Federalist also appeared. They were widely reprinted and referred to; but despite their importance and high quality, they had never been reprinted in their entirety until 1971.[4]

The essays have generally been attributed to Robert Yates on the authority of Paul Leicester Ford. The attribution is somewhat questionable, Ford himself having first attributed the essays to Thomas Treadwell (as did Samuel B. Harding), then changing his mind.[5] Ford does not give the evidence for concluding that Yates was the author. As Morton Borden correctly observes, the Brutus essays are clearly superior to the essays of Sydney, which have also been attributed to Yates;[6] if, however, the latter were written by Abraham Yates, as DePauw contends,[7] that would leave the field clear for Robert as Brutus. Ford does not give the evidence on which he formed his judgment, and no evidence one way or the other has been unearthed by the present editor.[8] (This Brutus is in any case not to be confused with Brutus [Virginia] 5.15.)

There follows an extended outline of the argument of Brutus.

Introduction—Importance of decision, need for care (I, 2.9.1–3).

I. Basic question: Is confederated government best for U.S.? (I, 2.9.1–21).

A. Government proposed is, though not perfect consolidation, so close as to terminate in it (I, 2.9.4–9).
   1. It is supreme within its sphere (necessary and proper clause); so far as its powers reach, it is a complete government, not a confederation (2.9.5).
   2. Powers are ostensibly limited but extend to everything of importance (2.9.5–9).
      a. Taxing power is complete and implies or draws with it all other powers (2.9.5).
      b. Judicial power is extensive and will eclipse state courts (2.9.7).
      c. Necessary and proper clause might be interpreted to give Congress complete control over states (2.9.8–9).

(Back then to question, 2.9.10).

B. Can free government be exercised over the whole U.S. reduced to one state? No.
   1. Authority denies it (2.9.11).
   2. History denies it (2.9.12).
   3. Reason denies it (2.9.13–20).
      a. Distinction between despotic government, pure democracy, free (representative) republic, the last being at issue here (2.9.13).
      b. Impossibility of a representation, in a country so large and populous as the U.S., that will speak the sentiments of the people without becoming too numerous for business (2.9.14–15).
      c. Free republic requires a similarity of manners, sentiments, interests in contrast to U.S. variety (2.9.16).
      d. Execution of laws in free republic depends on confidence of people, which must be lacking in so extensive a country (2.9.17–18).
      e. Legislature cannot have necessary knowledge of and time to deal with concerns and wants of different parts (2.9.19).
      f. In such an extensive republic officers of government would soon rise above control of people and abuse their power (2.9.20).

Above argument at least shows necessity, in forming government for this country, of (1) limiting and defining powers, (discussed in V–XV); (2) adjusting parts, (discussed in III, IV, XVI); (3) guarding against abuse of authority (discussed in II, 2.9.22–23).

II. Bill of Rights (II, 2.9.22–33).
   A. The origins of civil government—kinds of individual rights. Foundation should be laid in express reservations by people of such of their essential national rights as are not necessary to be parted with (2.9.24; see IX, 2.9.102).

B. Bill of Rights as necessary for federal government as for states (2.9.26–33).
   1. It is necessary, for example, in protection of individual in criminal prosecution (2.9.27–28).
   2. It is necessary, for example, as certain provisions in proposed constitution themselves show (2.9.29–30; see IX, 2.9.103–4).
   3. This is an original compact, doing away with all provisions of state constitutions that are inconsistent (2.9.31–32).
   4. A Bill of Rights is all the more necessary in view of unrestrained power to make treaties, which become part of supreme law of land (2.9.33).

III. Organization of government—representation (III, IV, 2.9.34–54). (III and IV deal with the question of representation, particularly in the House of Representatives; the discussion is important but [especially IV] somewhat disorderly. The discussion may be grouped among the major headings, as follows.)
   A. Representation of slaves unreasonable and unjust (III, 2.9.38–39).
   B. Equal representation of states in Senate unreasonable and unjust (III, 2.9.40).
   C. The representation is merely nominal—not sufficiently numerous to enable it to resemble the people, to contain representatives of several orders of people, to resist tendency of natural aristocracy to rule, to enable people to have knowledge of representatives (III, 2.9.41–42; IV, 2.9.45, 48–49).
   D. There will be no security in so small a body as House of Representatives against influence and corruption (III, 2.9.42–44; IV, 2.9.47).
   E. Feeble representation will not command confidence of people, which is necessary to the execution of the law in free government; thus execution by military force will be necessary (IV, 2.9.48–50).
   F. Danger of "time/place/manner" provision (IV, 2.9.51–53).
   G. Not sufficient to say good men will rule—constitutions are to regulate conduct of bad men (IV, 2.9.54).

IV. Legislative powers are broad and indefinite (V–X, 2.9.55–129). (Instead of proceeding with enquiry into the organization of the system, Brutus turns next to powers granted to legislature, V, 2.9.55. The discussion of organization is resumed in XVI, 2.9.197 ff.)
   A. Preamble and necessary and proper clause, taken together, confer what amounts to a power to make laws at discretion. Rule of broad construction stated (V, 2.9.57).
   B. Taxing power (V, VI, VIII, 2.9.55–92).
      1. General welfare clause broadly construed. (V, 2.9.58; VI, 2.9.77–78).
      2. The power to tax is unlimited (V, 2.9.59–60; VI, 2.9.71–78).
      3. The power to tax will annihilate power of individual states (V, 2.9.61–63; VI, 2.9.64–70, 75–76).

4. The argument that the power given to the general government must be unlimited because the exigencies of the federal government are unlimited is insufficient:
   a. National safety is not the only end; the states are responsible for managing internal concerns, which are in fact first objects of government and which also require revenue (V, 2.9.63; VI, 2.9.79–81).
   b. A distinction could have been drawn between external and internal taxes (V, 2.9.63; VII, 2.9.92).
   c. The aim of American governments is, or ought to be, not glory but domestic peace and justice (VII, 2.9.86–87).
   d. Granting the need for additional federal powers and granting that remote contingencies cannot be foreseen, yet the powers need not be unlimited, for rational judgments of need can be made (VII, 2.9.88–90).

C. Authority to borrow money is general and unlimited (VIII, 2.9.93–95).

D. Power to raise armies (VIII, IX, X, 2.9.93–129).
   1. This power is indefinite and unlimited (VIII, 2.9.96–97).
   2. Standing armies are dangerous to liberty (VIII, 2.9.99–101; IX, 2.9.105, 110; X, 2.9.115–20).
   3. Explicit prohibition of standing army is needed; a general reliance on sentiments of people and resistance of states not sufficient (IX, 2.9.106–9; X, 2.9.129).
   4. Answers to Federalist arguments of necessity of standing army and impracticality of restriction (IX, 2.9.111–14; X, 2.9.121–27).

V. Nature and extent of judicial power (XI–XV, 2.9.130–196). (This subject is little discussed in other writings, yet the real effects of the new system of government will be brought home to the people through the judiciary, which occupies a position totally independent. X, 2.9.130).

A. Judicial power of constitutional interpretation (X–XII, 2.9.115–158). (Without trying to give perfect explanation, will show that federal judiciary will subvert state judiciary, if not legislatures. XI, 2.9.133).
   1. Federal courts are vested with power to resolve, according to spirit as well as letter, all questions of construction of Constitution (XI, 2.9.134–38).
   2. Judicial power will subvert state governments and favor general government (XI, 2.9.139–44).
      a. Wide and general terms of the Constitution countenance such a construction. If necessary and proper clause does not grant additional powers, it does sanction broad construction (XI, 2.9.139–41).
      b. Court will be interested in broad interpretation (XI, 2.9.142).
      c. British precedent will favor it (XI, 2.9.143–44).

3. How judicial power will operate to extend legislative and judicial authority of federal government and finally destroy such authority of states (XII, 2.9.145–58; see XV, 2.9.194–96).

B. Other matters of which federal judiciary has cognizance (XIII–XIV, 2.9.159–85).
   1. Authority in all cases arising under laws of U.S., which is proper (XIII, 2.9.159).
   2. Power to decide all cases in law and equity under treaties is unintelligible—what is equity under treaty (XIII, 2.9.160)?
   3. Jurisdiction over cases affecting ambassadors, where U.S. is a party, and between states is proper; but doubt if Supreme Court should have original jurisdiction (XIII, 2.9.160; XIV, 2.9.168).
   4. Jurisdiction over controversies between state and citizen of another state not proper (extended discussion) (XIII, 2.9.161–67).
   5. Appellate jurisdiction of Supreme Court is one of most objectionable parts of Constitution (XIV, 2.9.169).
      a. Appeals in criminal matters is new and harmful (XIV, 2.9.170–72).
      b. Appellate jurisdiction, as granted, in civil cases eliminates final jury trial of facts, despite confused denials of advocates, and will lead to great expense and delay (XIV, 173–78, 184–85).
      c. These extraordinary powers all the more objectionable because not needed; state courts provide protection of individual rights (XIV, 2.9.179–83).

C. Supreme Court under Constitution will be exalted above all other power in government and subject to no control (XV, 2.9.186–97).
   1. Judges in England hold offices during good behavior but are more carefully circumscribed (2.9.187–88).
   2. Proposed judiciary is independent in fullest sense; yet British reason for independence of crown does not apply here (2.9.189–90).
      a. No superior to correct errors or control decisions (2.9.191).
      b. No removal or diminution of salary for error (2.9.192).
      c. Power of Court often superior to legislature—can declare acts of legislature void (2.9.193–96).

D. Judiciary should be subject to control of some supreme body that is responsible to the people (XVI, 2.9.197).

VI. Senate (XVI, 2.9.197–204). (A very sketchy discussion).

A. Organization (2.9.198–202).
   1. Election by state is proper for confederal system (2.9.198–99).
   2. Term too long, and rotation and recall should be provided (2.9.200–201).

B. Powers (2.9.202–4). The Senate will possess a strange mixture of legislative, executive, and judicial powers, which will clash with each other.

1. Centinel, in his third letter (III, 2.7.77), thought that his proposed discussion of the dangers of consolidation had been rendered superfluous by the appearance of the first number of Brutus.

2. Cato contents himself with a very brief discussion of representation (V, 2.6.38), referring his reader to the able and full discussion of Brutus, which had appeared by the time Cato reached this subject.

3. Edward S. Corwin, recognizing the importance of the essays dealing with the judiciary, reprinted essays XI, XII, XV in his Court over Constitution (Princeton, N.J., 1938) 231–62.

4. William Jeffrey, Jr., "The Letters of Brutus—A Neglected Element in the Ratification Campaign of 1787–88," University of Cincinnati Law Review 40, no. 4 (1971): 643–777.

5. Ford, Pamphlets 117, 424; Harding, The Contest over Ratification of the Federal Constitution in Massachusetts 17 n. 3; Ford, Essays 295.

6. See below Sydney 6.9. Morton Borden, The Antifederalist Papers (East Lansing, Mich., 1965) 42.

7. DePauw, The Eleventh Pillar 131.

8. At one point Brutus disclaims the legal knowledge necessary to discuss fully the judiciary (below, XI, 2.9.132), which might seem to argue against the authorship of Yates, who was a lawyer and judge. But the legal knowledge actually displayed is considerable and argues rather in favor of Yates' authorship. William Jeffrey, Jr., makes the appealing suggestion of Melancton Smith, but the circumstantial case is not a very persuasive one. See University of Cincinnati Law Review 40, no. 4 (1971): 644–46.

I[1]

18 October 1787

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

When the public is called to investigate and decide upon a question in which 2.9.1
not only the present members of the community are deeply interested, but upon which the happiness and misery of generations yet unborn is in great measure suspended, the benevolent mind cannot help feeling itself peculiarly interested in the result.

In this situation, I trust the feeble efforts of an individual, to lead the minds of the people to a wise and prudent determination, cannot fail of being acceptable to the candid and dispassionate part of the community. Encouraged by this consideration, I have been induced to offer my thoughts upon the present important crisis of our public affairs.

Perhaps this country never saw so critical a period in their political con- 2.9.2
cerns. We have felt the feebleness of the ties by which these United-States are held together, and the want of sufficient energy in our present confederation, to manage, in some instances, our general concerns. Various expedients have been proposed to remedy these evils, but none have succeeded. At length a Convention of the states has been assembled, they have formed a constitution which will now, probably, be submitted to the people to ratify or reject, who are the fountain of all power, to whom alone it of right belongs to make or unmake constitutions, or forms of government, at their pleasure. The most important question that was ever proposed to your decision, or to the decision of any people under heaven, is before you, and you are to decide upon it by men of your own election, chosen specially for this purpose. If the constitution, offered to your acceptance, be a wise one, calculated to preserve the invaluable blessings of liberty, to secure the inestimable rights of mankind, and promote human happiness, then, if you accept it, you will lay a lasting foundation of happiness for millions yet unborn; generations to come will rise up and call you blessed. You may rejoice in the prospects of this vast extended continent becoming filled with freemen, who will assert the dignity of human nature. You may solace yourselves with the idea, that society, in this favoured land, will fast advance to the highest point of perfection; the human mind will expand in knowledge and virtue, and the golden age be, in some measure, realised. But if, on the other hand, this form of government contains principles that will lead to the subversion of liberty—if it tends to establish a despotism, or, what is worse, a tyrannic aristocracy; then, if you adopt it, this only remaining assylum for liberty will be shut up, and posterity will execrate your memory.

2.9.3 Momentous then is the question you have to determine, and you are called upon by every motive which should influence a noble and virtuous mind, to examine it well, and to make up a wise judgment. It is insisted, indeed, that this constitution must be received, be it ever so imperfect. If it has its defects, it is said, they can be best amended when they are experienced. But remember, when the people once part with power, they can seldom or never resume it again but by force. Many instances can be produced in which the people have voluntarily increased the powers of their rulers; but few, if any, in which rulers have willingly abridged their authority. This is a sufficient reason to induce you to be careful, in the first instance, how you deposit the powers of government.

2.9.4 With these few introductory remarks, I shall proceed to a consideration of this constitution:

The first question that presents itself on the subject is, whether a confederated government be the best for the United States or not?[2] Or in other words, whether the thirteen United States should be reduced to one great republic, governed by one legislature, and under the direction of one executive and judicial; or whether they should continue thirteen confederated republics, under the direction and controul of a supreme federal head for certain defined national purposes only?

This enquiry is important, because, although the government reported by the convention does not go to a perfect and entire consolidation, yet it approaches so near to it, that it must, if executed, certainly and infallibly terminate in it.

This government is to possess absolute and uncontroulable power, legislative, executive and judicial, with respect to every object to which it extends, for by the last clause of section 8th, article 1st, it is declared "that the Congress shall have power to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution, in the government of the United States; or in any department or office thereof." And by the 6th article, it is declared "that this constitution, and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution, or law of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." It appears from these articles that there is no need of any intervention of the state governments, between the Congress and the people, to execute any one power vested in the general government, and that the constitution and laws of every state are nullified and declared void, so far as they are or shall be inconsistent with this constitution, or the laws made in pursuance of it, or with treaties made under the authority of the United States.—The government then, so far as it extends, is a complete one, and not a confederation. It is as much one complete government as that of New-York or Massachusetts, has as absolute and perfect powers to make and execute all laws, to appoint officers, institute courts, declare offences, and annex penalties, with respect to every object to which it extends, as any other in the world. So far therefore as its powers reach, all ideas of confederation are given up and lost. It is true this government is limited to certain objects, or to speak more properly, some small degree of power is still left to the states, but a little attention to the powers vested in the general government, will convince every candid man, that if it is capable of being executed, all that is reserved for the individual states must very soon be annihilated, except so far as they are barely necessary to the organization of the general government. The powers of the general legislature extend to every case that is of the least importance—there is nothing valuable to human nature, nothing dear to freemen, but what is within its power. It has authority to make laws which will affect the lives, the liberty, and property of every man in the United States; nor can the constitution or laws of any state, in any way prevent or impede the full and complete execution of every power given. The legislative power is competent to lay taxes, duties, imposts, and excises;[3]—there is no limitation to this power, unless it be said that the clause which directs the use to which those taxes, and duties shall be applied, may be said to be a limitation: but this is no restriction of the power at all, for by this clause they are to be applied to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; but the legislature have authority to contract debts at their discretion; they are the sole judges of what is necessary to provide for the common defence, and they only are to determine what is for the general welfare; this power therefore is neither more nor less, than a power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, and excises, at their pleasure; not only [is] the power to lay taxes unlimited, as to the amount they may require, but it is perfect and absolute to raise them in any mode they please. No state legislature, or any power in the state governments, have any more to do in carrying this into effect, than the authority of one state has to do with that of another. In the business therefore of laying and collecting taxes, the idea of confederation is totally lost, and that of one entire republic is embraced. It is proper here to remark, that the authority to lay and collect taxes is the most important of any power that can be granted; it connects with it almost all other powers, or at least will in process of time draw all other after it; it is the great mean of protection, security, and defence, in a good government, and the great engine of oppression and tyranny in a bad one.[4] This cannot fail of being the case, if we consider the contracted limits which are set by this constitution, to the late [state?] governments, on this article of raising money. No state can emit paper money—lay any duties, or imposts, on imports, or exports, but by consent of the Congress; and then the net produce shall be for the benefit of the United States: the only mean therefore left, for any state to support its government and discharge its debts, is by direct taxation; and the United States have also power to lay and collect taxes, in any way they please. Every one who has thought on the subject, must be convinced that but small sums of money can be collected in any country, by direct taxe[s], when the foederal government begins to exercise the right of taxation in all its parts, the legislatures of the several states will find it impossible to raise monies to support their governments. Without money they cannot be supported, and they must dwindle away, and, as before observed, their powers absorbed in that of the general government.

2.9.5

2.9.6 It might be here shewn, that the power in the federal legislative, to raise and support armies at pleasure, as well in peace as in war, and their controul over the militia, tend, not only to a consolidation of the government, but the destruction of liberty.[5]—I shall not, however, dwell upon these, as a few observations upon the judicial power of this government, in addition to the preceding, will fully evince the truth of the position.

2.9.7 The judicial power of the United States is to be vested in a supreme court, and in such inferior courts as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.[6] The powers of these courts are very extensive; their jurisdiction comprehends all civil causes, except such as arise between citizens of the same state; and it extends to all cases in law and equity arising under the constitution. One inferior court must be established, I presume, in each state, at least, with the necessary executive officers appendant thereto. It is easy to see, that in the common course of things, these courts will eclipse the dignity, and take away from the respectability, of the state courts. These courts will be, in themselves, totally independent of the states, deriving their authority from the United States, and receiving from them fixed salaries; and in the course of human events it is to be expected, that they will swallow up all the powers of the courts in the respective states.

2.9.8 How far the clause in the 8th section of the 1st article may operate to do away all idea of confederated states, and to effect an entire consolidation of the whole into one general government, it is impossible to say. The powers given by this article are very general and comprehensive, and it may receive a construction to justify the passing almost any law. A power to make all laws, which shall be necessary and proper, for carrying into execution, all powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or any department or officer thereof, is a power very comprehensive and definite [indefinite?], and may, for ought I know, be exercised in a such manner as entirely to abolish the state legislatures.[7] Suppose the legislature of a state should pass a law to raise money to support their government and pay the state debt, may the Congress repeal this law, because it may prevent the collection of a tax which they may think proper and necessary to lay, to provide for the general welfare of the United States? For all laws made, in pursuance of this constitution, are the supreme lay of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution or laws of the different states to the contrary notwithstanding.—By such a law, the government of a particular state might be overturned at one stroke, and thereby be deprived of every means of its support.

2.9.9 It is not meant, by stating this case, to insinuate that the constitution would warrant a law of this kind; or unnecessarily to alarm the fears of the people, by suggesting, that the federal legislature would be more likely to pass the limits assigned them by the constitution, than that of an individual state, further than they are less responsible to the people. But what is meant is, that the legislature of the United States are vested with the great and uncontroulable powers, of laying and collecting taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; of regulating trade, raising and supporting armies, organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, instituting courts, and other general powers. And are by this clause invested with the power of making all laws, proper and necessary, for carrying all these into execution; and they may so exercise this power as entirely to annihilate all the state governments, and reduce this country to one single government. And if they may do it, it is pretty certain they will; for it will be found that the power retained by individual states, small as it is, will be a clog upon the wheels of the government of the United States; the latter therefore will be naturally inclined to remove it out of the way. Besides, it is a truth confirmed by the unerring experience of ages, that every man, and every body of men, invested with power, are ever disposed to increase it, and to acquire a superiority over every thing that stands in their way. This disposition, which is implanted in human nature, will operate in the federal legislature to lessen and ultimately to subvert the state authority, and having such advantages, will most certainly succeed, if the federal government succeeds at all. It must be very evident then, that what this constitution wants of being a complete consolidation of the several parts of the union into one complete government, possessed of perfect legislative, judicial, and executive powers, to all intents and purposes, it will necessarily acquire in its exercise and operation.

2.9.10 Let us now proceed to enquire, as I at first proposed, whether it be best the thirteen United States should be reduced to one great republic, or not? It is here taken for granted, that all agree in this, that whatever government we adopt, it ought to be a free one; that it should be so framed as to secure the liberty of the citizens of America, and such an one as to admit of a full, fair, and equal representation of the people. The question then will be, whether a government thus constituted, and founded on such principles, is practicable, and can be exercised over the whole United States, reduced into one state?

2.9.11 If respect is to be paid to the opinion of the greatest and wisest men who have ever thought or wrote on the science of government, we shall be constrained to conclude, that a free republic cannot succeed over a country of such immense extent, containing such a number of inhabitants, and these encreasing in such rapid progression as that of the whole United States. Among the many illustrious authorities which might be produced to this point, I shall content myself with quoting only two. The one is the baron de Montesquieu, spirit of laws, chap. xvi. vol. I [book VIII]. "It is natural to a republic to have only a small territory, otherwise it cannot long subsist. In a large republic there are men of large fortunes, and consequently of less moderation; there are trusts too great to be placed in any single subject; he has interest of his own; he soon begins to think that he may be happy, great and glorious, by oppressing his fellow citizens; and that he may raise himself to grandeur on the ruins of his country. In a large republic, the public good is sacrificed to a thousand views; it is subordinate to exceptions, and depends on accidents. In a small one, the interest of the public is easier perceived, better understood, and more within the reach of every citizen; abuses are of less extent, and of course are less protected."[8] Of the same opinion is the marquis Beccarari.

2.9.12 History furnishes no example of a free republic, any thing like the extent of the United States. The Grecian republics were of small extent; so also was that of the Romans. Both of these, it is true, in process of time, extended their conquests over large territories of country; and the consequence was, that their governments were changed from that of free governments to those of the most tyrannical that ever existed in the world.

2.9.13 Not only the opinion of the greatest men, and the experience of mankind, are against the idea of an extensive republic, but a variety of reasons may be drawn from the reason and nature of things, against it. In every government, the will of the sovereign is the law. In despotic governments, the supreme authority being lodged in one, his will is law, and can be as easily expressed to a large extensive territory as to a small one. In a pure democracy the people are the sovereign, and their will is declared by themselves; for this purpose they must all come together to deliberate, and decide. This kind of government cannot be exercised, therefore, over a country of any considerable extent; it must be confined to a single city, or at least limited to such bounds as that the people can conveniently assemble, be able to debate, understand the subject submitted to them, and declare their opinion concerning it.

2.9.14 In a free republic, although all laws are derived from the consent of the people, yet the people do not declare their consent by themselves in person, but by representatives, chosen by them, who are supposed to know the minds of their constituents, and to be possessed of integrity to declare this mind.[9]

In every free government, the people must give their assent to the laws by which they are governed. This is the true criterion between a free government and an arbitrary one. The former are ruled by the will of the whole, expressed in any manner they may agree upon; the latter by the will of one, or a few. If the people are to give their assent to the laws, by persons chosen and appointed by them, the manner of the choice and the number chosen, must be such, as to possess, be disposed, and consequently qualified to declare the sentiments of the people; for if they do not know, or are not disposed to speak the sentiments of the people, the people do not govern, but the sovereignty is in a few. Now, in a large extended country, it is impossible to have a representation, possessing the sentiments, and of integrity, to declare the minds of the people, without having it so numerous and unwieldly, as to be subject in great measure to the inconveniency of a democratic government.

2.9.15 The territory of the United States is of vast extent; it now contains near three millions of souls, and is capable of containing much more than ten times that number. Is it practicable for a country, so large and so numerous as they will soon become, to elect a representation, that will speak their sentiments, without their becoming so numerous as to be incapable of transacting public business? It certainly is not.

2.9.16 In a republic, the manners, sentiments, and interests of the people should be similar. If this be not the case, there will be a constant clashing of opinions; and the representatives of one part will be continually striving against those of the other.[10] This will retard the operations of government, and prevent such conclusions as will promote the public good. If we apply this remark to the condition of the United States, we shall be convinced that it forbids that we should be one government. The United States includes a variety of climates. The productions of the different parts of the union are very variant, and their interests, of consequence, diverse. Their manners and habits differ as much as their climates and productions; and their sentiments are by no means coincident. The laws and customs of the several states are, in many respects, very diverse, and in some opposite; each would be in favor of its own interests and customs, and, of consequence, a legislature, formed of representatives from the respective parts, would not only be too numerous to act with any care or decision, but would be composed of such heterogenous and discordant principles, as would constantly be contending with each other.

2.9.17 The laws cannot be executed in a republic, of an extent equal to that of the United States, with promptitude.

The magistrates in every government must be supported in the execution of the laws, either by an armed force, maintained at the public expence for that purpose; or by the people turning out to aid the magistrate upon his command, in case of resistance.

In despotic governments, as well as in all the monarchies of Europe, standing armies are kept up to execute the commands of the prince or the magistrate, and are employed for this purpose when occasion requires: But they have always proved the destruction of liberty, and [are] abhorrent to the spirit of a free republic. In England, where they depend upon the parliament for their annual support, they have always been complained of as oppressive and unconstitutional, and are seldom employed in executing of the laws; never except on extraordinary occasions, and then under the direction of a civil magistrate.

2.9.18 A free republic will never keep a standing army to execute its laws. It must depend upon the support of its citizens. But when a government is to receive its support from the aid of the citizens, it must be so constructed as to have the confidence, respect, and affection of the people.[11] Men who, upon the call of the magistrate, offer themselves to execute the laws, are influenced to do it either by affection to the government, or from fear; where a standing army is at hand to punish offenders, every man is actuated by the latter principle, and therefore, when the magistrate calls, will obey: but, where this is not the case, the government must rest for its support upon the confidence and respect which the people have for their government and laws. The body of the people being attached, the government will always be sufficient to support and execute its laws, and to operate upon the fears of any faction which may be opposed to it, not only to prevent an opposition to the execution of the laws themselves, but also to compel the most of them to aid the magistrate; but the people will not be likely to have such confidence in their rulers, in a republic so extensive as the United States, as necessary for these purposes. The confidence which the people have in their rulers, in a free republic, arises from their knowing them, from their being responsible to them for their conduct, and from the power they have of displacing them when they misbehave: but in a republic of the extent of this continent, the people in general would be acquainted with very few of their rulers: the people at large would know little of their proceedings, and it would be extremely difficult to change them. The people in Georgia and New-Hampshire would not know one another's mind, and therefore could not act in concert to enable them to effect a general change of representatives. The different parts of so extensive a country could not possibly be made acquainted with the conduct of their representatives, nor be informed of the reasons upon which measures were founded. The consequence will be, they will have no confidence in their legislature, suspect them of ambitious views, be jealous of every measure they adopt, and will not support the laws they pass.[12] Hence the government will be nerveless and inefficient, and no way will be left to render it otherwise, but by establishing an armed force to execute the laws at the point of the bayonet—a government of all others the most to be dreaded.

2.9.19 In a republic of such vast extent as the United-States, the legislature cannot attend to the various concerns and wants of its different parts. It cannot be sufficiently numerous to be acquainted with the local condition and wants of the different districts, and if it could, it is impossible it should have sufficient time to attend to and provide for all the variety of cases of this nature, that would be continually arising.

2.9.20 In so extensive a republic, the great officers of government would soon become above the controul of the people, and abuse their power to the purpose of aggrandizing themselves, and oppressing them. The trust committed to the executive offices, in a country of the extent of the United-States, must be various and of magnitude. The command of all the troops and navy of the republic, the appointment of officers, the power of pardoning offences, the collecting of all the public revenues, and the power of expending them, with a number of other powers, must be lodged and exercised in every state, in the hands of a few. When these are attended with great honor and emolument, as they always will be in large states, so as greatly to interest men to pursue them, and to be proper objects for ambitious and designing men, such men will be ever restless in their pursuit after them. They will use the power, when they have acquired it, to the purposes of gratifying their own interest and ambition, and it is scarcely possible, in a very large republic, to call them to account for their misconduct, or to prevent their abuse of power.[13]

2.9.21 These are some of the reasons by which it appears, that a free republic cannot long subsist over a country of the great extent of these states. If then this new constitution is calculated to consolidate the thirteen states into one, as it evidently is, it ought not to be adopted.

Though I am of opinion, that it is a sufficient objection to this government, to reject it, that it creates the whole union into one government, under the form of a republic, yet if this objection was obviated, there are exceptions to it, which are so material and fundamental, that they ought to determine every man, who is a friend to the liberty and happiness of mankind, not to adopt it. I beg the candid and dispassionate attention of my countrymen while I state these objections—they are such as have obtruded themselves upon my mind upon a careful attention to the matter, and such as I sincerely believe are well founded. There are many objections, of small moment, of which I shall take no notice—perfection is not to be expected in any thing that is the production of man—and if I did not in my conscience believe that this scheme was defective in the fundamental principles—in the foundation upon which a free and equal government must rest—I would hold my peace.

Brutus.

II

1 November 1787

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

2.9.22 I flatter myself that my last address established this position, that to reduce the Thirteen States into one government, would prove the destruction of your liberties.

But lest this truth should be doubted by some, I will now proceed to consider its merits.

2.9.23 Though it should be admitted, that the argument[s] against reducing all the states into one consolidated government, are not sufficient fully to establish this point; yet they will, at least, justify this conclusion, that in forming a constitution for such a country, great care should be taken to limit and definite its powers, adjust its parts, and guard against an abuse of authority. How far attention has been paid to these objects, shall be the subject of future enquiry. When a building is to be erected which is intended to stand for ages, the foundation should be firmly laid. The constitution proposed to your acceptance, is designed not for yourselves alone, but for generations yet unborn. The principles, therefore, upon which the social compact is founded, ought to have been clearly and precisely stated, and the most express and full declaration of rights to have been made—But on this subject there is almost an entire silence.

2.9.24 If we may collect the sentiments of the people of America, from their own most solemn declarations, they hold this truth as self evident, that all men are by nature free. No one man, therefore, or any class of men, have a right, by the law of nature, or of God, to assume or exercise authority over their fellows. The origin of society then is to be sought, not in any natural right which one man has to exercise authority over another, but in the united consent of those who associate. The mutual wants of men, at first dictated the propriety of forming societies; and when they were established, protection and defence pointed out the necessity of instituting government. In a state of nature every individual pursues his own interest; in this pursuit it frequently happened, that the possessions or enjoyments of one were sacrificed to the views and designs of another; thus the weak were a prey to the strong, the simple and unwary were subject to impositions from those who were more crafty and designing. In this state of things, every individual was insecure; common interest therefore directed, that government should be established, in which the force of the whole community should be collected, and under such directions, as to protect and defend every one who composed it. The common good, therefore, is the end of civil government, and common consent, the foundation on which it is established. To effect this end, it was necessary that a certain portion of natural liberty should be surrendered, in order, that what remained should be preserved: how great a proportion of natural freedom is necessary to be yielded by individuals, when they submit to government, I shall not now enquire. So much, however, must be given up, as will be sufficient to enable those, to whom the administration of the government is committed, to establish laws for the promoting the happiness of the community, and to carry those laws into effect. But it is not necessary, for this purpose, that individuals should relinquish all their natural rights. Some are of such a nature that they cannot be surrendered. Of this kind are the rights of conscience, the right of enjoying and defending life, etc. Others are not necessary to be resigned, in order to attain the end for which government is instituted, these therefore ought not to be given up. To surrender them, would counteract the very end of government, to wit, the common good.[14] From these observations it appears, that in forming a government on its true principles, the foundation should be laid in the manner I before stated, by expressly reserving to the people such of their essential natural rights, as are not necessary to be parted with.[15] The same reasons which at first induced mankind to associate and institute government, will operate to influence them to observe this precaution. If they had been disposed to conform themselves to the rule of immutable righteousness, government would not have been requisite. It was because one part exercised fraud, oppression, and violence on the other, that men came together, and agreed that certain rules should be formed, to regulate the conduct of all, and the power of the whole community lodged in the hands of rulers to enforce an obedience to them. But rulers have the same propensities as other men; they are as likely to use the power with which they are vested for private purposes, and to the injury and oppression of those over whom they are placed, as individuals in a state of nature are to injure and oppress one another. It is therefore as proper that bounds should be set to their authority, as that government should have at first been instituted to restrain private injuries.[16]

2.9.25 This principle, which seems so evidently founded in the reason and nature of things, is confirmed by universal experience. Those who have governed, have been found in all ages ever active to enlarge their powers and abridge the public liberty. This has induced the people in all countries, where any sense of freedom remained, to fix barriers against the encroachments of their rulers. The country from which we have derived our origin, is an eminent example of this. Their magna charta and bill of rights have long been the boast, as well as the security, of that nation. I need say no more, I presume, to an American, than, that this principle is a fundamental one, in all the constitutions of our own states; there is not one of them but what is either founded on a declaration or bill of rights, or has certain express reservation of rights interwoven in the body of them. From this it appears, that at a time when the pulse of liberty beat high and when an appeal was made to the people to form constitutions for the government of themselves, it was their universal sense, that such declarations should make a part of their frames of government. It is therefore the more astonishing, that this grand security, to the rights of the people, is not to be found in this constitution.

2.9.26 It has been said, in answer to this objection, that such declaration[s] of rights, however requisite they might be in the constitutions of the states, are not necessary in the general constitution, because, "in the former case, every thing which is not reserved is given, but in the latter the reverse of the proposition prevails, and every thing which is not given is reserved."[17] It requires but little attention to discover, that this mode of reasoning is rather specious than solid. The powers, rights, and authority, granted to the general government by this constitution, are as complete, with respect to every object to which they extend, as that of any state government—It reaches to every thing which concerns human happiness—Life, liberty, and property, are under its controul. There is the same reason, therefore, that the exercise of power, in this case, should be restrained within proper limits, as in that of the state governments. To set this matter in a clear light, permit me to instance some of the articles of the bills of rights of the individual states, and apply them to the case in question.[18]

2.9.27 For the security of life, in criminal prosecutions, the bills of rights of most of the states have declared, that no man shall be held to answer for a crime until he is made fully acquainted with the charge brought against him; he shall not be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself—The witnesses against him shall be brought face to face, and he shall be fully heard by himself or counsel. That it is essential to the security of life and liberty, that trial of facts be in the vicinity where they happen. Are not provisions of this kind as necessary in the general government, as in that of a particular state? The powers vested in the new Congress extend in many cases to life; they are authorised to provide for the punishment of a variety of capital crimes, and no restraint is laid upon them in its exercise, save only, that "the trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be in the state where the said crimes shall have been committed." No man is secure of a trial in the county where he is charged to have committed a crime; he may be brought from Niagara to New-York, or carried from Kentucky to Richmond for trial for an offence, supposed to be committed. What security is there, that a man shall be furnished with a full and plain description of the charges against him? That he shall be allowed to produce all proof he can in his favor? That he shall see the witnesses against him face to face, or that he shall be fully heard in his own defence by himself or counsel?

2.9.28 For the security of liberty it has been declared, "that excessive bail should not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel or unusual punishments inflicted—That all warrants, without oath or affirmation, to search suspected places, or seize any person, his papers or property, are grievous and oppressive."[19]

These provisions are as necessary under the general government as under that of the individual states; for the power of the former is as complete to the purpose of requiring bail, imposing fines, inflicting punishments, granting search warrants, and seizing persons, papers, or property, in certain cases, as the other.

2.9.29 For the purpose of securing the property of the citizens, it is declared by all the states, "that in all controversies at law, respecting property, the ancient mode of trial by jury is one of the best securities of the rights of the people, and ought to remain sacred and inviolable."[20]

Does not the same necessity exist of reserving this right, under this national compact, as in that of these states? Yet nothing is said respecting it. In the bills of rights of the states it is declared, that a well regulated militia is the proper and natural defence of a free government—That as standing armies in time of peace are dangerous, they are not to be kept up, and that the military should be kept under strict subordination to, and controuled by the civil power.[21]

The same security is as necessary in this constitution, and much more so: for the general government will have the sole power to raise and to pay armies, and are under no controul in the exercise of it; yet nothing of this is to be found in this new system.

2.9.30 I might proceed to instance a number of other rights, which were as necessary to be reserved, such as, that elections should be free, that the liberty of the press should be held sacred; but the instances adduced, are sufficient to prove, that this argument is without foundation.—Besides, it is evident, that the reason here assigned was not the true one, why the framers of this constitution omitted a bill of rights; if it had been, they would not have made certain reservations, while they totally omitted others of more importance. We find they have, in the 9th section of the 1st article, declared, that the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless in cases of rebellion—that no bill of attainder, or expost facto law, shall be passed—that no title of nobility shall be granted by the United States, &c. If every thing which is not given is reserved, what propriety is there in these exceptions?[22] Does this constitution any where grant the power of suspending the habeas corpus, to make expost facto laws, pass bills of attainder, or grant titles of nobility? It certainly does not in express terms. The only answer that can be given is, that these are implied in the general powers granted. With equal truth it may be said, that all the powers, which the bills of right, guard against the abuse of, are contained or implied in the general ones granted by this constitution.

2.9.31 So far it is from being true, that a bill of rights is less necessary in the general constitution than in those of the states, the contrary is evidently the fact.—This system, if it is possible for the people of America to accede to it, will be an original compact; and being the last, will, in the nature of things, vacate every former agreement inconsistent with it. For it being a plan of government received and ratified by the whole people, all other forms, which are in existence at the time of its adoption, must yield to it. This is expressed in positive and unequivocal terms, in the 6th article, "That this constitution and the laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitution, or laws of any state, to the contrary notwithstanding.

"The senators and representatives before-mentioned, and the members of the several state legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States, and of the several states, shall be bound, by oath or affirmation, to support this constitution."

2.9.32 It is therefore not only necessarily implied thereby, but positively expressed, that the different state constitutions are repealed and entirely done away, so far as they are inconsistent with this, with the laws which shall be made in pursuance thereof, or with treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States; of what avail will the constitutions of the respective states be to preserve the rights of its citizens? should they be plead, the answer would be, the constitution of the United States, and the laws made in pursuance thereof, is the supreme law, and all legislatures and judicial officers, whether of the general or state governments, are bound by oath to support it. No priviledge, reserved by the bills of rights, or secured by the state government, can limit the power granted by this, or restrain any laws made in pursuance of it. It stands therefore on its own bottom, and must receive a construction by itself without any reference to any other[23]—And hence it was of the highest importance, that the most precise and express declarations and reservations of rights should have been made.

2.9.33 This will appear the more necessary, when it is considered, that not only the constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof, but all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, are the supreme law of the land, and supersede the constitutions of all the states. The power to make treaties, is vested in the president, by and with the advice and consent of two thirds of the senate. I do not find any limitation, or restriction, to the exercise of this power. The most important article in any constitution may therefore be repealed, even without a legislative act. Ought not a government, vested with such extensive and indefinite authority, to have been restricted by a declaration of rights? It certainly ought.

So clear a point is this, that I cannot help suspecting, that persons who attempt to persuade people, that such reservations were less necessary under this constitution than under those of the states, are wilfully endeavouring to deceive, and to lead you into an absolute state of vassalage.

Brutus.

III

15 November 1787

To the Citizens of the State of New-York.

In the investigation of the constitution, under your consideration, great care should be taken, that you do not form your opinions respecting it, from unimportant provisions, or fallacious appearances. 2.9.34

On a careful examination, you will find, that many of its parts, of little moment, are well formed; in these it has a specious resemblance of a free government—but this is not sufficient to justify the adoption of it—the gilded pill, is often found to contain the most deadly poison.

You are not however to expect, a perfect form of government, any more than to meet with perfection in man; your views therefore, ought to be directed to the main pillars upon which a free government is to rest; if these are well placed, on a foundation that will support the superstructure, you should be satisfied, although the building may want a number of ornaments, which, if your particular tastes were gratified, you would have added to it: on the other hand, if the foundation is insecurely laid, and the main supports are wanting, or not properly fixed, however the fabric may be decorated and adorned, you ought to reject it. 2.9.35

Under these impressions, it has been my object to turn your attention to the principal defects in this system. 2.9.36

I have attempted to shew, that a consolidation of this extensive continent, under one government, for internal, as well as external purposes, which is evidently the tendency of this constitution, cannot succeed, without a sacrifice of your liberties; and therefore that the attempt is not only preposterous, but extremely dangerous; and I have shewn, independent of this, that the plan is radically defective in a fundamental principle, which ought to be found in every free government; to wit, a declaration of rights.

2.9.37 I shall now proceed to take a nearer view of this system, to examine its parts more minutely, and shew that the powers are not properly deposited, for the security of public liberty.

The first important object that presents itself in the organization of this government, is the legislature. This is to be composed of two branches; the first to be called the general assembly, and is to be chosen by the people of the respective states, in proportion to the number of their inhabitants, and is to consist of sixty five members, with powers in the legislature to encrease the number, not to exceed one for every thirty thousand inhabitants. The second branch is to be called the senate, and is to consist of twenty-six members, two of which are to be chosen by the legislatures of each of the states.

2.9.38 In the former of these there is an appearance of justice, in the appointment of its members—but if the clause, which provides for this branch, be stripped of its ambiguity, it will be found that there is really no equality of representation, even in this house.

The words are "representatives and direct taxes, shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included in this union, according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons."—What a strange and unnecessary accumulation of words are here used to conceal from the public eye, what might have been expressed in the following concise manner. Representatives are to be proportioned among the states respectively, according to the number of freemen and slaves inhabiting them, counting five slaves for three free men.

2.9.39 "In a free state," says the celebrated Montesquieu, "every man, who is supposed to be a free agent, ought to be concerned in his own government, therefore the legislature should reside in the whole body of the people, or their representatives."[24] But it has never been alledged that those who are not free agents, can, upon any rational principle, have any thing to do in government, either by themselves or others. If they have no share in government, why is the number of members in the assembly, to be increased on their account? Is it because in some of the states, a considerable part of the property of the inhabitants consists in a number of their fellow men, who are held in bondage, in defiance of every idea of benevolence, justice, and religion, and contrary to all the principles of liberty, which have been publickly avowed in the late glorious revolution? If this be a just ground for representation, the horses in some of the states, and the oxen in others, ought to be represented—for a great share of property in some of them, consists in these animals; and they have as much controul over their own actions, as these poor unhappy creatures, who are intended to be described in the above recited clause, by the words, "all other persons." By this mode of apportionment, the representatives of the different parts of the union, will be extremely unequal; in some of the southern states, the slaves are nearly equal in number to the free men; and for all these slaves, they will be entitled to a proportionate share in the legislature—this will give them an unreasonable weight in the government, which can derive no additional strength, protection, nor defence from the slaves, but the contrary. Why then should they be represented? What adds to the evil is, that these states are to be permitted to continue the inhuman traffic of importing slaves, until the year 1808—and for every cargo of these unhappy people, which unfeeling, unprincipled, barbarous, and avaricious wretches, may tear from their country, friends and tender connections, and bring into those states, they are to be rewarded by having an increase of members in the general assembly.

There[25] appears at the first view a manifest inconsistency, in the apportionment of representatives in the senate, uponnthe plan of a consolidated government.[26] On every principle of equity, and propriety, representation in a government should be in exact proportion to the numbers, or the aids afforded by the persons represented. How unreasonable, and unjust then is it, that Delaware should have a representation in the senate, equal to Massachusetts, or Virginia? The latter of which contains ten times her numbers, and is to contribute to the aid of the general government in that proportion? This article of the constitution will appear the more objectionable, if it is considered, that the powers vested in this branch of the legislature are very extensive, and greatly surpass those lodged in the assembly, not only for general purposes, but, in many instances, for the internal police of the states. The other branch of the legislature, in which, if in either, a f[a]int spark of democracy is to be found, should have been properly organized and established—but upon examination you will find, that this branch does not possess the qualities of a just representation, and that there is no kind of security, imperfect as it is, for its remaining in the hands of the people. 2.9.40

It has been observed, that the happiness of society is the end of government—that every free government is founded in compact; and that, because it is impracticable for the whole community to assemble, or when assembled, to deliberate with wisdom, and decide with dispatch, the mode of legislating by representation was devised.[27] 2.9.41

The very term, representative, implies, that the person or body chosen for this purpose, should resemble those who appoint them—a representation of the people of America, if it be a true one, must be like the people. It ought to be so constituted, that a person, who is a stranger to the country, might be able to form a just idea of their character, by knowing that of their representatives. They are the sign—the people are the thing signified. It is absurd to speak of one thing being the representative of another, upon any other 2.9.42 principle. The ground and reason of representation, in a free government, implies the same thing. Society instituted government to promote the happiness of the whole, and this is the great end always in view in the delegation of powers. It must then have been intended, that those who are placed instead of the people, should possess their sentiments and feelings, and be governed by their interests, or, in other words, should bear the strongest resemblance of those in whose room they are substituted. It is obvious, that for an assembly to be a true likeness of the people of any country, they must be considerably numerous.—One man, or a few men, cannot possibly represent the feelings, opinions, and characters of a great multitude. In this respect, the new constitution is radically defective.—The house of assembly, which is intended as a representation of the people of America, will not, nor cannot, in the nature of things, be a proper one—sixty-five men cannot be found in the United States, who hold the sentiments, possess the feelings, or are acqainted with the wants and interests of this vast country. This extensive continent is made up of a number of different classes of people; and to have a proper representation of them, each class ought to have an opportunity of choosing their best informed men for the purpose; but this cannot possibly be the case in so small a number. The state of New-York, on the present apportionment, will send six members to the assembly: I will venture to affirm, that number cannot be found in the state, who will bear a just resemblance to the several classes of people who compose it. In this assembly, the farmer, merchant, mecanick, and other various orders of people, ought to be represented according to their respective weight and numbers; and the representatives ought to be intimately acquainted with the wants, understand the interests of the several orders in the society, and feel a proper sense and becoming zeal to promote their prosperity. I cannot conceive that any six men in this state can be found properly qualified in these respects to discharge such important duties: but supposing it possible to find them, is there the least degree of probability that the choice of the people will fall upon such men? According to the common course of human affairs, the natural aristocracy of the country will be elected.[28] Wealth always creates influence, and this is generally much increased by large family connections: this class in society will for ever have a great number of dependents; besides, they will always favour each other—it is their interest to combine—they will therefore constantly unite their efforts to procure men of their own rank to be elected—they will concenter all their force in every part of the state into one point, and by acting together, will most generally carry their election. It is probable, that but few of the merchants, and those the most opulent and ambitious, will have a representation from their body—few of them are characters sufficiently conspicuous to attract the notice of the electors of the state in so limited a representation. The great body of the yeomen of the country cannot expect any of their order in this assembly—the station will be too elevated for them to aspire to—the distance between the people and their representatives, will be so very great, that there is no probability that a farmer, however respectable, will be chosen—the mechanicks of every branch, must expect to be excluded from a seat in this Body—It will and must be esteemed a station too high and exalted to be filled by any but the first men in the state, in point of fortune; so that in reality there will be no part of the people represented, but the rich, even in that branch of the legislature, which is called the democratic.—The well born, and highest orders in life, as they term themselves, will be ignorant of the sentiments of the midling class of citizens, strangers to their ability, wants, and difficulties, and void of sympathy, and fellow feeling. This branch of the legislature will not only be an imperfect representation, but there will be no security in so small a body, against bribery, and corruption—It will consist at first, of sixty-five, and can never exceed one for every thirty thousand inhabitants; a majority of these, that is, thirty-three, are a quorum, and a majority of which, or seventeen, may pass any law—so that twenty-five men, will have the power to give away all the property of the citizens of these states—what security therefore can there be for the people, where their liberties and property are at the disposal of so few men? It will literally be a government in the hands of the few to oppress and plunder the many. You may conclude with a great degree of certainty, that it, like all others of a similar nature, will be managed by influence and corruption, and that the period is not far distant, when this will be the case, if it should be adopted; for even now there are some among us, whose characters stand high in the public estimation, and who have had a principal agency in framing this constitution, who do not scruple to say, that this is the only practicable mode of governing a people, who think with that degree of freedom which the Americans do[29]—this government will have in their gift a vast number of offices of great honor and emolument. The members of the legislature are not excluded from appointments; and twenty-five of them, as the case may be, being secured, any measure may be carried.

The rulers of this country must be composed of very different materials 2.9.43 from those of any other, of which history gives us any account, if the majority of the legislature are not, before many years, entirely at the devotion of the executive—and these states will soon be under the absolute domination of one, or a few, with the fallacious appearance of being governed by men of their own election.

The more I reflect on this subject, the more firmly am I persuaded, that 2.9.44 the representation is merely nominal—a mere burlesque; and that no security is provided against corruption and undue influence. No free people on earth, who have elected persons to legislate for them, ever reposed that confidence in so small a number. The British house of commons consists of five hundred and fifty-eight members; the number of inhabitants in Great-Britain, is computed at eight millions—this gives one member for a little more than fourteen thousand, which exceeds double the proportion this country can ever have: and yet we require a larger representation in proportion to our numbers, than Great-Britain, because this country is much more extensive, and differs more in its productions, interests, manners, and habits. The democratic branch of the legislatures of the several states in the union consists, I believe at present, of near two thousand; and this number was not thought too large for the security of liberty by the framers of our state constitutions: some of the states may have erred in this respect, but the difference between two thousand, and sixty-five, is so very great, that it will bear no comparison.

Other objections offer themselves against this part of the constitution—I shall reserve them for a future paper,[30] when I shall shew, defective as this representation is, no security is provided, that even this shadow of the right, will remain with the people.

Brutus.

IV

29 November 1787

To the People of the State of New-York.

2.9.45 There can be no free government where the people are not possessed of the power of making the laws by which they are governed, either in their own persons, or by others substituted in their stead.

Experience has taught mankind, that legislation by representatives is the most eligible, and the only practicable mode in which the people of any country can exercise this right, either prudently or beneficially. But then, it is a matter of the highest importance, in forming this representation, that it be so constituted as to be capable of understanding the true interests of the society for which it acts, and so disposed as to pursue the good and happiness of the people as its ultimate end. The object of every free government is the public good, and all lesser interests yield to it. That of every tyrannical government, is the happiness and aggrandisement of one, or a few, and to this the public felicity, and every other interest must submit.[31]—The reason of this difference in these governments is obvious. The first is so constituted as to collect the views and wishes of the whole people in that of their rulers, while the latter is so framed as to separate the interests of the governors from that of the governed. The principle of self love, therefore, that will influence the one to promote the good of the whole, will prompt the other to follow its own private advantage. The great art, therefore, in forming a good constitution, appears to be this, so to frame it, as that those to whom the power is committed shall be subject to the same feelings, and aim at the same objects as the people do, who transfer to them their authority. There is no possible way to effect this but by an equal, full and fair representation; this, therefore, is the great desideratum in politics. However fair an appearance any government may make, though it may possess a thousand plausible articles and be decorated with ever so many ornaments, yet if it is deficient in this essential principle of a full and just representation of the people, it will be only like a painted sepulcher—For, without this it cannot be a free government; let the administration of it be good or ill, it still will be a government, not according to the will of the people, but according to the will of a few.

2.9.46 To test this new constitution then, by this principle, is of the last importance—It is to bring it to the touch-stone of national liberty, and I hope I shall be excused, if, in this paper, I pursue the subject commenced in my last number, to wit, the necessity of an equal and full representation in the legislature.—In that, I showed that it was not equal, because the smallest states are to send the same number of members to the senate as the largest, and, because the slaves, who afford neither aid or defence to the government, are to encrease the proportion of members. To prove that it was not a just or adequate representation, it was urged, that so small a number could not resemble the people, or possess their sentiments and dispositions. That the choice of members would commonly fall upon the rich and great, while the middling class of the community would be excluded. That in so small a representation there was no security against bribery and corruption.

2.9.47 The small number which is to compose this legislature, will not only expose it to the danger of that kind of corruption, and undue influence, which will arise from the gift of places of honor and emolument, or the more direct one of bribery, but it will also subject it to another kind of influence no less fatal to the liberties of the people, though it be not so flagrantly repugnant to the principles of rectitude. It is not to be expected that a legislature will be found in any country that will not have some of its members, who will pursue their private ends, and for which they will sacrifice the public good. Men of this character are, generally, artful and designing, and frequently possess brilliant talents and abilities; they commonly act in concert, and agree to share the spoils of their country among them; they will keep their object ever in view, and follow it with constancy. To effect their purpose, they will assume any shape, and, Proteus like, mould themselves into any form—where they find members proof against direct bribery or gifts of offices, they will endeavor to mislead their minds by specious and false reasoning, to impose upon their unsuspecting honesty by an affectation of zeal for the public good; they will form juntos, and hold out-door meetings; they will operate upon the good nature of their opponents, by a thousand little attentions, and teize them into compliance by the earnestness of solicitation. Those who are acquainted with the manner of conducting business in public assemblies, know how prevalent art and address are in carrying a measure, even over men of the best intentions, and of good understanding. The firmest security against this kind of improper and dangerous influence, as well as all other, is a strong and numerous representation: in such a house of assembly, so great a number must be gained over, before the private views of individuals could be gratified that there could be scarce a hope of success. But in the foederal assembly, seventeen men are all that is necessary to pass a law. It is probable, it will seldom happen that more than twenty-five will be requisite to form a majority, when it is considered what a number of places of honor and emolument will be in the gift of the executive, the powerful influence that great and designing men have over the honest and unsuspecting, by their art and address, their soothing manners and civilities, and their cringing flattery, joined with their affected patriotism; when these different species of influence are combined, it is scarcely to be hoped that a legislature, composed of so small a number, as the one proposed by the new constitution, will long resist their force.

2.9.48 A[32] farther objection against the feebleness of the representation is, that it will not possess the confidence of the people. The execution of the laws in a free government must rest on this confidence, and this must be founded on the good opinion they entertain of the framers of the laws. Every government must be supported, either by the people having such an attachment to it, as to be ready, when called upon, to support it, or by a force at the command of the government, to compel obedience. The latter mode destroys every idea of a free government; for the same force that may be employed to compel obedience to good laws, might, and probably would be used to wrest from the people their constitutional liberties.—Whether it is practicable to have a representation for the whole union sufficiently numerous to obtain that confidence which is necessary for the purpose of internal taxation, and other powers to which this proposed government extends, is an important question. I am clearly of opinion, it is not, and therefore I have stated this in my first number, as one of the reasons against going into an entire consolidation[33] of the states—one of the most capital errors in the system, is that of extending the powers of the foederal government to objects to which it is not adequate, which it cannot exercise without endangering public liberty, and which it is not necessary they should possess, in order to preserve the union and manage our national concerns; of this, however, I shall treat more fully in some future paper[34]—But, however this may be, certain it is, that the representation in the legislature is not so formed as to give reasonable ground for public trust.

2.9.49 In order for the people safely to repose themselves on their rulers, they should not only be of their own choice. But it is requisite they should be acquainted with their abilities to manage the public concerns with wisdom. They should be satisfied that those who represent them are men of integrity, who will pursue the good of the community with fidelity; and will not be turned aside from their duty by private interest, or corrupted by undue influence; and that they will have such a zeal for the good of those whom they represent, as to excite them to be diligent in their service; but it is impossible the people of the United States should have sufficient knowledge of their representatives, when the numbers are so few, to acquire any rational satisfaction on either of these points. The people of this state will have very little acquaintance with those who may be chosen to represent them; a great part of them will, probably, not know the characters of their own members, much less that of a majority of those who will compose the foederal assembly; they will consist of men, whose names they have never heard, and whose talents and regard for the public good, they are total strangers to;[35] and they will have no persons so immediately of their choice so near them, of their neighbours and of their own rank in life, that they can feel themselves secure in trusting their interests in their hands. The representatives of the people cannot, as they now do, after they have passed laws, mix with the people, and explain to them the motives which induced the adoption of any measure, point out its utility, and remove objections or silence unreasonable clamours against it.—The number will be so small that but a very few of the most sensible and respectable yeomanry of the country can ever have any knowledge of them: being so far removed from the people, their station will be elevated and important, and they will be considered as ambitious and designing. They will not be viewed by the people as part of themselves, but as a body distinct from them, and having separate interests to pursue; the consequence will be, that a perpetual jealousy will exist in the minds of the people against them; their conduct will be narrowly watched; their measures scrutinized; and their laws opposed, evaded, or reluctantly obeyed. This is natural, and exactly corresponds with the conduct of individuals towards those in whose hands they intrust important concerns. If the person confided in, be a neighbour with whom his employer is intimately acquainted, whose talents, he knows, are sufficient to manage the business with which he is charged, his honesty and fidelity unsuspected, and his friendship and zeal for the service of this principal unquestionable, he will commit his affairs into his hands with unreserved confidence, and feel himself secure; all the transactions of the agent will meet with the most favorable construction, and the measures he takes will give satisfaction. But, if the person employed be a stranger, whom he has never seen, and whose character for ability or fidelity he cannot fully learn—If he is constrained to choose him, because it was not in his power to procure one more agreeable to his wishes, he will trust him with caution, and be suspicious of all his conduct.

If then this government should not derive support from the good will of 2.9.50 the people, it must be executed by force, or not executed at all; either case would lead to the total destruction of liberty.—The convention seemed aware of this, and have therefore provided for calling out the militia to execute the laws of the union. If this system was so framed as to command that respect from the people, which every good free government will obtain, this provision was unnecessary—the people would support the civil magistrate.[36] This power is a novel one, in free governments—these have depended for the execution of the laws on the Posse Comitatus, and never raised an idea, that the people would refuse to aid the civil magistrate in executing those laws they themselves had made. I shall now dismiss the subject of the incompetency of the representation, and proceed, as I promised, to shew, that, impotent as it is, the people have no security that they will enjoy the exercise of the right of electing this assembly, which, at best, can be considered but as the shadow of representation.

2.9.51 By section 4, article I, the Congress are authorized, at any time, by law, to make, or alter, regulations respecting the time, place, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives, except as to the places of choosing senators. By this clause the right of election itself, is, in a great measure, transferred from the people to their rulers.—One would think, that if any thing was necessary to be made a fundamental article of the original compact, it would be, that of fixing the branches of the legislature, so as to put it out of its power to alter itself by modifying the election of its own members at will and pleasure. When a people once resign the privilege of a fair election, they clearly have none left worth contending for.

2.9.52 It is clear that, under this article, the foederal legislature may institute such rules respecting elections as to lead to the choice of one description of men. The weakness of the representation, tends but too certainly to confer on the rich and well-born, all honours; but the power granted in this article, may be so exercised, as to secure it almost beyond a possibility of controul. The proposed Congress may make the whole state one district, and direct, that the capital (the city of New-York, for instance) shall be the place for holding the election; the consequence would be, that none but men of the most elevated rank in society would attend, and they would as certainly choose men of their own class; as it is true what the Apostle Paul saith, that "no man ever yet hated his own flesh, but nourisheth and cherisheth it."[37]—They may declare that those members who have the greatest number of votes, shall be considered as duly elected; the consequence would be that the people, who are dispersed in the interior parts of the state, would give their votes for a variety of candidates, while any order, or profession, residing in populous places, by uniting their interests, might procure whom they pleased to be chosen—and by this means the representatives of the state may be elected by one tenth part of the people who actually vote. This may be effected constitutionally, and by one of those silent operations which frequently takes place without being noticed, but which often produces such changes as entirely to alter a government, subvert a free constitution, and rivet the chains on a free people before they perceive they are forged. Had the power of regulating elections been left under the direction of the state legislatures, where the people are not only nominally but substantially represented, it would have been secure; but if it was taken out of their hands, it surely ought to have been fixed on such a basis as to have put it out of the power of the foederal legislature to deprive the people of it by law. Provision should have been made for marking out the states into districts, and for choosing, by a majority of votes, a person out of each of them of permanent property and residence in the district which he was to represent.

2.9.53 If the people of America will submit to a constitution that will vest in the hands of any body of men a right to deprive them by law of the privilege of a fair election, they will submit to almost any thing. Reasoning with them will be in vain, they must be left until they are brought to reflection by feeling oppression—they will then have to wrest from their oppressors, by a strong hand, that which they now possess, and which they may retain if they will exercise but a moderate share of prudence and firmness.

2.9.54 I know it is said that the dangers apprehended from this clause are merely imaginary, that the proposed general legislature will be disposed to regulate elections upon proper principles, and to use their power with discretion, and to promote the public good. On this, I would observe, that constitutions are not so necessary to regulate the conduct of good rulers as to restrain that of bad ones.—Wise and good men will exercise power so as to promote the public happiness under any form of government. If we are to take it for granted, that those who administer the government under this system, will always pay proper attention to the rights and interests of the people, nothing more was necessary than to say who should be invested with the powers of government, and leave them to exercise it at will and pleasure. Men are apt to be deceived both with respect to their own dispositions and those of others. Though this truth is proved by almost every page of the history of nations, to wit, that power, lodged in the hands of rulers to be used at discretion, is almost always exercised to the oppression of the people, and the aggrandizement of themselves; yet most men think if it was lodged in their hands they would not employ it in this manner.—Thus when the prophet Elisha told Hazael, "I know the evil that thou wilt do unto the children of Israel; their strong holds wilt thou set on fire, and their young men, wilt thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash their children, and rip up their women with child." Hazael had no idea that he ever should be guilty of such horrid cruelty, and said to the prophet, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this great thing." Elisha answered, "The Lord hath shewed me that thou shalt be king of Syria."[38] The event proved, that Hazael only wanted an opportunity to perpetrate these enormities without restraint, and he had a disposition to do them, though he himself knew it not.

Brutus.

V
13 December 1787

To the People of the State of New-York.

2.9.55 It was intended in this Number to have prosecuted the enquiry into the organization of this new system; particularly to have considered the dangerous and premature union of the President and Senate, and the mixture of legislative, executive, and judicial powers in the Senate.

But there is such an intimate connection between the several branches in whom the different species of authority is lodged, and the powers with which they are invested, that on reflection it seems necessary first to proceed to examine the nature and extent of the powers granted to the legislature.

2.9.56 This enquiry will assist us the better to determine, whether the legislature is so constituted, as to provide proper checks and restrictions for the security of our rights, and to guard against the abuse of power—For the means should be suited to the end; a government should be framed with a view to the objects to which it extends: if these be few in number, and of such a nature as to give but small occasion or opportunity to work oppression in the exercise of authority, there will be less need of a numerous representation, and special guards against abuse, than if the powers of the government are very extensive, and include a great variety of cases.[39] It will also be found necessary to examine the extent of these powers, in order to form a just opinion how far this system can be considered as a confederation, or a consolidation of the states. Many of the advocates for, and most of the opponents to this system, agree that the form of government most suitable for the United States, is that of a confederation.[40] The idea of a confederated government is that of a number of independent states entering into a compact, for the conducting certain general concerns, in which they have a common interest, leaving the management of their internal and local affairs to their separate governments. But whether the system proposed is of this nature cannot be determined without a strict enquiry into the powers proposed to be granted.

2.9.57 This constitution considers the people of the several states as one body corporate, and is intended as an original compact, it will therefore dissolve all contracts which may be inconsistent with it. This not only results from its nature, but is expressly declared in the 6th article of it. The design of the constitution is expressed in the preamble, to be, "in order to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity." These are the ends this government is to accomplish, and for which it is invested with certain powers, among these is the power "to make all laws which are necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." It is a rule in construing a law to consider the objects the legislature had in view in passing it, and to give it such an explanation as to promote their intention. The same rule will apply in explaining a constitution. The great objects then are declared in this preamble in general and indefinite terms to be to provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and an express power being vested in the legislature to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution all the powers vested in the general government. The inference is natural that the legislature will have an authority to make all laws which they shall judge necessary for the common safety, and to promote the general welfare. This amounts to a power to make laws at discretion: No terms can be found more indefinite than these, and it is obvious, that the legislature alone must judge what laws are proper and necessary for the purpose. It may be said, that this way of explaining the constitution, is torturing and making it speak what it never intended. This is far from my intention, and I shall not even insist upon this implied power, but join issue with those who say we are to collect the idea of the powers given from the express words of the clauses granting them; and it will not be difficult to shew that the same authority is expressly given which is supposed to be implied in the forgoing paragraphs.

In the 1st article, 8th section, it is declared, "that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence, and general welfare of the United States." In the preamble, the intent of the constitution, among other things, is declared to be to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare, and in this clause the power is in express words given to Congress "to provide for the common defence, and general welfare."—And in the last paragraph of the same section there is an express authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution this power. It is therefore evident, that the legislature under this constitution may pass any law which they may think proper. It is true the 9th section restrains their power with respect to certain objects. But these restrictions are very limited, some of them improper, some unimportant, and others not easily understood, as I shall hereafter shew. It has been urged that the meaning I give to this part of the constitution is not the true one, that the intent of it is to confer on the legislature the power to lay and collect taxes, etc. in order to provide for the common defence and general welfare.[41] To this I would reply, that the meaning and intent of the constitution is to be collected from the words of it, and I submit to the public, whether the construction I have given it is not the most natural and easy. But admitting the contrary opinion to prevail, I shall nevertheless, be able to shew, that the same powers are substantially vested in the general government, by several other articles in the constitution. It invests the legislature with authority to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, in order to provide for the common defence, and promote the general welfare, and to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying this power into effect. To comprehend the extent of this authority, it will be requisite to examine 1st. what is included in this power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises.

2.9.58

2d. What is implied in the authority, to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying this power into execution.

3d. What limitation, if any, is set to the exercise of this power by the constitution.

2.9.59 1st. To detail the particulars comprehended in the general terms, taxes, duties, imposts and excises, would require a volume, instead of a single piece in a news-paper. Indeed it would be a task far beyond my ability, and to which no one can be competent, unless possessed of a mind capable of comprehending every possible source of revenue; for they extend to every possible way of raising money, whether by direct or indirect taxation. Under this clause may be imposed a poll-tax, a land-tax, a tax on houses and buildings, on windows and fire places, on cattle and on all kinds of personal property:—It extends to duties on all kinds of goods to any amount, to tonnage and poundage on vessels, to duties on written instruments, newspapers, almanacks, and books:—It comprehends an excise on all kinds of liquors, spirits, wines, cyder, beer, etc. and indeed takes in duty or excise on every necessary or conveniency of life; whether of foreign or home growth or manufactory. In short, we can have no conception of any way in which a government can raise money from the people, but what is included in one or other of three general terms. We may say then that this clause commits to the hands of the general legislature every conceivable source of revenue within the United States. Not only are these terms very comprehensive, and extend to a vast number of objects, but the power to lay and collect has great latitude; it will lead to the passing a vast number of laws, which may affect the personal rights of the citizens of the states, expose their property to fines and confiscation, and put their lives in jeopardy: it opens a door to the appointment of a swarm of revenue and excise officers to pray [sic] upon the honest and industrious part of the community, eat up their substance, and riot on the spoils of the country.

2.9.60 2d. We will next enquire into what is implied in the authority to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper to carry this power into execution.

It is, perhaps, utterly impossible fully to define this power. The authority granted in the first clause can only be understood in its full extent, by descending to all the particular cases in which a revenue can be raised; the number and variety of these cases are so endless, and as it were infinite, that no man living has, as yet, been able to reckon them up. The greatest geniuses in the world have been for ages employed in the research, and when mankind had supposed that the subject was exhausted they have been astonished with the refined improvements that have been made in modern times, and especially in the English nation on the subject—If then the objects of this power cannot be comprehended, how is it possible to understand the extent of that power which can pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying it into execution? It is truly incomprehensible. A case cannot be conceived of, which is not included in this power. It is well known that the subject of revenue is the most difficult and extensive in the science of government. It requires the greatest talents of a statesman, and the most numerous and exact provisions of the legislature. The command of the revenues of a state gives the command of every thing in it.—He that has the purse will have the sword, and they that have both, have every thing; so that the legislature having every source from which money can be drawn under their direction, with a right to make all laws necessary and proper for drawing forth all the resource of the country, would have, in fact, all power.[42]

2.9.61 Were I to enter into the detail, it would be easy to shew how this power in its operation, would totally destroy all the powers of the individual states.[43] But this is not necessary for those who will think for themselves, and it will be useless to such as take things upon trust, nothing will awaken them to reflection, until the iron hand of oppression compel them to it.

2.9.62 I shall only remark, that this power, given to the federal legislature, directly annihilates all the powers of the state legislatures.[44] There cannot be a greater solecism in politics than to talk of power in a government, without the command of any revenue. It is as absurd as to talk of an animal without blood, or the subsistence of one without food.[45] Now the general government having in their controul every possible source of revenue, and authority to pass any law they may deem necessary to draw them forth, or to facilitate their collection; no source of revenue is therefore left in the hands of any state. Should any state attempt to raise money by law, the general government may repeal or arrest it in the execution, for all their laws will be the supreme law of the land: If then any one can be weak enough to believe that a government can exist without having the authority to raise money to pay a door-keeper to their assembly, he may believe that the state government can exist, should this new constitution take place.[46]

2.9.63 It is agreed by most of the advocates of this new system, that the government which is proper for the United States should be a confederated one: that the respective states ought to retain a portion of their sovereignty, and that they should preserve not only the forms of their legislatures, but also the power to conduct certain internal concerns. How far the powers to be retained by the states shall extend, is the question; we need not spend much time on this subject, as it respects this constitution, for a government without the power to raise money is one only in name. It is clear that the legislatures of the respective states must be altogether dependent on the will of the general legislature, for the means of supporting their government. The legislature of the United States will have a right to exhaust every source of revenue in every state, and to annul all laws of the states which may stand in the way of effecting it; unless therefore we can suppose the state governments can exist without money to support the officers who execute them, we must conclude they will exist no longer than the general legislature choose they should. Indeed the idea of any government existing, in any respect, as an independent one, without any means of support in their own hands, is an absurdity. If therefore, this constitution has in view, what many of its framers and advocates say it has, to secure and guarantee to the separate states the exercise of certain powers of government[,] it certainly ought to have left in their hands some sources of revenue. It should have marked the line in which the general government should have raised money, and set bounds over which they should not pass, leaving to the separate states other means to raise supplies for the support of their governments, and to discharge their respective debts. To this it is objected, that the general government ought to have power competent to the purposes of the union; they are to provide for the common defence, to pay the debts of the United States, support foreign ministers, and the civil establishment of the union, and to do these they ought to have authority to raise money adequate to the purpose. On this I observe, that the state governments have also contracted debts, they require money to support their civil officers, and how this is to be done, if they give to the general government a power to raise money in every way in which it can possibly be raised, with such a controul over the state legislatures as to prohibit them, whenever the general legislature may think proper, from raising any money.[47] It is again objected that it is very difficult, if not impossible, to draw the line of distinction between the powers of the general and state governments on this subject. The first, it is said, must have the power of raising the money necessary for the purposes of the union, if they are limited to certain objects the revenue may fall short of a sufficiency for the public exigencies, they must therefore have discretionary power. The line may be easily and accurately drawn between the powers of the two governments on this head. The distinction between external and internal taxes, is not a novel one in this country, it is a plain one, and easily understood. The first includes impost duties on all imported goods; this species of taxes it is proper should be laid by the general government; many reasons might be urged to shew that no danger is to be apprehended from their exercise of it. They may be collected in few places, and from few hands with certainty and expedition. But few officers are necessary to be imployed in collecting them, and there is no danger of oppression in laying them, because, if they are laid higher than trade will bear, the merchants will cease importing, or smuggle their goods. We have therefore sufficient security, arising from the nature of the thing, against burdensome and intolerable impositions from this kind of tax.[48] But the case is far otherwise with regard to direct taxes; these include poll taxes, land taxes, excises, duties on written instruments, on every thing we eat, drink, or wear; they take hold of every species of property, and come home to every man's house and packet. These are often so oppressive, as to grind the face of the poor, and render the lives of the common people a burden to them. The great and only security the people can have against oppression from this kind of taxes, must rest in their representatives. If they are sufficiently numerous to be well informed of the circumstances, and ability of those who send them, and have a proper regard for the people, they will be secure. The general legislature, as I have shewn in a former paper, will not be thus qualified, and therefore, on this account, ought not to exercise the power of direct taxation. If the power of laying imposts will not be sufficient, some other specific mode of raising a revenue should have been assigned the general government; many may be suggested in which their power may be accurately defined and limited, and it would be much better to give them authority to lay and collect a duty on exports, not to exceed a certain rate per cent, than to have surrendered every kind of resource that the country has, to the complete abolition of the state governments, and which will introduce such an infinite number of laws and ordinances, fines and penalties, courts, and judges, collectors, and excisemen, that when a man can number them, he may enumerate the stars of Heaven.

I shall resume this subject in my next, and by an induction of particulars shew, that this power, in its exercise, will subvert all state authority, and will work to the oppression of the people, and that there are no restrictions in the constitution that will soften its rigour, but rather the contrary.

Brutus.

VI

27 December 1787

It is an important question, whether the general government of the United States should be so framed, as to absorb and swallow up the state governments? or whether, on the contrary, the former ought not to be confined to certain defined national objects, while the latter should retain all the powers which concern the internal police of the states? 2.9.64

I have, in my former papers, offered a variety of arguments to prove, that a simple free government could not be exercised over this whole continent, and that therefore we must either give up our liberties and submit to an arbitrary one, or frame a constitution on the plan of confederation. Further 2.9.65 reasons might be urged to prove this point—but it seems unnecessary, because the principal advocates of the new constitution admit of the position. The question therefore between us, this being admitted, is, whether or not this system is so formed as either directly to annihilate the state governments, or that in its operation it will certainly effect it. If this is answered in the affirmative, then the system ought not to be adopted, without such amendments as will avoid this consequence. If on the contrary it can be shewn, that the state governments are secured in their rights to manage the internal police of the respective states, we must confine ourselves in our enquiries to the organization of the government and the guards and provisions it contains to prevent a misuse or abuse of power.[49] To determine this question, it is requisite, that we fully investigate the nature, and the extent of the powers intended to be granted by this constitution to the rulers.

2.9.66 In my last number I called your attention to this subject, and proved, as I think, uncontrovertibly, that the powers given the legislature under the 8th section of the 1st article, had no other limitation than the discretion of the Congress. It was shewn, that even if the most favorable construction was given to this paragraph, that the advocates for the new constitution could wish, it will convey a power to lay and collect taxes, imposts, duties, and excises, according to the discretion of the legislature, and to make all laws which they shall judge proper and necessary to carry this power into execution. This I shewed would totally destroy all the power of the state governments. To confirm this, it is worth while to trace the operation of the government in some particular instances.

2.9.67 The general government is to be vested with authority to levy and collect taxes, duties, and excises; the separate states have also power to impose taxes, duties, and excises, except that they cannot lay duties on exports and imports without the consent of Congress. Here then the two governments have concurrent jurisdiction; both may lay impositions of this kind. But then the general government have supperadded to this power, authority to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying the foregoing power into execution. Suppose then that both governments should lay taxes, duties, and excises, and it should fall so heavy on the people that they would be unable, or be so burdensome that they would refuse to pay them both—would it not be necessary that the general legislature should suspend the collection of the state tax? It certainly would. For, if the people could not, or would not pay both, they must be discharged from the tax to the state, or the tax to the general government could not be collected.—The conclusion therefore is inevitable, that the respective state governments will not have the power to raise one shilling in any way, but by the permission of the Congress. I presume no one will pretend, that the states can exercise legislative authority, or administer justice among their citizens for any length of time, without being able to raise a sufficiency to pay those who administer their governments.

If this be true, and if the states can raise money only by permission of the general government, it follows that the state governments will be dependent on the will of the general government for their existence. 2.9.68

What will render this power in Congress effectual and sure in its operation is, that the government will have complete judicial and executive authority to carry all their laws into effect, which will be paramount to the judicial and executive authority of the individual states: in vain therefore will be all interference of the legislatures, courts, or magistrates of any of the states on the subject; for they will be subordinate to the general government, and engaged by oath to support it, and will be constitutionally bound to submit to their decisions.[50]

The general legislature will be empowered to lay any tax they chuse, to annex any penalties they please to the breach of their revenue laws; and to appoint as many officers as they may think proper to collect the taxes. They will have authority to farm the revenues and to vest the farmer general, with his subalterns, with plenary powers to collect them, in any way which to them may appear eligible. And the courts of law, which they will be authorized to institute, will have cognizance of every case arising under the revenue laws, the conduct of all the officers employed in collecting them; and the officers of these courts will execute their judgments. There is no way, therefore, of avoiding the destruction of the state governments, whenever the Congress please to do it, unless the people rise up, and, with a strong hand, resist and prevent the execution of constitutional laws.[51] The fear of this, will, it is presumed, restrain the general government, for some time, within proper bounds; but it will not be many years before they will have a revenue, and force, at their command, which will place them above any apprehensions on that score. 2.9.69

How far the power to lay and collect duties and excises, may operate to dissolve the state governments, and oppress the people, it is impossible to say. It would assist us much in forming a just opinion on this head, to consider the various objects to which this kind of taxes extend, in European nations, and the infinity of laws they have passed respecting them. Perhaps, if leisure will permit, this may be essayed in some future paper.[52] 2.9.70

It was observed in my last number, that the power to lay and collect duties and excises, would invest the Congress with authority to impose a duty and excise on every necessary and convenience of life. As the principal object of the government, in laying a duty or excise, will be, to raise money, it is obvious, that they will fix on such articles as are of the most general use and consumption; because, unless great quantities of the article, on which the duty is laid, is used, the revenue cannot be considerable. We may therefore presume, that the articles which will be the object of this species of taxes will be either the real necessaries of life; or if not these, such as from custom and habit are esteemed so. I will single out a few of the productions of our own country, which may, and probably will, be of the number. 2.9.71

2.9.72 Cider is an article that most probably will be one of those on which an excise will be laid, because it is one, which this country produces in great abundance, which is in very general use, is consumed in great quantities, and which may be said too not to be a real necessary of life. An excise on this would raise a large sum of money in the United States. How would the power, to lay and collect an excise on cider, and to pass all laws proper and necessary to carry it into execution, operate in its exercise? It might be necessary, in order to collect the excise on cider, to grant to one man, in each county, an exclusive right of building and keeping cider-mills, and oblige him to give bonds and security for payment of the excise; or, if this was not done, it might be necessary to license the mills, which are to make this liquor, and to take from them security, to account for the excise; or, if otherwise, a great number of officers must be employed, to take account of the cider made, and to collect the duties on it.

2.9.73 Porter, ale, and all kinds of malt-liquors, are articles that would probably be subject also to an excise. It would be necessary, in order to collect such an excise, to regulate the manufactory of these, that the quantity made might be ascertained or otherwise security could not be had for the payment of the excise. Every brewery must then be licensed, and officers appointed, to take account of its product, and to secure the payment of the duty, or excise, before it is sold. Many other articles might be named, which would be objects of this species of taxation, but I refrain from enumerating them. It will probably be said, by those who advocate this system, that the observations already made on this head, are calculated only to inflame the minds of the people, with the apprehension of dangers merely imaginary. That there is not the least reason to apprehend, the general legislature will exercise their power in this manner. To this I would only say, that these kinds of taxes exist in Great Britain, and are severely felt. The excise on cider and perry, was imposed in that nation a few years ago, and it is in the memory of every one, who read the history of the transaction, what great tumults it occasioned.

2.9.74 This power, exercised without limitation, will introduce itself into every corner of the city, and country—It will wait upon the ladies at their toilett, and will not leave them in any of their domestic concerns; it will accompany them to the ball, the play, and the assembly; it will go with them when they visit, and will, on all occasions, sit beside them in their carriages, nor will it desert them even at church; it will enter the house of every gentleman, watch over his cellar, wait upon his cook in the kitchen, follow the servants into the parlour, preside over the table, and note down all he eats or drinks; it will attend him to his bed-chamber, and watch him while he sleeps; it will take cognizance of the professional man in his office, or his study; it will watch the merchant in the counting-house, or in his store; it will follow the mechanic to his shop, and in his work, and will haunt him in his family, and in his bed; it will be a constant companion of the industrious farmer in all his labour, it will be with him in the house, and in the field, observe the toil of his hands, and the sweat of his brow; it will penetrate into the most obscure cottage; and finally, it will light upon the head of every person in the United States. To all these different classes of people, and in all these circumstances, in which it will attend them, the language in which it will address them, will be GIVE! GIVE!

A power that has such latitude, which reaches every person in the community in every conceivable circumstance, and lays hold of every species of property they possess, and which has no bounds set to it, but the discretion of those who exercise it[,] I say, such a power must necessarily, from its very nature, swallow up all the power of the state governments. 2.9.75

I shall add but one other observation on this head, which is this—It appears to me a solecism, for two men, or bodies of men, to have unlimited power respecting the same object. It contradicts the scripture maxim, which saith, "no man can serve two masters,"[53] the one power or the other must prevail, or else they will destroy each other, and neither of them effect their purpose. It may be compared to two mechanic powers, acting upon the same body in opposite directions, the consequence would be, if the powers were equal, the body would remain in a state of rest, or if the force of the one was superior to that of the other, the stronger would prevail, and overcome the resistance of the weaker. 2.9.76

But it is said, by some of the advocates of this system, "That the idea that Congress can levy taxes at pleasure, is false, and the suggestion wholly unsupported: that the preamble to the constitution is declaratory of the purposes of the union, and the assumption of any power not necessary to establish justice, &c. to provide for the common defence, &c. will be unconstitutional. Besides, in the very clause which gives the power of levying duties and taxes, the purposes to which the money shall be appropriated, are specified, viz. to pay the debts, and provide for the common defence and general welfare."* I would ask those, who reason thus, to define what ideas are included under the terms, to provide for the common defence and general welfare? Are these terms definite, and will they be understood in the same manner, and to apply to the same cases by every one? No one will pretend they will. It will then be matter of opinion, what tends to the general welfare; and the Congress will be the only judges in the matter. To provide for the general welfare, is an abstract proposition, which mankind differ in the explanation of, as much as they do on any political or moral proposition that can be proposed; the most opposite measures may be pursued by different parties, and both may profess, that they have in view the general welfare; and both sides may be honest in their professions, or both may have sinister views. Those who advocate this new constitution declare, they 2.9.77

*Vide an examination into the leading principles of the federal constitution, printed in Philadelphia, Page 34.[54]

are influenced by a regard to the general welfare; those who oppose it, declare they are moved by the same principle; and I have no doubt but a number on both sides are honest in their professions; and yet nothing is more certain than this, that to adopt this constitution, and not to adopt it, cannot both of them be promotive of the general welfare.

2.9.78 It is as absurd to say, that the power of Congress is limited by these general expressions, "to provide for the common safety, and general welfare," as it would be to say, that it would be limited, had the constitution said they should have power to lay taxes, &c. at will and pleasure. Were this authority given, it might be said, that under it the legislature could not do injustice, or pursue any measures, but such as were calculated to promote the public good, and happiness. For every man, rulers as well as others, are bound by the immutable laws of God and reason, always to will what is right. It is certainly right and fit, that the governors of every people should provide for the common defence and general welfare; every government, therefore, in the world, even the greatest despot, is limited in the exercise of his power. But however just this reasoning may be, it would be found, in practice, a most pitiful restriction. The government would always say, their measures were designed and calculated to promote the public good; and there being no judge between them and the people, the rulers themselves must, and would always, judge for themselves.

2.9.79 There are others of the favourers of this system, who admit, that the power of the Congress under it, with respect to revenue, will exist without limitation, and contend, that so it ought to be.

It is said, "The power to raise armies, to build and equip fleets, and to provide for their support, ought to exist without limitation, because it is impossible to foresee, or to define, the extent and variety of national exigencies, or the correspondent extent and variety of the means which may be necessary to satisfy them.["]

This, it is said, "is one of those truths which, to correct and unprejudiced minds, carries its own evidence along with it. It rests upon axioms as simple as they are universal: the means ought to be proportioned to the end; the person, from whose agency the attainment of any end is expected, ought to possess the means by which it is to be attained."*

2.9.80 This same writer insinuates, that the opponents to the plan promulgated by the convention, manifests a want of candor, in objecting to the extent of the powers proposed to be vested in this government; because he asserts, with an air of confidence, that the powers ought to be unlimited as to the object to which they extend; and that this position, if not self-evident, is at least clearly demonstrated by the foregoing mode of reasoning. But with submission to this author's better judgment, I humbly conceive his reasoning will appear, upon examination, more specious than solid. The means, says the gentleman, ought to be proportioned to the end: admit the proposition to be true it is then necessary to enquire, what is the end of the government of the United States, in order to draw any just conclusions from it. Is this end simply to preserve the general government, and to provide for the common defence and general welfare of the union only? certainly not: for beside this, the state governments are to be supported, and provision made for the managing such of their internal concerns as are allotted to them. It is admitted, "that the circumstances of our country are such, as to demand a compound, instead of a simple, a confederate, instead of a sole government," that the objects of each ought to be pointed out, and that each ought to possess ample authority to execute the powers committed to them.[56] The government then, being complex in its nature, the end it has in view is so also; and it is as necessary, that the state governments should possess the means to attain the ends expected from them, as for the general government. Neither the general government, nor the state governments, ought to be vested with all the powers proper to be exercised for promoting the ends of government. The powers are divided between them—certain ends are to be attained by the one, and other certain ends by the other; and these, taken together, include all the ends of good government. This being the case, the conclusion follows, that each should be furnished with the means, to attain the ends, to which they are designed.

*Vide the Federalist, No. 23.[55]

To apply this reasoning to the case of revenue; the general government is charged with the care of providing for the payment of the debts of the United States; supporting the general government, and providing for the defence of the union. To obtain these ends, they should be furnished with means. But does it thence follow, that they should command all the revenues of the United States! Most certainly it does not. For if so, it will follow, that no means will be left to attain other ends, as necessary to the happiness of the country, as those committed to their care. The individual states have debts to discharge; their legislatures and executives are to be supported, and provision is to be made for the administration of justice in the respective states. For these objects the general government has no authority to provide; nor is it proper it should. It is clear then, that the states should have the command of such revenues, as to answer the ends they have to obtain. To say, "that the circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite,"[57] and from hence to infer, that all the sources of revenue in the states should be yielded to the general government, is not conclusive reasoning: for the Congress are authorized only to controul in general concerns, and not regulate local and internal ones; and these are as essentially requisite to be provided for as those. The peace and happiness of a community is as intimately connected with the prudent direction of their domestic affairs, and the due administration of justice among themselves, as with a competent provision for their defence against foreign invaders, and indeed more so. 2.9.81

2.9.82 Upon the whole, I conceive, that there cannot be a clearer position than this, that the state governments ought to have an uncontroulable power to raise a revenue, adequate to the exigencies of their governments; and, I presume, no such power is left them by this constitution.

Brutus.

VII

3 January 1788

2.9.83 The result of our reasoning in the two preceeding numbers is this, that in a confederated government, where the powers are divided between the general and the state government, it is essential to its existence, that the revenues of the country, without which no government can exist, should be divided between them, and so apportioned to each, as to answer their respective exigencies, as far as human wisdom can effect such a division and apportionment.

2.9.84 It has been shewn, that no such allotment is made in this constitution, but that every source of revenue is under the controul of the Congress; it therefore follows, that if this system is intended to be a complex and not a simple, a confederate and not an entire consolidated government, it contains in it the sure seeds of its own dissolution.—One of two things must happen—Either the new constitution will become a mere nudum pactum, and all the authority of the rulers under it be cried down, as has happened to the present confederation—Or the authority of the individual states will be totally supplanted, and they will retain the mere form without any of the powers of government.—To one or the other of these issues, I think, this new government, if it is adopted, will advance with great celerity.

2.9.85 It is said, I know, that such a separation of the sources of revenue, cannot be made without endangering the public safety—"unless (says a writer) it can be shewn that the circumstances which may affect the public safety are reducible within certain determinate limits; unless the contrary of this position can be fairly and rationally disputed; it must be admitted as a necessary consequence, that there can be no limitation of that authority which is to provide for the defence and protection of the community, &c."*

2.9.86 The pretended demonstration of this writer will instantly vanish, when it is considered, that the protection and defence of the community is not intended to be entrusted solely into the hands of the general government, and by his own confession it ought not to be. It is true this system commits to the general government the protection and defence of the community against foreign force and invasion, against piracies and felonies on the high seas, and against insurrections among ourselves. They are also authorised to provide for the administration of justice in certain matters of a general concern, and in some that I think are not so. But it ought to be left to the state governments to provide for the protection and defence of the citizen against the hand of private violence, and the wrongs done or attempted by individuals to each other—Protection and defence against the murderer, the robber, the thief, the cheat, and the unjust person, is to be derived from the respective state governments.—The just way of reasoning therefore on this subject is this, the general government is to provide for the protection and defence of the community against foreign attacks, &c., they therefore ought to have authority sufficient to effect this, so far as is consistent with the providing for our internal protection and defence. The state governments are entrusted with the care of administring justice among its citizens, and the management of other internal concerns, they ought therefore to retain power adequate to the end. The preservation of internal peace and good order, and the due administration of law and justice, ought to be the first care of every government.—The happiness of a people depends infinitely more on this than it does upon all that glory and respect which nations acquire by the most brilliant martial achievements—and I believe history will furnish but few examples of nations who have duly attended to these, who have been subdued by foreign invaders. If a proper respect and submission to the laws prevailed over all orders of men in our country; and if a spirit of public and private justice, oeconomy and industry influenced the people, we need not be under any apprehensions but what they would be ready to repel any invasion that might be made on the country.[58] And more than this, I would not wish from them—A defensive war is the only one I think justifiable[59]—I do not make these observations to prove, that a government ought not to be authorised to provide for the protection and defence of a country against external enemies, but to shew that this is not the most important, much less the only object of their care.[60]

Federalist*, No. 23.

The European governments are almost all of them framed, and administered with a view to arms, and war, as that in which their chief glory consists; they mistake the end of government—it was designed to save men[']s lives, not to destroy them. We ought to furnish the world with an example of a great people, who in their civil institutions hold chiefly in view, the attainment of virtue, and happiness among ourselves. Let the monarchs in Europe, share among them the glory of depopulating countries, and butchering thousands of their innocent citizens, to revenge private quarrels, or to punish an insult offered to a wife, a mistress, or a favorite: I envy them not the honor, and I pray heaven this country may never be ambitious of it.[61] The czar Peter the great, acquired great glory by his arms; but all this was nothing, compared with the true glory which he obtained, by civilizing his rude and barbarous subjects, diffusing among them knowledge, and establishing, and cultivating the arts of life: by the former he desolated countries, and drenched the earth with human blood: by the latter he softened the ferocious nature of his people, and pointed them to the means of human happiness. The most important end of government then, is the proper direction of its internal policy, and oeconomy; this is the province of the state governments, and it is evident, and is indeed admitted, that these ought to be under their controul. Is it not then preposterous, and in the highest degree absurd, when the state governments are vested with powers so essential to the peace and good order of society, to take from them the means of their own preservation?

2.9.87

2.9.88 The idea, that the powers of congress in respect to revenue ought to be unlimited, "because the circumstances which may affect the public safety are not reducible to certain determinate limits," is novel, as it relates to the government of the united states. The inconveniencies which resulted from the feebleness of the present confederation was discerned, and felt soon after its adoption. It was soon discovered, that a power to require money, without either the authority or means to enforce a collection of it, could not be relied upon either to provide for the common defence, the discharge of the national debt, or for support of government. Congress therefore, so early as February 1781, recommended to the states to invest them with a power to levy an impost of five per cent ad valorem, on all imported goods, as a fund to be appropriated to discharge the debts already contracted, or which should hereafter be contracted for the support of the war, to be continued until the debts should be fully and finally discharged. There is not the most distant idea held out in this act, that an unlimited power to collect taxes, duties and excises was necessary to be vested in the united states, and yet this was a time of the most pressing danger and distress. The idea then was, that if certain definite funds were assigned to the union, which were certain in their natures, productive, and easy of collection, it would enable them to answer their engagements, and provide for their defence, and the impost of five per cent was fixed upon for the purpose.

2.9.89 This same subject was revived in the winter and spring of 1783, and after a long consideration of the subject, and many schemes were proposed; the result was, a recommendation of the revenue system of April 1783; this system does not suggest an idea that it was necessary to grant the United States unlimited authority in matters of revenue. A variety of amendments were proposed to this system, some of which are upon the journals of Congress, but it does not appear that any of them proposed to invest the general government with discretionary power to raise money. On the contrary, all of them limit them to certain definite objects, and fix the bounds over which they could not pass. This recommendation was passed at the conclusion of the war, and was founded on an estimate of the whole national debt. It was computed, that one million and an half of dollars, in addition to the impost, was a sufficient sum to pay the annual interest of the debt, and gradually to abolish the principal.—Events have proved that their estimate was sufficiently liberal, as the domestic debt appears upon its being adjusted to be less than it was computed, and since this period a considerable portion of the principal of the domestic debt has been discharged by the sale of the western lands. It has been constantly urged by Congress, and by individuals, ever since, until lately, that had this revenue been appropriated by the states, as it was recommended, it would have been adequate to every exigency of the union. Now indeed it is insisted, that all the treasures of the country are to be under the controul of that body, whom we are to appoint to provide for our protection and defence against foreign enemies. The debts of the several states, and the support of the governments of them are to trust to fortune and accident. If the union should not have occasion for all the money they can raise, they will leave a portion for the state, but this must be a matter of mere grace and favor. Doctrines like these would not have been listened to by any state in the union, at a time when we were pressed on every side by a powerful enemy, and were called upon to make greater exertions than we have any reason to expect we shall ever be again. The ability and character of the convention, who framed the proferred constitution, is sounded forth and reiterated by every declaimer and writer in its favor, as a powerful argument to induce its adoption. But are not the patriots who guided our councils in the perilous times of the war, entitled to equal respect. How has it happened, that none of these perceived a truth, which it is pretended is capable of such clear demonstration, that the power to raise a revenue should be deposited in the general government without limitation? Were the men so dull of apprehension, so incapable of reasoning as not to be able to draw the inference?[62] The truth is, no such necessity exists. It is a thing practicable, and by no means so difficult as is pretended, to limit the powers of the general government in respect to revenue, while yet they may retain reasonable means to provide for the common defence.

It is admitted, that human wisdom cannot foresee all the variety of circumstances that may arise to endanger the safety of nations—and it may with equal truth be added, that the power of a nation, exerted with its utmost vigour, may not be equal to repel a force with which it may be assailed, much less may it be able, with its ordinary resources and power, to oppose an extraordinary and unexpected attack;—but yet every nation may form a rational judgment, what force will be competent to protect and defend it, against any enemy with which it is probable it may have to contend. In extraordinary attacks, every country must rely upon the spirit and special exertions of its inhabitants—and these extraordinary efforts will always very much depend upon the happiness and good order the people experience from a wise and prudent administration of their internal government.[63] The states are as capable of making a just estimate on this head, as perhaps any nation in the world.—We have no powerful nation in our neighbourhood; if we are to go to war, it must either be with the Aboriginal natives, or with European nations. The first are so unequal to a contest with this whole continent, that they are rather to be dreaded for the depredations they may make on our frontiers, than for any impression they will ever be able to make on the body of the country. Some of the European nations, it is true, have provinces bordering upon us, but from these, unsupported by their European forces, we have nothing to apprehend; if any of them should attack us, they will have to transport their armies across the atlantic, at immense expence, while we should defend ourselves in our own country, which abounds with every necessary of life. For defence against any assault, which there is any probability will be made upon us, we may easily form an estimate.

2.9.90

2.9.91 I may be asked to point out the sources, from which the general government could derive a sufficient revenue, to answer the demands of the union. Many might be suggested, and for my part, I am not disposed to be tenacious of my own opinion on the subject. If the object be defined with precision, and will operate to make the burden fall any thing nearly equal on the different parts of the union, I shall be satisfied.

2.9.92 There is one source of revenue, which it is agreed, the general government ought to have the sole controul of. This is an impost upon all goods imported from foreign countries. This would, of itself, be very productive, and would be collected with ease and certainty.—It will be a fund too, constantly encreasing—for our commerce will grow, with the productions of the country; and these, together with our consumption of foreign goods, will encrease with our population.[64] It is said, that the impost will not produce a sufficient sum to satisfy the demands of the general government; perhaps it would not. Let some other then, equally well defined, be assigned them:—that this is practicable is certain, because such particular objects were proposed by some members of Congress when the revenue system of April 1783, was agitated in that body. It was then moved, that a tax at the rate of ninetieths[65] of a dollar on surveyed land, and a house tax of half a dollar on a house, should be granted to the United States. I do not mention this, because I approve of raising a revenue in this mode. I believe such a tax would be difficult in its collection, and inconvenient in its operation. But it shews, that it has heretofore been the sense of some of those, who now contend, that the general government should have unlimited authority in matters of revenue, that their authority should be definite and limitted on that head.—My own opinion is, that the objects from which the general government should have authority to raise a revenue, should be of such a nature, that the tax should be raised by simple laws, with few officers, with certainty and expedition, and with the least interference with the internal police of the states.—Of this nature is the impost on imported goods—and it appears to me that a duty on exports, would also be of this nature—and therefore, for ought I can discover, this would be the best source of revenue to grant the general government. I know neither the Congress nor the state legislatures will have authority under the new constitution to raise a revenue in this way. But I cannot perceive the reason of the restriction. It appears to me evident, that a tax on articles exported, would be as nearly equal as any that we can expect to lay, and it certainly would be collected with more ease and less expence than any direct tax. I do not however, contend for this mode, it may be liable to well founded objections that have not occurred to me. But this I do contend for, that some mode is practicable, and that limits must be marked between the general government, and the states on this head, or if they be not, either the Congress in the exercise of this power, will deprive the state legislatures of the means of their existence, or the states by resisting the constitutional authority of the general government, will render it nugatory.

Brutus.

VIII

10 January 1788

The next powers vested by this constitution in the general government, which we shall consider, are those, which authorise them to "borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to raise and support armies." I take these two together and connect them with the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, because their extent, and the danger that will arise from the exercise of these powers, cannot be fully understood, unless they are viewed in relation to each other. 2.9.93

The power to borrow money is general and unlimited, and the clause so often before referred to, authorises the passing any laws proper and necessary to carry this into execution. Under this authority, the Congress may mortgage any or all the revenues of the union, as a fund to loan money upon, and it is probably, in this way, they may borrow of foreign nations, a principal sum, the interest of which will be equal to the annual revenues of the country.—By this means, they may create a national debt, so large, as to exceed the ability of the country ever to sink. I can scarcely contemplate a greater calamity that could befal this country, than to be loaded with a debt exceeding their ability ever to discharge. If this be a just remark, it is unwise and improvident to vest in the general government a power to borrow at discretion, without any limitation or restriction. 2.9.94

It may possibly happen that the safety and welfare of the country may require, that money be borrowed, and it is proper when such a necessity arises that the power should be exercised by the general government.—But it certainly ought never to be exercised, but on the most urgent occasions, and then we should not borrow of foreigners if we could possibly avoid it. 2.9.95

The constitution should therefore have so restricted, the exercise of this power as to have rendered it very difficult for the government to practise it. The present confederation requires the assent of nine states to exercise this, and a number of the other important powers of the confederacy—and it would certainly have been a wise provision in this constitution, to have made it necessary that two thirds of the members should assent to borrowing money—when the necessity was indispensible, this assent would always be given, and in no other cause ought it to be.

2.9.96 The power to raise armies, is indefinite and unlimited, and authorises the raising forces, as well in peace as in war. Whether the clause which impowers the Congress to pass all laws which are proper and necessary, to carry this into execution, will not authorise them to impress men for the army, is a question well worthy consideration? If the general legislature deem it for the general welfare to raise a body of troops, and they cannot be procured by voluntary enlistments, it seems evident, that it will be proper and necessary to effect it, that men be impressed from the militia to make up the deficiency.

2.9.97 These powers taken in connection, amount to this: that the general government have unlimitted authority and controul over all the wealth and all the force of the union. The advocates for this scheme, would favor the world with a new discovery, if they would shew, what kind of freedom or independency is left to the state governments, when they cannot command any part of the property or of the force of the country, but at the will of the Congress. It seems to me as absurd, as it would be to say, that I was free and independent, when I had conveyed all my property to another, and was tenant to will to him, and had beside, given an indenture of myself to serve him during life.—The power to keep up standing armies in time of peace, has been justly objected, to this system, as dangerous and improvident. The advocates who have wrote in its favor, have some of them ridiculed the objection, as though it originated in the distempered brain of its opponents,[66] and others have taken pains to shew, that it is a power that was proper to be granted to the rulers in this constitution.[67] That you may be enabled to form a just opinion on this subject, I shall first make some remarks, tending to prove, that this power ought to be restricted, and then animadvert on the arguments which have been adduced to justify it.

2.9.98 I take it for granted, as an axiom in politic, that the people should never authorise their rulers to do any thing, which if done, would operate to their injury.

It seems equally clear, that in a case where a power, if given and exercised, will generally produce evil to the community, and seldom good—and which, experience has proved, has most frequently been exercised to the great injury, and very often to the total destruction of the government; in such a case, I say, this power, if given at all, should if possible be so restricted, as to prevent the ill effect of its operation.

2.9.99 Let us then enquire, whether standing armies in time of peace, would be ever beneficial to our country—or if in some extraordinary cases, they might be necessary; whether it is not true, that they have generally proved a scourge to a country, and destructive of their liberty.

I shall not take up much of your time in proving a point, in which the friends of liberty, in all countries, have so universally agreed. The following extract from Mr. Pultney's speech, delivered in the house of commons of Great-Britain, on a motion for reducing the army, is so full to the point, and so much better than any thing I can say, that I shall be excused for inserting it.[68] He says, "I have always been, and always shall be against a standing army of any kind; to me it is a terrible thing, whether under that of a parliamentary, or any other designation; a standing army is still a standing army by whatever name it is called; they are a body of men distinct from the body of the people; they are governed by different laws, and blind obedience, and an entire submission to the orders of their commanding officer, is their only principle; the nations around us, sir, are already enslaved, and have been enslaved by those very means; by means of their standing armies they have every one lost their liberties; it is indeed impossible that the liberties of the people in any country can be preserved where a numerous standing army is kept up. Shall we then take our measures from the example of our neighbours? No, sir, on the contrary, from their misfortunes we ought to learn to avoid those rocks upon which they have split.

"It signifies nothing to tell me that our army is commanded by such 2.9.100 gentlemen as cannot be supposed to join in any measures for enslaving their country; it may be so; I have a very good opinion of many gentlemen now in the army; I believe they would not join in any such measures; but their lives are uncertain, nor can we be sure how long they will be kept in command, they may all be dismissed in a moment, and proper tools of power put in their room. Besides, sir, we know the passions of men, we know how dangerous it is to trust the best of men with too much power. Where was a braver army than that under Jul. Caesar? Where was there ever an army that had served their country more faithfully? That army was commanded generally by the best citizens of Rome, by men of great fortune and figure in their country, yet that army enslaved their country. The affections of the soldiers towards their country, the honor and integrity of the under officers, are not to be depended on. By the military law the administration of justice is so quick, and the punishment so severe, that neither the officer nor soldier dare dispute the orders of his supreme commander; he must not consult his own inclination. If an officer were commanded to pull his own father out of this house, he must do it; he dares not disobey; immediate death would be the sure consequence of the least grumbling: and if an officer were sent into the court of request, accompanied by a body of musketeers with screwed bayonets, and with orders to tell us what we ought to do, and how we were to vote: I know what would be the duty of this house; I know it would be our duty to order the officer to be hanged at the door of the lobby; but I doubt, sir, I doubt much, if such a spirit could be found in the house, or in any house of commons that will ever be in England.

2.9.101 "Sir, I talk not of imaginary things? I talk of what has happened to an English house of commons, from an English army; not only from an English army, but an army that was raised by that very house of commons, an army that was paid by them, and an army that was commanded by generals appointed by them; therefore do not let us vainly imagine, that an army, raised and maintained by authority of parliament, will always be so submissive to them. If an army be so numerous as to have it in their power to overawe the parliament, they will be submissive as long as the parliament does nothing to disoblige their favourite general; but when that case happens, I am afraid, that in place of the parliament's dismissing the army, the army will dismiss the parliament."—If this great man's reasoning be just, it follows, that keeping up a standing army, would be in the highest degree dangerous to the liberty and happiness of the community—and if so, the general government ought not to have authority to do it; for no government should be empowered to do that which if done, would tend to destroy public liberty.

Brutus.

IX

17 January 1788

2.9.102 The design of civil government is to protect the rights and promote the happiness of the people.

For this end, rulers are invested with powers. But we cannot from hence justly infer that these powers should be unlimited. There are certain rights which mankind possess, over which government ought not to have any controul, because it is not necessary they should, in order to attain the end of its institution. There are certain things which rulers should be absolutely prohibited from doing, because, if they should do them, they would work an injury, not a benefit to the people. Upon the same principles of reasoning, if the exercise of a power, is found generally or in most cases to operate to the injury of the community, the legislature should be restricted in the exercise of that power, so as to guard, as much as possible, against the danger. These principles seem to be the evident dictates of common sense, and what ought to give sanction to them in the minds of every American, they are the great principles of the late revolution, and those which governed the framers of all our state constitutions. Hence we find, that all the state constitutions, contain either formal bills of rights, which set bounds to the powers of the legislature, or have restrictions for the same purpose in the body of the constitutions. Some of our new political Doctors, indeed, reject the idea of the necessity, or propriety of such restrictions in any elective government, but especially in the general one.[69]

2.9.103 But it is evident, that the framers of this new system were of a contrary opinion, because they have prohibited the general government, the exercise of some powers, and restricted them in that of others.

I shall adduce two instances, which will serve to illustrate my meaning, as well as to confirm the truth of the preceeding remark.

In the 9th section, it is declared, "no bill of attainder shall be passed." This clause takes from the legislature all power to declare a particular person guilty of a crime by law. It is proper the legislature should be deprived of the exercise of this power, because it seldom is exercised to the benefit of the community, but generally to its injury.

2.9.104 In the same section it is provided, that "the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in cases of rebellion and invasion, the public safety may require it." This clause limits the power of the legislature to deprive a citizen of the right of habeas corpus, to particular cases viz. those of rebellion and invasion; the reason is plain, because in no other cases can this power be exercised for the general good.

Let us apply these remarks to the case of standing armies in times of peace. If they generally prove the destruction of the happiness and liberty of the people, the legislature ought not to have power to keep them up, or if they had, this power should be so restricted, as to secure the people against the danger arising from the exercise of it.

2.9.105 That standing armies are dangerous to the liberties of a people was proved in my last number—If it was necessary, the truth of the position might be confirmed by the history of almost every nation in the world. A cloud of the most illustrious patriots of every age and country, where freedom has been enjoyed, might be adduced as witnesses in support of the sentiment. But I presume it would be useless, to enter into a laboured argument, to prove to the people of America, a position, which has so long and so generally been received by them as a kind of axiom.

2.9.106 Some of the advocates for this new system controvert this sentiment, as they do almost every other that has been maintained by the best writers on free government.—Others, though they will not expressly deny, that standing armies in times of peace are dangerous, yet join with these in maintaining, that it is proper the general government should be vested with the power to do it.[70] I shall now proceed to examine the arguments they adduce in support of their opinions.

2.9.107 A writer, in favor of this system, treats this objection as a ridiculous one.[71] He supposes it would be as proper to provide against the introduction of Turkish janizaries, or against making the Alcoran a rule of faith.

From the positive, and dogmatic manner, in which this author delivers his opinions, and answers objections made to his sentiments—one would conclude, that he was some pedantic pedagogue who had been accustomed to deliver his dogmas to pupils, who always placed implicit faith in what he delivered.

2.9.108 But, why is this provision so ridiculous? because, says this author, it is unnecessary. But, why is it unnecessary? "because, the principles and habits, as well as the power of the Americans are directly opposed to standing armies; and there is as little necessity to guard against them by positive constitutions, as to prohibit the establishment of the Mahometan religion." It is admitted then, that a standing army in time of peace, is an evil. I ask then, why should this government be authorised to do evil? If the principles and habits of the people of this country are opposed to standing armies in time of peace, if they do not contribute to the public good, but would endanger the public liberty and happiness, why should the government be vested with the power? No reason can be given, why rulers should be authorised to do, what, if done, would oppose the principles and habits of the people, and endanger the public safety, but there is every reason in the world, that they should be prohibited from the exercise of such a power. But this author supposes, that no danger is to be apprehended from the exercise of this power, because, if armies are kept up, it will be by the people themselves, and therefore, to provide against it, would be as absurd as for a man to "pass a law in his family, that no troops should be quartered in his family by his consent." This reasoning supposes, that the general government is to be exercised by the people of America themselves—But such an idea is groundless and absurd. There is surely a distinction between the people and their rulers, even when the latter are representatives of the former.—They certainly are not identically the same, and it cannot be disputed, but it may and often does happen, that they do not possess the same sentiments or pursue the same interests. I think I have shewn, that as this government is constituted, there is little reason to expect, that the interest of the people and their rulers will be the same.

2.9.109 Besides, if the habits and sentiments of the people of America are to be relied upon, as the sole security against the encroachment of their rulers, all restrictions in constitutions are unnecessary; nothing more is requisite, than to declare who shall be authorized to exercise the powers of government, and about this we need not be very careful—for the habits and principles of the people will oppose every abuse of power. This I suppose to be the sentiments of this author, as it seems to be of many of the advocates of this new system. An opinion like this, is as directly opposed to the principles and habits of the people of America, as it is to the sentiments of every writer of reputation on the science of government, and repugnant to the principles of reason and common sense.[72]

2.9.110 The idea that there is no danger of the establishment of a standing army, under the new constitution, is without foundation.

It is a well known fact, that a number of those who had an agency in producing this system, and many of those who it is probable will have a principal share in the administration of the government under it, if it is adopted, are avowedly in favour of standing armies. It is a language common among them, "That no people can be kept in order, unless the government have an army to awe them into obedience; it is necessary to support the dignity of government, to have a military establishment."[73] And there will not be wanting a variety of plausible reason to justify the raising one, drawn from the danger we are in from the Indians on our frontiers, or from the European provinces in our neighbourhood. If to this we add, that an army will afford a decent support, and agreeable employment to the young men of many families, who are too indolent to follow occupations that will require care and industry, and too poor to live without doing any business[,] we can have little reason to doubt, but that we shall have a large standing army, as soon as this government can find money to pay them, and perhaps sooner.[74]

A writer, who is the boast of the advocates of this new constitution, has taken great pains to shew, that this power was proper and necessary to be vested in the general government. 2.9.111

He sets out with calling in question the candour and integrity of those who advance the objection, and with insinuating, that it is their intention to mislead the people, by alarming their passions, rather than to convince them by arguments addressed to their understandings.[75]

The man who reproves another for a fault, should be careful that he himself be not guilty of it. How far this writer has manifested a spirit of candour, and has pursued fair reasoning on this subject, the impartial public will judge, when his arguments pass before them in review.

He first attempts to shew, that this objection is futile and disingenuous, because the power to keep up standing armies, in time of peace, is vested, under the present government, in the legislature of every state in the union, except two. Now this is so far from being true, that it is expressly declared, by the present articles of confederation, that no body of forces "shall be kept up by any state, in time of peace, except such number only, as in the judgment of the United States in Congress assembled, shall be deemed requisite to garrison the forts necessary for the defence of such state."[76] Now, was it candid and ingenuous to endeavour to persuade the public, that the general government had no other power than your own legislature have on this head; when the truth is, your legislature have no authority to raise and keep up any forces? 2.9.112

He next tells us, that the power given by this constitution, on this head, is similar to that which Congress possess under the present confederation. As little ingenuity is manifested in this representation as in that of the former.

I shall not undertake to enquire whether or not Congress are vested with a power to keep up a standing army in time of peace; it has been a subject warmly debated in Congress, more than once, since the peace; and one of 2.9.113 the most respectable states in the union, were so fully convinced that they had no such power, that they expressly instructed their delegates to enter a solemn protest against it on the journals of Congress, should they attempt to exercise it.

But should it be admitted that they have the power, there is such a striking dissimilarity between the restrictions under which the present Congress can exercise it, and that of the proposed government, that the comparison will serve rather to shew the impropriety of vesting the proposed government with the power, than of justifying it.

2.9.114 It is acknowledged by this writer, that the powers of Congress, under the present confederation, amount to little more than that of recommending. If they determine to raise troops, they are obliged to effect it through the authority of the state legislatures. This will, in the first instance, be a most powerful restraint upon them, against ordering troops to be raised. But if they should vote an army, contrary to the opinion and wishes of the people, the legislatures of the respective states would not raise them. Besides, the present Congress hold their places at the will and pleasure of the legislatures of the states who send them, and no troops can be raised, but by the assent of nine states out of the thirteen. Compare the power proposed to be lodged in the legislature on this head, under this constitution, with that vested in the present Congress, and every person of the least discernment, whose understanding is not totally blinded by prejudice, will perceive, that they bear no analogy to each other. Under the present confederation, the representatives of nine states, out of thirteen, must assent to the raising of troops, or they cannot be levied: under the proposed constitution, a less number than the representatives of two states, in the house of representatives, and the representatives of three states and an half in the senate, with the assent of the president, may raise any number of troops they please. The present Congress are restrained from an undue exercise of this power, from this consideration, they know [that] the state legislatures, through whose authority it must be carried into effect, would not comply with the requisition for the purpose, if it was evidently opposed to the public good: the proposed constitution authorizes the legislature to carry their determinations into execution, without the intervention of any other body between them and the people. The Congress under the present form are amenable to, and removable by, the legislatures of the respective states, and are chosen for one year only: the proposed constitution does not make the members of the legislature accountable to, or removeable by the state legislatures at all; and they are chosen, the one house for six, and the other for two years; and cannot be removed until their time of service is expired, let them conduct [themselves] ever so badly.—The public will judge, from the above comparison, how just a claim this writer has to that candour he affects to possess. In the mean time, to convince him, and the advocates for this system, that I possess some share of candor, I pledge myself to give up all opposition to it, on the head of standing armies, if the power to raise them be restricted as it is in the present confederation; and I believe I may safely answer, not only for myself, but for all who make the objection, that they will be satisfied with less.

Brutus.

X

24 January 1788

To the People of the State of New-York.

The liberties of a people are in danger from a large standing army, not only because the rulers may employ them for the purposes of supporting themselves in any usurpations of power, which they may see proper to exercise, but there is great hazard, that an army will subvert the forms of the government, under whose authority, they are raised, and establish one, according to the pleasure of their leader. 2.9.115

We are informed, in the faithful pages of history, of such events frequently happening.—Two instances have been mentioned in a former paper.[77] They are so remarkable, that they are worthy of the most careful attention of every lover of freedom.—They are taken from the history of the two most powerful nations that have ever existed in the world; and who are the most renowned, for the freedom they enjoyed, and the excellency of their constitutions:—I mean Rome and Britain. 2.9.116

In the first, the liberties of the commonwealth was destroyed, and the constitution overturned, by an army, lead by Julius Cesar, who was appointed to the command, by the constitutional authority of that commonwealth. He changed it from a free republic, whose fame had sounded, and is still celebrated by all the world, into that of the most absolute despotism. A standing army effected this change, and a standing army supported it through a succession of ages, which are marked in the annals of history, with the most horrid cruelties, bloodshed, and carnage;—The most devilish, beastly, and unnatural vices, that ever punished or disgraced human nature. 2.9.117

The same army, that in Britain, vindicated the liberties of that people from the encroachments and despotism of a tyrant king, assisted Cromwell, their General, in wresting from the people, that liberty they had so dearly earned.

You may be told, these instances will not apply to our case:—But those who would persuade you to believe this, either mean to deceive you, or have not themselves considered the subject. 2.9.118

I firmly believe, no country in the world had ever a more patriotic army, than the one which so ably served this country, in the late war.

But had the General who commanded them, been possessed of the spirit 2.9.119 of a Julius Cesar or a Cromwell, the liberties of this country, had in all probability, terminated with the war; or had they been maintained, might have cost more blood and treasure, than was expended in the conflict with Great-Britain. When an anonimous writer addressed the officers of the army at the close of the war, advising them not to part with their arms, until justice was done them—the effect it had is well known.[78] It affected them like an electric shock. He wrote like Cesar; and had the commander in chief, and a few more officers of rank, countenanced the measure, the desperate resolution had been taken, to refuse to disband. What the consequences of such a determination would have been, heaven only knows.—The army were in the full vigor of health and spirits, in the habit of discipline, and possessed of all our military stores and apparatus. They would have acquired great accessions of strength from the country.—Those who were disgusted at our republican forms of government (for such there then were, of high rank among us) would have lent them all their aid.—We should in all probability have seen a constitution and laws, dictated to us, at the head of an army, and at the point of a bayonet, and the liberties for which we had so severely struggled, snatched from us in a moment. It remains a secret, yet to be revealed, whether this measure was not suggested, or at least countenanced, by some, who have had great influence in producing the present system.—Fortunately indeed for this country, it had at the head of the army, a patriot as well as a general; and many of our principal officers, had not abandoned the characters of citizens, by assuming that of soldiers, and therefore, the scheme proved abortive. But are we to expect, that this will always be the case? Are we so much better than the people of other ages and of other countries, that the same allurements of power and greatness, which led them aside from their duty, will have no influence upon men in our country? Such an idea, is wild and extravagant.—Had we indulged such a delusion, enough has appeared in a little time past, to convince the most credulous, that the passion for pomp, power and greatness, works as powerfully in the hearts of many of our better sort, as it ever did in any country under heaven.—Were the same opportunity again to offer, we should very probably be grossly disappointed, if we made dependence, that all who then rejected the overture, would do it again.

2.9.120 From these remarks, it appears, that the evil[79] to be feared from a large standing army in time of peace, does not arise solely from the apprehension, that the rulers may employ them for the purpose of promoting their own ambitious views, but that equal, and perhaps greater danger, is to be apprehended from their overturning the constitutional powers of the government, and assuming the power to dictate any form they please.

2.9.121 The advocates for power, in support of this right in the proposed government, urge that a restraint upon the discretion of the legislatures, in respect to military establishments in time of peace, would be improper to be imposed, because they say, it will be necessary to maintain small garrisons on the frontiers, to guard against the depredations of the Indians, and to be prepared to repel any encroachments or invasions that may be made by Spain or Britain.[80]

The amount of this argument striped of the abundant verbages with which the author has dressed it, is this: 2.9.122

It will probably be necessary to keep up a small body of troops to garrison a few posts, which it will be necessary to maintain, in order to guard against the sudden encroachments of the Indians, or of the Spaniards and British; and therefore, the general government ought to be invested with power to raise and keep up a standing army in time of peace, without restraint; at their discretion.

I confess, I cannot perceive that the conclusion follows from the premises. Logicians say, it is not good reasoning to infer a general conclusion from particular premises: though I am not much of a Logician, it seems to me, this argument is very like that species of reasoning.

When the patriots in the parliament in Great-Britain, contended with such force of argument, and all the powers of eloquence, against keeping up standing armies in time of peace, it is obvious, they never entertained an idea, that small garrisons on their frontiers, or in the neighbourhood of powers, from whom they were in danger of encroachments, or guards, to take care of public arsenals would thereby be prohibited. 2.9.123

The advocates for this power farther urge that it is necessary, because it may, and probably will happen, that circumstances will render it requisite to raise an army to be prepared to repel attacks of an enemy, before a formal declaration of war, which in modern times has fallen into disuse.[81] If the constitution prohibited the raising an army, until a war actually commenced, it would deprive the government of the power of providing for the defence of the country, until the enemy were within our territory. If the restriction is not to extend to the raising armies in cases of emergency, but only to the keeping them up, this would leave the matter to the discretion of the legislature; and they might, under the pretence that there was danger of an invasion, keep up the army as long as they judged proper—and hence it is inferred, that the legislature should have authority to raise and keep up an army without any restriction. But from these premises nothing more will follow than this, that the legislature should not be so restrained, as to put it out of their power to raise an army, when such exigencies as are instanced shall arise. But it does not thence follow, that the government should be empowered to raise and maintain standing armies at their discretion as well in peace as in war. If indeed, it is impossible to vest the general government with the power of raising troops to garrison the frontier posts, to guard arsenals, or to be prepared to repel an attack, when we saw a power preparing to make one, without giving them a general and indefinite authority, to raise and keep up armies, without any restriction or qualification, then this reasoning might have weight; but this has not been proved nor can it be. 2.9.124

2.9.125 It is admitted that to prohibit the general government, from keeping up standing armies, while yet they were authorised to raise them in case of exigency, would be an insufficient guard against the danger. A discretion of such latitude would give room to elude the force of the provision.

It is also admitted that an absolute prohibition against raising troops, except in cases of actual war, would be improper; because it will be requisite to raise and support a small number of troops to garrison the important frontier posts, and to guard arsenals; and it may happen, that the danger of an attack from a foreign power may be so imminent, as to render it highly proper we should raise an army, in order to be prepared to resist them. But to raise and keep up forces for such purposes and on such occasions, is not included in the idea, of keeping up standing armies in times of peace.

2.9.126 It is a thing very practicable to give the government sufficient authority to provide for these cases, and at the same time to provide a reasonable and competent security against the evil of a standing army—a clause to the following purpose would answer the end:

As standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, and have often been the means of overturning the best constitutions of government, no standing army, or troops of any description whatsoever, shall be raised or kept up by the legislature, except so many as shall be necessary for guards to the arsenals of the United States, or for garrisons to such posts on the frontiers, as it shall be deemed absolutely necessary to hold, to secure the inhabitants, and facilitate the trade with the Indians: unless when the United States are threatened with an attack or invasion from some foreign power, in which case the legislature shall be authorised to raise an army to be prepared to repel the attack; provided that no troops whatsoever shall be raised in time of peace, without the assent of two thirds of the members, composing both houses of the legislature.

2.9.127 A clause similar to this would afford sufficient latitude to the legislature to raise troops in all cases that were really necessary, and at the same time competent security against the establishment of that dangerous engine of despotism a standing army.

The same writer who advances the arguments I have noticed, makes a number of other observations with a view to prove that the power to raise and keep up armies, ought to be discretionary in the general legislature; some of them are curious; he instances the raising of troops in Massachusetts and Pennsylvania, to shew the necessity of keeping a standing army in time of peace;[82] the least reflection must convince every candid mind that both these cases are totally foreign to his purpose—Massachusetts raised a body of troops for six months, at the expiration of which they were to disband of course; this looks very little like a standing army. But beside, was that commonwealth in a state of peace at that time? So far from it that they were in the most violent commotions and contents, and their legislature had formally declared that an unnatural rebellion existed within the state. The situation of Pennsylvania was similar; a number of armed men had levied war against the authority of the state, and openly avowed their intention of withdrawing their allegiance from it. To what purpose examples are brought, of states raising troops for short periods in times of war or insurrections, on a question concerning the propriety of keeping up standing armies in times of peace, the public must judge.

It is farther said, that no danger can arise from this power being lodged in the hands of the general government, because the legislatures will be a check upon them, to prevent their abusing it.[83] 2.9.128

This is offered, as what force there is in it will hereafter receive a more particular examination. At present, I shall only remark, that it is difficult to conceive how the state legislatures can, in any case, hold a check over the general legislature, in a constitutional way. The latter has, in every instance to which their powers extend, complete controul over the former. The state legislatures can, in no case, by law, resolution, or otherwise, of right, prevent or impede the general government, from enacting any law, or executing it, which this constitution authorizes them to enact or execute. If then the state legislatures check the general legislatures [sic], it must be by exciting the people to resist constitutional laws. In this way every individual, or every body of men, may check any government, in proportion to the influence they may have over the body of the people. But such kinds of checks as these, though they sometimes correct the abuses of government, oftner destroy all government.[84]

It is further said, that no danger is to be apprehended from the exercise of this power, because it is lodged in the hands of representatives of the people; if they abuse it, it is in the power of the people to remove them, and chuse others who will pursue their interests.[85] Not to repeat what has been said before, That it is unwise in any people, to authorize their rulers to do, what, if done, would prove injurious—I have, in some former numbers, shewn, that the representation in the proposed government will be a mere shadow without the substance.[86] I am so confident that I am well founded in this opinion, that I am persuaded, if it was to be adopted or rejected, upon a fair discussion of its merits, without taking into contemplation circumstances extraneous to it, as reasons for its adoption, nineteen-twentieths of the sensible men in the union would reject it on this account alone; unless its powers were confined to much fewer objects than it embraces. 2.9.129

Brutus.

XI

31 January 1788

The nature and extent of the judicial power of the United States, proposed to be granted by this constitution, claims our particular attention. 2.9.130

Much has been said and written upon the subject of this new system on both sides, but I have not met with any writer, who has discussed the judicial powers with any degree of accuracy. And yet it is obvious, that we can form but very imperfect ideas of the manner in which this government will work, or the effect it will have in changing the internal police and mode of distributing justice at present subsisting in the respective states, without a thorough investigation of the powers of the judiciary and of the manner in which they will operate. This government is a complete system, not only for making, but for executing laws. And the courts of law, which will be constituted by it, are not only to decide upon the constitution and the laws made in pursuance of it, but by officers subordinate to them to execute all their decisions. The real effect of this system of government, will therefore be brought home to the feelings of the people, through the medium of the judicial power.[87] It is, moreover, of great importance, to examine with care the nature and extent of the judicial power, because those who are to be vested with it, are to be placed in a situation altogether unprecedented in a free country. They are to be rendered totally independent, both of the people and the legislature, both with respect to their offices and salaries. No errors they may commit can be corrected by any power above them, if any such power there be, nor can they be removed from office for making ever so many erroneous adjudications.

2.9.131 The only causes for which they can be displaced, is, conviction of treason, bribery, and high crimes and misdemeanors.

This part of the plan is so modelled, as to authorise the courts, not only to carry into execution the powers expressly given, but where these are wanting or ambiguously expressed, to supply what is wanting by their own decisions.

That we may be enabled to form a just opinion on this subject, I shall, in considering it,

1st. Examine the nature and extent of the judicial powers—and

2d. Enquire, whether the courts who are to exercise them, are so constituted as to afford reasonable ground of confidence, that they will exercise them for the general good.

2.9.132 With a regard to the nature and extent of the judicial powers, I have to regret my want of capacity to give that full and minute explanation of them that the subject merits. To be able to do this, a man should be possessed of a degree of law knowledge far beyond what I pretend to. A number of hard words and technical phrases are used in this part of the system, about the meaning of which gentlemen learned in the law differ.

2.9.133 Its advocates know how to avail themselves of these phrases. In a number of instances, where objections are made to the powers given to the judicial, they give such an explanation to the technical terms as to avoid them.

Though I am not competent to give a perfect explanation of the powers granted to this department of the government, I shall yet attempt to trace some of the leading features of it, from which I presume it will appear, that they will operate to a total subversion of the state judiciaries, if not, to the legislative authority of the states.

In article 3d, sect. 2d, it is said, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority, &c." 2.9.134

The first article to which this power extends, is, all cases in law and equity arising under this constitution.

What latitude of construction this clause should receive, it is not easy to say. At first view, one would suppose, that it meant no more than this, that the courts under the general government should exercise, not only the powers of courts of law, but also that of courts of equity, in the manner in which those powers are usually exercised in the different states. But this cannot be the meaning, because the next clause authorises the courts to take cognizance of all cases in law and equity arising under the laws of the United States; this last article, I conceive, conveys as much power to the general judicial as any of the state courts possess.

The cases arising under the constitution must be different from those arising under the laws, or else the two clauses mean exactly the same thing. 2.9.135

The cases arising under the constitution must include such, as bring into question its meaning, and will require an explanation of the nature and extent of the powers of the different departments under it.

This article, therefore, vests the judicial with a power to resolve all questions that may arise on any case on the construction of the constitution, either in law or in equity.[88]

1st. They are authorised to determine all questions that may arise upon the meaning of the constitution in law. This article vests the courts with authority to give the constitution a legal construction, or to explain it according to the rules laid down for construing a law.—These rules give a certain degree of latitude of explanation. According to this mode of construction, the courts are to give such meaning to the constitution as comports best with the common, and generally received acceptation of the words in which it is expressed, regarding their ordinary and popular use, rather than their grammatical propriety. Where words are dubious, they will be explained by the context. The end of the clause will be attended to, and the words will be understood, as having a view to it; and the words will not be so understood as to bear no meaning or a very absurd one. 2.9.136

2d. The judicial are not only to decide questions arising upon the meaning of the constitution in law, but also in equity. 2.9.137

By this they are empowered, to explain the constitution according to the reasoning spirit of it, without being confined to the words or letter.[89]

"From this method of interpreting laws (says Blackstone) by the reason of them, arises what we call equity;" which is thus defined by Grotius, "the correction of that, wherein the law, by reason of its universality, is deficient["]; for since in laws all cases cannot be foreseen, or expressed, it is necessary, that when the decrees of the law cannot be applied to particular cases, there should some where be a power vested of defining those circumstances, which had they been foreseen the legislator would have expressed; and these are the cases, which according to Grotius, ["]lex non exacte definit, sed arbitrio boni viri permittet."

2.9.138 The same learned author observes, "That equity, thus depending essentially upon each individual case, there can be no established rules and fixed principles of equity laid down, without destroying its very essence, and reducing it to a positive law."[90]

From these remarks, the authority and business of the courts of law, under this clause, may be understood.

They will give the sense of every article of the constitution, that may from time to time come before them. And in their decisions they will not confine themselves to any fixed or established rules, but will determine, according to what appears to them, the reason and spirit of the constitution. The opinions of the supreme court, whatever they may be, will have the force of law; because there is no power provided in the constitution, that can correct their errors, or controul their adjudications. From this court there is no appeal. And I conceive the legislature themselves, cannot set aside a judgment of this court, because they are authorised by the constitution to decide in the last resort. The legislature must be controuled by the constitution, and not the constitution by them. They have therefore no more right to set aside any judgment pronounced upon the construction of the constitution, than they have to take from the president, the chief command of the army and navy, and commit it to some other person. The reason is plain; the judicial and executive derive their authority from the same source, that the legislature do theirs; and therefore in all cases, where the constitution does not make the one responsible to, or controulable by the other, they are altogether independent of each other.

2.9.139 The judicial power will operate to effect, in the most certain, but yet silent and imperceptible manner, what is evidently the tendency of the constitution:—I mean, an entire subversion of the legislative, executive and judicial powers of the individual states. Every adjudication of the supreme court, on any question that may arise upon the nature and extent of the general government, will affect the limits of the state jurisdiction. In proportion as the former enlarge the exercise of their powers, will that of the latter be restricted.

2.9.140 That the judicial power of the United States, will lean strongly in favour of the general government, and will give such an explanation to the constitution, as will favour an extension of its jurisdiction, is very evident from a variety of considerations.

2.9.141 1st. The constitution itself strongly countenances such a mode of construction. Most of the articles in this system, which convey powers of any considerable importance, are conceived in general and indefinite terms, which are either equivocal, ambiguous, or which require long definitions to unfold the extent of their meaning. The two most important powers committed to any government, those of raising money, and of raising and keeping up troops, have already been considered, and shewn to be unlimitted by any thing but the discretion of the legislature.[91] The clause which vests the power to pass all laws which are proper and necessary, to carry the powers given into execution, it has been shewn, leaves the legislature at liberty, to do every thing, which in their judgment is best.[92] It is said, I know, that this clause confers no power on the legislature, which they would not have had without it[93]—though I believe this is not the fact, yet, admitting it to be, it implies that the constitution is not to receive an explanation strictly, according to its letter; but more power is implied than is expressed. And this clause, if it is to be considered, as explanatory of the extent of the powers given, rather than giving a new power, is to be understood as declaring, that in construing any of the articles conveying power, the spirit, intent and design of the clause, should be attended to, as well as the words in their common acceptation.

This constitution gives sufficient colour for adopting an equitable construction, if we consider the great end and design it professedly has in view—these appear[94] from its preamble to be, "to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and posterity." The design of this system is here expressed, and it is proper to give such a meaning to the various parts, as will best promote the accomplishment of the end; this idea suggests itself naturally upon reading the preamble, and will countenance the court in giving the several articles such a sense, as will the most effectually promote the ends the constitution had in view—how this manner of explaining the constitution will operate in practice, shall be the subject of future enquiry.

2d. Not only will the constitution justify the courts in inclining to this mode of explaining it, but they will be interested in using this latitude of interpretation. Every body of men invested with office are tenacious of power; they feel interested, and hence it has become a kind of maxim, to hand down their offices, with all its rights and privileges, unimpared to their successors; the same principle will influence them to extend their power, and increase their rights; this of itself will operate strongly upon the courts to give such a meaning to the constitution in all cases where it can possibly be done, as will enlarge the sphere of their own authority. Every extension of the power of the general legislature, as well as of the judicial powers, will increase the powers of the courts; and the dignity and importance of the judges, will be in proportion to the extent and magnitude of the powers they exercise. I add, it is highly probable the emolument of the judges will be 2.9.142 increased, with the increase of the business they will have to transact and its importance. From these considerations the judges will be interested to extend the powers of the courts, and to construe the constitution as much as possible, in such a way as to favour it; and that they will do it, appears probable.

2.9.143 3d. Because they will have precedent to plead, to justify them in it. It is well known, that the courts in England, have by their own authority, extended their jurisdiction far beyond the limits set them in their original institution, and by the laws of the land.

The court of exchequer is a remarkable instance of this. It was originally intended principally to recover the king's debts, and to order the revenues of the crown. It had a common law jurisdiction, which was established merely for the benefit of the king's accomptants. We learn from Blackstone, that the proceedings in this court are grounded on a writ called quo minus, in which the plaintiff suggests, that he is the king's farmer or debtor, and that the defendant hath done him the damage complained of, by which he is less able to pay the king.[95] These suits, by the statute of Rutland, are expressly directed to be confined to such matters as specially concern the king, or his ministers in the exchequer. And by the articuli super cartas, it is enacted, that no common pleas be thenceforth held in the exchequer contrary to the form of the great charter: but now any person may sue in the exchequer. The surmise of being debtor to the king being matter of form, and mere words of course; and the court is open to all the nation.

2.9.144 When the courts will have a precedent[96] before them of a court which extended its jurisdiction in opposition to an act of the legislature, is it not to be expected that they will extend theirs, especially when there is nothing in the constitution expressly against it? and they are authorised to construe its meaning, and are not under any controul?

This power in the judicial, will enable them to mould the government, into almost any shape they please.—The manner in which this may be effected we will hereafter examine.

Brutus.

XII

7 February 1788

2.9.145 In my last, I shewed, that the judicial power of the United States under the first clause of the second section of article eight, would be authorized to explain the constitution, not only according to its letter, but according to its spirit and intention; and having this power, they would strongly incline to give it such a construction as to extend the powers of the general government, as much as possible, to the diminution, and finally to the destruction, of that of the respective states.

I shall now proceed to shew how this power will operate in its exercise to effect these purposes. In order to perceive the extent of its influence, I shall consider,

First. How it will tend to extend the legislative authority.

Second. In what manner it will increase the jurisdiction of the courts, and Third. The way in which it will diminish, and destroy, both the legislative and judicial authority of the United States.

First. Let us enquire how the judicial power will effect an extension of the legislative authority. 2.9.146

Perhaps the judicial power will not be able, by direct and positive decrees, ever to direct the legislature, because it is not easy to conceive how a question can be brought before them in a course of legal discussion, in which they can give a decision, declaring, that the legislature have certain powers which they have not exercised, and which, in consequence of the determination of the judges, they will be bound to exercise. But it is easy to see, that in their adjudications they may establish certain principles, which being received by the legislature, will enlarge the sphere of their power beyond all bounds.

It is to be observed, that the supreme court has the power, in the last resort, to determine all questions that may arise in the course of legal discussion, on the meaning and construction of the constitution. This power they will hold under the constitution, and independent of the legislature. The latter can no more deprive the former of this right, than either of them, or both of them together, can take from the president, with the advice of the senate, the power of making treaties, or appointing ambassadors. 2.9.147

In determining these questions, the court must and will assume certain principles, from which they will reason, in forming their decisions. These principles, whatever they may be, when they become fixed, by a course of decisions, will be adopted by the legislature, and will be the rule by which they will explain their own powers. This appears evident from this consideration, that if the legislature pass laws, which, in the judgment of the court, they are not authorised to do by the constitution, the court will not take notice of them; for it will not be denied, that the constitution is the highest or supreme law.[97] And the courts are vested with the supreme and uncontroulable power, to determine, in all cases that come before them, what the constitution means; they cannot, therefore, execute a law, which, in their judgment, opposes the constitution, unless we can suppose they can make a superior law give way to an inferior. The legislature, therefore, will not go over the limits by which the courts may adjudge they are confined. And there is little room to doubt but that they will come up to those bounds, as 2.9.148 often as occasion and opportunity may offer, and they may judge it proper to do it. For as on the one hand, they will not readily pass laws which they know the courts will not execute, so on the other, we may be sure they will not scruple to pass such as they know they will give effect, as often as they may judge it proper.

2.9.149 From these observations it appears, that the judgment of the judicial, on the constitution, will become the rule to guide the legislature in their construction of their powers.

What the principles are, which the courts will adopt, it is impossible for us to say; but taking up the powers as I have explained them in my last number, which they will possess under this clause, it is not difficult to see, that they may, and probably will, be very liberal ones.

We have seen, that they will be authorized to give the constitution a construction according to its spirit and reason, and not to confine themselves to its letter.

2.9.150 To discover the spirit of the constitution, it is of the first importance to attend to the principal ends and designs it has in view. These are expressed in the preamble, in the following words, viz. "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this constitution," &c. If the end of the government is to be learned from these words, which are clearly designed to declare it, it is obvious it has in view every object which is embraced by any government. The preservation of internal peace—the due administration of justice—and to provide for the defence of the community, seems to include all the objects of government; but if they do not, they are certainly comprehended in the words, "to provide for the general welfare." If it be further considered, that this constitution, if it is ratified, will not be a compact entered into by states, in their corporate capacities, but an agreement of the people of the United States, as one great body politic, no doubt can remain, but that the great end of the constitution, if it is to be collected from the preamble, in which its end is declared, is to constitute a government which is to extend to every case for which any government is instituted, whether external or internal. The courts, therefore, will establish this as a principle in expounding the constitution, and will give every part of it such an explanation, as will give latitude to every department under it, to take cognizance of every matter, not only that affects the general and national concerns of the union, but also of such as relate to the administration of private justice, and to regulating the internal and local affairs of the different parts.

2.9.151 Such a rule of exposition is not only consistent with the general spirit of the preamble, but it will stand confirmed by considering more minutely the different clauses of it.

The first object declared to be in view is, "To form a perfect union." It is to be observed, it is not an union of states or bodies corporate; had this been the case the existence of the state governments, might have been secured. But it is a union of the people of the United States considered as one body, who are to ratify this constitution, if it is adopted. Now to make a union of this kind perfect, it is necessary to abolish all inferior governments, and to give the general one compleat legislative, executive and judicial powers to every purpose. The courts therefore will establish it as a rule in explaining the constitution to give it such a construction as will best tend to perfect the union or take from the state governments every power of either making or executing laws. The second object is "to establish justice." This must include not only the idea of instituting the rule of justice, or of making laws which shall be the measure or rule of right, but also of providing for the application of this rule or of administering justice under it. And under this the courts will in their decisions extend the power of the government to all cases they possibly can, or otherwise they will be restricted in doing what appears to be the intent of the constitution they should do, to wit, pass laws and provide for the execution of them, for the general distribution of justice between man and man. Another end declared is "to insure domestic tranquility." This comprehends a provision against all private breaches of the peace, as well as against all public commotions or general insurrections; and to attain the object of this clause fully, the government must exercise the power of passing laws on these subjects, as well as of appointing magistrates with authority to execute them. And the courts will adopt these ideas in their expositions. I might proceed to the other clause, in the preamble, and it would appear by a consideration of all of them separately, as it does by taking them together, that if the spirit of this system is to be known from its declared end and design in the preamble, its spirit is to subvert and abolish all the powers of the state government, and to embrace every object to which any government extends.

As it sets out in the preamble with this declared intention, so it proceeds 2.9.152 in the different parts with the same idea. Any person, who will peruse the 8th section with attention, in which most of the powers are enumerated, will perceive that they either expressly or by implication extend to almost every thing about which any legislative power can be employed. But if this equitable mode of construction is applied to this part of the constitution; nothing can stand before it.

This will certainly give the first clause in that article a construction which I confess I think the most natural and grammatical one, to authorise the Congress to do any thing which in their judgment will tend to provide for the general welfare, and this amounts to the same thing as general and unlimited powers of legislation in all cases.

(To be continued.)

XII
14 February 1788

(Continued from last Thursday's paper.)

2.9.153 This same manner of explaining the constitution, will fix a meaning, and a very important one too, to the 12th [18th?] clause of the same section, which authorises the Congress to make all laws which shall be proper and necessary for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, &c. A voluminous writer in favor of this system, has taken great pains to convince the public, that this clause means nothing: for that the same powers expressed in this, are implied in other parts of the constitution.[98] Perhaps it is so, but still this will undoubtedly be an excellent auxilliary to assist the courts to discover the spirit and reason of the constitution, and when applied to any and every of the other clauses granting power, will operate powerfully in extracting the spirit from them.

2.9.154 I might instance a number of clauses in the constitution, which, if explained in an equitable manner, would extend the powers of the government to every case, and reduce the state legislatures to nothing; but, I should draw out my remarks to an undue length, and I presume enough has been said to shew, that the courts have sufficient ground in the exercise of this power, to determine, that the legislature have no bounds set to them by this constitution, by any supposed right the legislatures of the respective states may have, to regulate any of their local concerns.

2.9.155 I proceed, 2d, To inquire, in what manner this power will increase the jurisdiction of the courts.

I would here observe, that the judicial power extends, expressly, to all civil cases that may arise save such as arise between citizens of the same state, with this exception to those of that description, that the judicial of the United States have cognizance of cases between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states. Nothing more, therefore, is necessary to give the courts of law, under this constitution, complete jurisdiction of all civil causes, but to comprehend cases between citizens of the same state not included in the foregoing exception.

2.9.156 I presume there will be no difficulty in accomplishing this. Nothing more is necessary than to set forth, in the process, that the party who brings the suit is a citizen of a different state from the one against whom the suit is brought, and there can be little doubt but that the court will take cognizance of the matter, and if they do, who is to restrain them?[99] Indeed, I will freely confess, that it is my decided opinion, that the courts ought to take cognizance of such causes, under the powers of the constitution. For one of the great ends of the constitution is, "to establish justice." This supposes that this cannot be done under the existing governments of the states; and there is certainly as good reason why individuals, living in the same state, should have justice, as those who live in different states. Moreover, the constitution expressly declares, that "the citizens of each state shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." It will therefore be no fiction, for a citizen of one state to set forth, in a suit, that he is a citizen of another; for he that is entitled to all the privileges and immunities of a country, is a citizen of that country. And in truth, the citizen of one state will, under this constitution, be a citizen of every state.

But supposing that the party, who alledges that he is a citizen of another state, has recourse to fiction in bringing in his suit, it is well known, that the courts have high authority to plead, to justify them in suffering actions to be brought before them by such fictions. In my last number I stated, that the court of exchequer tried all causes in virtue of such a fiction. The court of king's bench, in England, extended their jurisdiction in the same way. Originally, this court held pleas, in civil cases, only of trespasses and other injuries alledged to be committed vi et armis. They might likewise, says Blackstone,[100] upon the division of the aula regia, have originally held pleas of any other civil action whatsoever (except in real actions which are now very seldom in use) provided the defendant was an officer of the court, or in the custody of the marshall or prison-keeper of this court, for breach of the peace, &c. In process of time, by a fiction, this court began to hold pleas of any personal action whatsoever; it being surmised, that the defendant has been arrested for a supposed trespass that "he has never committed, and being thus in the custody of the marshall of the court, the plaintiff is at liberty to proceed against him, for any other personal injury: which surmise of being in the marshall's custody, the defendant is not at liberty to dispute." By a much less fiction, may the pleas of the courts of the United States extend to cases between citizens of the same state. I shall add no more on this head, but proceed briefly to remark, in what way this power will diminish and destroy both the legislative and judicial authority of the states. 2.9.157

It is obvious that these courts will have authority to decide upon the validity of the laws of any of the states, in all cases where they come in question before them. Where the constitution gives the general government exclusive jurisdiction, they will adjudge all laws made by the states, in such cases, void ab initio. Where the constitution gives them concurrent jurisdiction, the laws of the United States must prevail, because they are the supreme law. In such cases, therefore, the laws of the state legislatures must be repealed, restricted, or so construed, as to give full effect to the laws of the union on the same subject. From these remarks it is easy to see, that in proportion as the general government acquires power and jurisdiction, by the liberal construction which the judges may give the constitution, will those of the states lose its rights, until they become so trifling and unimportant, as not to be worth having. I am much mistaken, if this system will not operate to effect this with as much celerity, as those who have the 2.9.158 administration of it will think prudent to suffer it. The remaining objections to the judicial power shall be considered in a future paper.

Brutus.

XIII

21 February 1788

2.9.159 Having in the two preceding numbers, examined the nature and tendency of the judicial power, as it respects the explanation of the constitution, I now proceed to the consideration of the other matters, of which it has cognizance.—The next paragraph extends its authority, to all cases, in law and equity, arising under the laws of the United States. This power, as I understand it, is a proper one. The proper province of the judicial power, in any government, is, as I conceive, to declare what is the law of the land.[101] To explain and enforce those laws, which the supreme power or legislature may pass; but not to declare what the powers of the legislature are. I suppose the cases in equity, under the laws, must be so construed, as to give the supreme court not only a legal, but equitable jurisdiction of cases which may be brought before them, or in other words, so, as to give them, not only the powers which are now exercised by our courts of law, but those also, which are now exercised by our court of chancery. If this be the meaning, I have no other objection to the power, than what arises from the undue extension of the legislative power. For, I conceive that the judicial power should be commensurate with the legislative. Or, in other words, the supreme court should have authority to determine questions arising under the laws of the union.

2.9.160 The next paragraph which gives a power to decide in law and equity, on all cases arising under treaties, is unintelligible to me. I can readily comprehend what is meant by deciding a case under a treaty. For as treaties will be the law of the land, every person who have rights or privileges secured by treaty, will have aid of the courts of law, in recovering them. But I do not understand, what is meant by equity arising under a treaty. I presume every right which can be claimed under a treaty, must be claimed by virtue of some article or clause contained in it, which gives the right in plain and obvious words; or at least, I conceive, that the rules for explaining treaties, are so well ascertained, that there is no need of having recourse to an equitable construction. If under this power, the courts are to explain treaties, according to what they conceive are their spirit, which is nothing less than a power to give them whatever extension they may judge proper, it is a dangerous and improper power. The cases affecting ambassadors, public ministers, and consuls—of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; controversies to which the United States are a party, and controversies between states, it is proper should be under the cognizance of the courts of the union, because none but the general government, can, or ought to pass laws on their subjects. But, I conceive the clause which extends the power of the judicial to controversies arising between a state and citizens of another state, improper in itself, and will, in its exercise, prove most pernicious and destructive.

It is improper, because it subjects a state to answer in a court of law, to the suit of an individual.[102] This is humiliating and degrading to a government, and, what I believe, the supreme authority of no state ever submitted to. 2.9.161

The states are now subject to no such actions. All contracts entered into by individuals with states, were made upon the faith and credit of the states; and the individuals never had in contemplation any compulsory mode of obliging the government to fulfil its engagements.

The evil consequences that will flow from the exercise of this power, will best appear by tracing it in its operation. The constitution does not direct the mode in which an individual shall commence a suit against a state or the manner in which the judgement of the court shall be carried into execution, but it gives the legislature full power to pass all laws which shall be proper and necessary for the purpose. And they certainly must make provision for these purposes, or otherwise the power of the judicial will be nugatory. For, to what purpose will the power of a judicial be, if they have no mode, in which they can call the parties before them? Or of what use will it be, to call the parties to answer, if after they have given judgement, there is no authority to execute the judgment? We must, therefore, conclude, that the legislature will pass laws which will be effectual in this head. An individual of one state will then have a legal remedy against a state for any demand he may have against a state to which he does not belong. Every state in the union is largely indebted to individuals. For the payment of these debts they have given notes payable to the bearer. At least this is the case in this state. Whenever a citizen of another state becomes possessed of one of these notes, he may commence an action in the supreme court of the general government; and I cannot see any way in which he can be prevented from recovering. It is easy to see, that when this once happens, the notes of the state will pass rapidly from the hands of citizens of the state to those of other states. 2.9.162

And when the citizens of other states possess them, they may bring suits against the state for them, and by this means, judgments and executions may be obtained against the state for the whole amount of the state debt. It is certain the state, with the utmost exertions it can make, will not be able to discharge the debt she owes, under a considerable number of years, perhaps with the best management, it will require twenty or thirty years to discharge it. This new system will protract the time in which the ability of the state will 2.9.163 enable them to pay off their debt, because all the funds of the state will be transferred to the general government, except those which arise from internal taxes.

2.9.164 The situation of the states will be deplorable. By this system, they will surrender to the general government, all the means of raising money, and at the same time, will subject themselves to suits at law, for the recovery of the debts they have contracted in effecting the revolution.

The debts of the individual states will amount to a sum, exceeding the domestic debt of the United States; these will be left upon them, with power in the judicial of the general government, to enforce their payment, while the general government will possess an exclusive command of the most productive funds, from which the states can derive money, and a command of every other source of revenue paramount to the authority of any state.

2.9.165 It may be said that the apprehension that the judicial power will operate in this manner is merely visionary, for that the legislature will never pass laws that will work these effects. Or if they were disposed to do it, they cannot provide for levying an execution on a state, for where will the officer find property whereon to levy?

To this I would reply, if this is a power which will not or cannot be executed, it was useless and unwise to grant it to the judicial. For what purpose is a power given which it is imprudent or impossible to exercise? If it be improper for a government to exercise a power, it is improper they should be vested with it. And it is unwise to authorise a government to do what they cannot effect.

2.9.166 As to the idea that the legislature cannot provide for levying an execution on a state, I believe it is not well founded. I presume the last paragraph of the 8th section of article 1, gives the Congress express power to pass any laws they may judge proper and necessary for carrying into execution the power vested in the judicial department. And they must exercise this power, or otherwise the courts of justice will not be able to carry into effect the authorities with which they are invested. For the constitution does not direct the mode in which the courts are to proceed, to bring parties before them, to try causes, or to carry the judgment of the courts into execution. Unless they are pointed out by law, how are these to proceed, in any of the cases of which they have cognizance? They have the same authority to establish regulations in respect to these matters, where a state is a party, as where an individual is a party. The only difficulty is, on whom shall process be served, when a state is a party, and how shall execution be levied. With regard to the first, the way is easy, either the executive or legislative of the state may be notified, and upon proof being made of the service of the notice, the court may proceed to a hearing of the cause. Execution may be levied on any property of the state, either real or personal. The treasury may be seized by the officers of the general government, or any lands the property of the state, may be made subject to seizure and sale to satisfy any judgment against it. Whether the estate of any individual citizen may not be made answerable for the discharge of judgments against the state, may be worth consideration. In some corporations this is the case.

If the power of the judicial under this clause will extend to the cases above stated, it will, if executed, produce the utmost confusion, and in its progress, will crush the states beneath its weight. And if it does not extend to these cases, I confess myself utterly at a loss to give it any meaning. For if the citizen of one state, possessed of a written obligation, given in pursuance of a solemn act of the legislature, acknowledging a debt due to the bearer, and promising to pay it, cannot recover in the supreme court, I can conceive of no case in which they can recover. And it appears to me ridiculous to provide for obtaining judgment against a state, without giving the means of levying execution. 2.9.167

Brutus.

XIV

28 February 1788

The second paragraph of sect. 2d. art. 3, is in these words: "In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the Congress shall make.["] 2.9.168

Although it is proper that the courts of the general government should have cognizance of all matters affecting ambassadors, foreign ministers, and consuls; yet I question much the propriety of giving the supreme court original jurisdiction in all cases of this kind.

Ambassadors, and other public ministers, claim, and are entitled by the law of nations, to certain privileges, and exemptions, both for their persons and their servants.

The meanest servant of an ambassador is exempted by the law of nations from being sued for debt. Should a suit be brought against such an one by a citizen, through inadvertency or want of information, he will be subject to an action in the supreme court. All the officers concerned in issuing or executing the process will be liable to like actions. Thus may a citizen of a state be compelled, at great expence and inconveniency, to defend himself against a suit, brought against him in the supreme court, for inadvertently commencing an action against the most menial servant of an ambassador for a just debt. 2.9.169

The appellate jurisdiction granted to the supreme court, in this paragraph, has justly been considered as one of the most objectionable parts of the constitution: under this power, appeals may be had from the inferior courts to the supreme, in every case to which the judicial power extends, except in the few instances in which the supreme court will have original jurisdiction.

2.9.170 By this article, appeals will lie to the supreme court, in all criminal as well as civil causes. This I know, has been disputed by some; but I presume the point will appear clear to any one, who will attend to the connection of this paragraph with the one that precedes it. In the former, all the cases, to which the power of the judicial shall extend, whether civil or criminal, are enumerated. There is no criminal matter, to which the judicial power of the United States will extend; but such as are included under some one of the cases specified in this section. For this section is intended to define all the cases, of every description, to which the power of the judicial shall reach. But in all these cases it is declared, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, except in those which affect ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party. If then this section extends the power of the judicial, to criminal cases, it allows appeals in such cases. If the power of the judicial is not extended to criminal matters by this section, I ask, by what part of this system does it appear, that they have any cognizance of them?

2.9.171 I believe it is a new and unusual thing to allow appeals in criminal matters. It is contrary to the sense of our laws, and dangerous to the lives and liberties of the citizen. As our law now stands, a person charged with a crime has a right to a fair and impartial trial by a jury of his country [county?], and their verdict is final. If he is acquitted no other court can call upon him to answer for the same crime. But by this system, a man may have had ever so fair a trial, have been acquitted by ever so respectable a jury of his country; and still the officer of the government who prosecutes, may appeal to the supreme court. The whole matter may have a second hearing. By this means, persons who may have disobliged those who execute the general government, may be subjected to intolerable oppression. They may be kept in long and ruinous confinement, and exposed to heavy and insupportable charges, to procure the attendence of witnesses, and provide the means of their defence, at a great distance from their places of residence.

2.9.172 I can scarcely believe there can be a considerate citizen of the United States, that will approve of this appellate jurisdiction, as extending to criminal cases, if they will give themselves time for reflection.

Whether the appellate jurisdiction as it respects civil matters, will not prove injurious to the rights of the citizens, and destructive of those privileges which have ever been held sacred by Americans, and whether it will not render the administration of justice intolerably burthensome, intricate, and dilatory, will best appear, when we have considered the nature and operation of this power.

2.9.173 It has been the fate of this clause, as it has of most of those, against which unanswerable objections have been offered, to be explained different ways, by the advocates and opponents to the constitution. I confess I do not know what the advocates of the system, would make it mean, for I have not been fortunate enough to see in any publication this clause taken up and considered. It is certain however, they do not admit the explanation which those who oppose the constitution give it, or otherwise they would not so frequently charge them with want of candor, for alledging that it takes away the trial by jury[;] appeals from an inferior to a superior court, as practised in the civil law courts, are well understood. In these courts, the judges determine both on the law and the fact; and appeals are allowed from the inferior to the superior courts, on the whole merits: the superior tribunal will re-examine all the facts as well as the law, and frequently new facts will be introduced, so as many times to render the cause in the court of appeals very different from what it was in the court below.

If the appellate jurisdiction of the supreme court, be understood in the above sense, the term is perfectly intelligible. The meaning then is, that in all the civil causes enumerated, the supreme court shall have authority to re-examine the whole merits of the case, both with respect to the facts and the law which may arise under it, without the intervention of a jury; that this is the sense of this part of the system appears to me clear, from the express words of it, "in all the other cases before mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, &c." Who are the supreme court? Does it not consist of the judges? and they are to have the same jurisdiction of the fact as they are to have of the law. They will therefore have the same authority to determine the fact as they will have to determine the law, and no room is left for a jury on appeals to the supreme court. 2.9.174

If we understand the appellate jurisdiction in any other way, we shall be left utterly at a loss to give it a meaning; the common law is a stranger to any such jurisdiction: no appeals can lie from any of our common law courts, upon the merits of the case; the only way in which they can go up from an inferior to a superior tribunal is by habeas corpus before a hearing, or by certiorari, or writ of error, after they are determined in the subordinate courts; but in no case, when they are carried up, are the facts re-examined, but they are always taken as established in the inferior courts.[103] 2.9.175

(To be continued.)

XIV

6 March 1788

(Continued.)

It may still be insisted that this clause does not take away the trial by jury on appeals, but that this may be provided for by the legislature, under that 2.9.176 paragraph which authorises them to form regulations and restrictions for the court in the exercise of this power.

The natural meaning of this paragraph seems to be no more than this, that Congress may declare, that certain cases shall not be subject to the appellate jurisdiction, and they may point out the mode in which the court shall proceed in bringing up the causes before them, the manner of their taking evidence to establish the facts, and the method of the courts proceeding. But I presume they cannot take from the court the right of deciding on the fact, any more than they can deprive them of the right of determining on the law, when a cause is once before them; for they have the same jurisdiction as to fact, as they have as to the law. But supposing the Congress may under this clause establish the trial by jury on appeals, it[104] does not seem to me that it will render this article much less exceptionable. An appeal from one court and jury, to another court and jury, is a thing altogether unknown in the laws of our state, and in most of the states in the union. A practice of this kind prevails in the eastern states; actions are there commenced in the inferior courts, and an appeal lies from them on the whole merits to the superior courts: the consequence is well known, very few actions are determined in the lower courts; it is rare that a case of any importance is not carried by appeal to the supreme court, and the jurisdiction of the inferior courts is merely nominal; this has proved so burthensome to the people in Massachusetts, that it was one of the principal causes which excited the insurrection in that state, in the year past; very few sensible and moderate men in that state but what will admit, that the inferior courts are almost entirely useless, and answer very little purpose, save only to accumulate costs against the poor debtors who are already unable to pay their just debts.

2.9.177 But the operation of the appellate power in the supreme judicial of the United States, would work infinitely more mischief than any such power can do in a single state.

The trouble and expence to the parties would be endless and intolerable. No man can say where the supreme court are to hold their sessions, the presumption is, however, that it must be at the seat of the general government: in this case parties must travel many hundred miles, with their witnesses and lawyers, to prosecute or defend a suit; no man of midling fortune, can sustain the expence of such a law suit, and therefore the poorer and midling class of citizens will be under the necessity of submitting to the demands of the rich and the lordly, in cases that will come under the cognizance of this court. If it be said, that to prevent this oppression, the supreme court will set in different parts of the union, it may be replied, that this would only make the oppression somewhat more tolerable, but by no means so much as to give a chance of justice to the poor and midling class. It is utterly impossible that the supreme court can move into so many different parts of the Union, as to make it convenient or even tolerable to attend before them with witnesses to try causes from every part of the United states; if to avoid the expence and inconvenience of calling witnesses from a great distance, to give evidence before the supreme court, the expedient of taking the deposition of witnesses in writing should be adopted, it would not help the matter. It is of great importance in the distribution of justice that witnesses should be examined face to face, that the parties should have the fairest opportunity of cross examining them in order to bring out the whole truth; there is something in the manner in which a witness delivers his testimony which cannot be committed to paper, and which yet very frequently gives a complexion to his evidence, very different from what it would bear if committed to writing, besides the expence of taking written testimony would be enormous; those who are acquainted with the costs that arise in the courts, where all the evidence is taken in writing, well know that they exceed beyond all comparison those of the common law courts, where witnesses are examined viva voce.

The costs accruing in courts generally advance with the grade of the court; thus the charges attending a suit in our common pleas, is much less than those in the supreme court, and these are much lower than those in the court of chancery; indeed the costs in the last mentioned court, are in many cases so exorbitant and the proceedings so dilatory that the suitor had almost as well give up his demand as to prosecute his suit. We have just reason to suppose, that the costs in the supreme general court will exceed either of our courts; the officers of the general court will be more dignified than those of the states, the lawyers of the most ability will practice in them, and the trouble and expence of attending them will be greater. From all these considerations, it appears, that the expence attending suits in the supreme court will be so great, as to put it out of the power of the poor and midling class of citizens to contest a suit in it. 2.9.178

From these remarks it appears, that the administration of justice under the powers of the judicial will be dilatory; that it will be attended with such an heavy expence as to amount to little short of a denial of justice to the poor and middling class of people who in every government stand most in need of the protection of the law; and that the trial by jury, which has so justly been the boast of our fore fathers as well as ourselves is taken away under them. 2.9.179

These extraordinary powers in this court are the more objectionable, because there does not appear the least necessity for them, in order to secure a due and impartial distribution of justice.

The want of ability or integrity, or a disposition to render justice to every suitor, has not been objected against the courts of the respective states: so far as I have been informed, the courts of justice in all the states, have ever been found ready, to administer justice with promptitude and impartiality according to the laws of the land; It is true in some of the states, paper money has been made, and the debtor authorised to discharge his debts with 2.9.180 it, at a depreciated value, in orders, tender laws have been passed, obliging the creditor to receive on execution other property than money in discharge of his demand, and in several of the states laws have been made unfavorable to the creditor and tending to render property insecure.

2.9.181 But these evils have not happened from any defect in the judicial departments of the states; the courts indeed are bound to take notice of these laws, and so will the courts of the general government be under obligation to observe the laws made by the general legislature not repugnant to the constitution; but so far have the judicial been from giving undue latitude of construction to laws of this kind, that they have invariably strongly inclined to the other side. All the acts of our legislature, which have been charged with being of this complexion, have uniformly received the strictest construction by the judges, and have been extended to no cases but to such as came within the strict letter of the law. In this way, have our courts, I will not say evaded the law, but so limited it in its operation as to work the least possible injustice: the same thing has taken place in Rhode-Island, which has justly rendered herself infamous, by her tenaciously adhering to her paper money system. The judges there gave a decision, in opposition to the words of the Statute, on this principle, that a construction according to the words of it, would contradict the fundamental maxims of their laws and constitution.[105]

2.9.182 No pretext therefore, can be formed, from the conduct of the judicial courts which will justify giving such powers to the supreme general court, for their decisions have been such as to give just ground of confidence in them, that they will firmly adhere to the principles of rectitude, and there is no necessity of lodging these powers in the courts, in order to guard against the evils justly complained of, on the subject of security of property under this constitution. For it has provided, "that no state shall emit bills of credit, or make any thing but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." It has also declared, that "no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."—These prohibitions give the most perfect security against those attacks upon property which I am sorry to say some of the states have but too wantonly made, by passing laws sanctioning fraud in the debtor against his creditor. For "this constitution will be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state will be bound thereby; any thing in the constitution and laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."

2.9.183 The courts of the respective states might therefore have been securely trusted, with deciding all cases between man and man, whether citizens of the same state or of different states, or between foreigners and citizens, and indeed for ought I see every case that can arise under the constitution or laws of the United States, ought in the first instance to be tried in the court of the state, except those which might arise between states, such as respect ambassadors, or other public ministers, and perhaps such as call in question the claim of lands under grants from different states. The state courts would be under sufficient controul, if writs of error were allowed from the state courts to the supreme court of the union, according to the practice of the courts in England and of this state, on all cases in which the laws of the union are concerned, and perhaps to all cases in which a foreigner is a party.

This method would preserve the good old way of administering justice, 2.9.184 would bring justice to every man's door, and preserve the inestimable right of trial by jury. It would be following, as near as our circumstances will admit, the practice of the courts in England, which is almost the only thing I would wish to copy in their government.

But as this system now stands, there is to be as many inferior courts as Congress may see fit to appoint, who are to be authorised to originate and in the first instance to try all the cases falling under the description of this article; there is no security that a trial by jury shall be had in these courts, but the trial here will soon become, as it is in Massachusetts' inferior courts, mere matter of form; for an appeal may be had to the supreme court on the whole merits. This court is to have power to determine in law and in equity, on the law and the fact, and this court is exalted above all other power in the government, subject to no controul, and so fixed as not to be removeable, but upon impeachment, which I shall hereafter shew, is much the same thing as not to be removeable at all.

To obviate the objections made to the judicial power it has been said, that 2.9.185 the Congress, in forming the regulations and exceptions which they are authorised to make respecting the appellate jurisdiction, will make provision against all the evils which are apprehended from this article. On this I would remark, that this way of answering the objection made to the power, implies an admission that the power is in itself improper without restraint, and if so, why not restrict it in the first instance.

The just way of investigating any power given to a government, is to examine its operation supposing it to be put in exercise. If upon enquiry, it appears that the power, if exercised, would be prejudicial, it ought not to be given. For to answer objections made to a power given to a government, by saying it will never be exercised, is really admitting that the power ought not to be exercised, and therefore ought not to be granted.

Brutus.

XV
20 March 1788

(Continued.)[106]

I said in my last number, that the supreme court under this constitution 2.9.186 would be exalted above all other power in the government, and subject to no controul. The business of this paper will be to illustrate this, and to shew the danger that will result from it. I question whether the world ever saw, in any period of it, a court of justice invested with such immense powers, and yet placed in a situation so little responsible. Certain it is, that in England, and in the several states, where we have been taught to believe, the courts of law are put upon the most prudent establishment, they are on a very different footing.

2.9.187 The judges in England, it is true, hold their offices during their good behaviour, but then their determinations are subject to correction by the house of lords; and their power is by no means so extensive as that of the proposed supreme court of the union.—I believe they in no instance assume the authority to set aside an act of parliament under the idea that it is inconsistent with their constitution. They consider themselves bound to decide according to the existing laws of the land, and never undertake to controul them by adjudging that they are inconsistent with the constitution—much less are they vested with the power of giving an equitable construction to the constitution.

2.9.188 The judges in England are under the controul of the leigislature, for they are bound to determine according to the laws passed by them. But the judges under this constitution will controul the legislature, for the supreme court are authorised in the last resort,[107] to determine what is the extent of the powers of the Congress; they are to give the constitution an explanation, and there is no power above them to set[108] aside their judgment. The framers of this constitution appear to have followed that of the British, in rendering the judges independent, by granting them their offices during good behaviour, without following the constitution of England, in instituting a tribunal in which their errors may be corrected; and without adverting to this, that the judicial under this system have a power which is above the legislative, and which indeed transcends any power before given to a judicial by any free government under heaven.

2.9.189 I do not object to the judges holding their commissions during good behaviour. I suppose it a proper provision provided they were made properly responsible. But I say, this system has followed the English government in this, while it has departed from almost every other principle of their jurisprudence, under the idea, of rendering the judges independent; which, in the British constitution, means no more than that they hold their places during good behaviour, and have fixed salaries, they have made the judges independent, in the fullest sense of the word. There is no power above them, to controul any of their decisions. There is no authority that can remove them, and they cannot be controuled by the laws of the legislature. In short, they are independent of the people, of the legislature, and of every power under heaven. Men placed in this situation will generally soon feel themselves independent of heaven itself. Before I proceed to illustrate the truth of these assertions, I beg liberty to make one remark—Though in my opinion the judges ought to hold their offices during good behaviour, yet I think it is clear, that the reasons in favour of this establishment of the judges in England, do by no means apply to this country.

The great reason assigned, why the judges in Britain ought to be commissioned during good behaviour, is this, that they may be placed in a situation, not to be influenced by the crown, to give such decisions, as would tend to increase its powers and prerogatives. While the judges held their places at the will and pleasure of the king, on whom they depended not only for their offices, but also for their salaries, they were subject to every undue influence. If the crown wished to carry a favorite point, to accomplish which the aid of the courts of law was necessary, the pleasure of the king would be signified to the judges. And it required the spirit of a martyr, for the judges to determine contrary to the king's will.—They were absolutely dependent upon him both for their offices and livings. The king, holding his office during life, and transmitting it to his posterity as an inheritance, has much stronger inducements to increase the prerogatives of his office than those who hold their offices for stated periods, or even for life. Hence the English nation gained a great point, in favour of liberty. When they obtained the appointment of the judges, during good behaviour, they got from the crown a concession, which deprived it of one of the most powerful engines with which it might enlarge the boundaries of the royal prerogative and encroach on the liberties of the people. But these reasons do not apply to this country, we have no hereditary monarch; those who appoint the judges do not hold their offices for life, nor do they descend to their children. The same arguments, therefore, which will conclude in favor of the tenor of the judge's offices for good behaviour, lose a considerable part of their weight when applied to the state and condition of America. But much less can it be shewn, that the nature of our government requires that the courts should be placed beyond all account more independent, so much so as to be above controul. 2.9.190

I have said that the judges under this system will be independent in the strict sense of the word: To prove this I will shew—That there is no power above them that can controul their decisions, or correct their errors. There is no authority that can remove them from office for any errors or want of capacity, or lower their salaries, and in many cases their power is superior to that of the legislature. 2.9.191

1st. There is no power above them that can correct their errors or controul their decisions—The adjudications of this court are final and irreversible, for there is no court above them to which appeals can lie, either in error or on the merits.—In this respect it differs from the courts in England, for there the house of lords is the highest court, to whom appeals, in error, are carried from the highest of the courts of law.

2d. They cannot be removed from office or suffer a dimunition of their salaries, for any error in judgement or want of capacity. 2.9.192

It is expressly declared by the constitution,—"That they shall at stated times receive a compensation for their services which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

The only clause in the constitution which provides for the removal of the judges from office, is that which declares, that "the president, vice-president, and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office, on impeachment for, and conviction of treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors." By this paragraph, civil officers, in which the judges are included, are removable only for crimes. Treason and bribery are named, and the rest are included under the general terms of high crimes and misdemeanors.—Errors in judgement, or want of capacity to discharge the duties of the office, can never be supposed to be included in these words, high crimes and misdemeanors. A man may mistake a case in giving judgment, or manifest that he is incompetent to the discharge of the duties of a judge, and yet give no evidence of corruption or want of integrity. To support the charge, it will be necessary to give in evidence some facts that will shew, that the judges commited the error from wicked and corrupt motives.

2.9.193 3d. The power of this court is in many cases superior to that of the legislature. I have shewed, in a former paper, that this court will be authorised to decide upon the meaning of the constitution, and that, not only according to the natural and ob[vious] meaning of the words, but also according to the spirit and intention of it.[109] In the exercise of this power they will not be subordinate to, but above the legislature. For all the departments of this government will receive their powers, so far as they are expressed in the constitution, from the people immediately, who are the source of power. The legislature can only exercise such powers as are given them by the constitution, they cannot assume any of the rights annexed to the judicial, for this plain reason, that the same authority which vested the legislature with their powers, vested the judicial with theirs—both are derived from the same source, both therefore are equally valid, and the judicial hold their powers independently of the legislature, as the legislature do of the judicial.—The supreme cort then have a right, independent of the legislature, to give a construction to the constitution and every part of it, and there is no power provided in this system to correct their construction or do it away. If, therefore, the legislature pass any laws, inconsistent with the sense the judges put upon the constitution, they will declare it void; and therefore in this respect their power is superior to that of the legislature.[110] In England the judges are not only subject to have their decisions set aside by the house of lords, for error, but in cases where they give an explanation to the laws or constitution of the country, contrary to the sense of the parliament, though the parliament will not set aside the judgement of the court, yet, they have authority, by a new law, to explain a former one, and by this means to prevent a reception of such decisions. But no such power is in the legislature. The judges are supreme—and no law, explanatory of the constitution, will be binding on them.

From the preceding remarks, which have been made on the judicial powers proposed in this system, the policy of it may be fully developed.

I have, in the course of my observation on this constitution, affirmed and endeavored to shew, that it was calculated to abolish entirely the state governments, and to melt down the states into one entire government, for every purpose as well internal and local, as external and national. In this opinion the opposers of the system have generally agreed—and this has been uniformly denied by its advocates in public. Some individuals, indeed, among them, will confess, that it has this tendency, and scruple not to say, it is what they wish; and I will venture to predict, without the spirit of prophecy, that if it is adopted[111] without amendments, or some such precautions as will ensure amendments immediately after its adoption, that the same gentlemen who have employed their talents and abilities with such success to influence the public mind to adopt this plan, will employ the same to persuade the people, that it will be for their good to abolish the state governments as useless and burdensome. 2.9.194

Perhaps nothing could have been better conceived to facilitate the abolition of the state governments than the constitution of the judicial. They will be able to extend the limits of the general government gradually, and by insensible degrees, and to accomodate themselves to the temper of the people. Their decisions on the meaning of the constitution will commonly take place in cases which arise between individuals, with which the public will not be generally acquainted; one adjudication will form a precedent to the next, and this to a following one. These cases will immediately affect individuals only; so that a series of determinations will probably take place before even the people will be informed of them. In the mean time all the art and address of those who wish for the change will be employed to make converts to their opinion. The people will be told, that their state officers, and state legislatures are a burden and expence without affording any solid advantage, for that all the laws passed by them, might be equally well made by the general legislature. If to those who will be interested in the change, be added, those who will be under their influence, and such who will submit to almost any change of government, which they can be persuaded to believe will ease them of taxes, it is easy to see, the party who will favor the abolition of the state governments would be far from being inconsiderable.—In this situation, the general legislature, might pass one law after another, extending the general and abridging the state jurisdictions, and to sanction their proceedings would have a course of decisions of the judicial to whom the constitution has committed the power of explaining the constitution.—If the states remonstrated, the constitutional mode of decid- 2.9.195

ing upon the validity of the law, is with the supreme court, and neither people, nor state legislatures, nor the general legislature can remove them or reverse their decrees.

2.9.196 Had the construction of the constitution been left with the legislature, they would have explained it at their peril; if they exceed their powers, or sought to find, in the spirit of the constitution, more than was expressed in the letter, the people from whom they derived their power could remove them, and do themselves right; and indeed I can see no other remedy that the people can have against their rulers for encroachments of this nature. A constitution is a compact of a people with their rulers; if the rulers break the compact, the people have a right and ought to remove them and do themselves justice; but in order to enable them to do this with the greater facility, those whom the people chuse at stated periods, should have the power in the last resort to determine the sense of the compact; if they determine contrary to the understanding of the people, an appeal will lie to the people at the period when the rulers are to be elected, and they will have it in their power to remedy the evil; but when this power is lodged in the hands of men independent of the people, and of their representatives, and who are not, constitutionally, accountable for their opinions, no way is left to controul them but with a high hand and an outstretched arm.

Brutus.

XVI

10 April 1788

2.9.197 When great and extraordinary powers are vested in any man, or body of men, which in their exercise, may operate to the oppression of the people, it is of high importance that powerful checks should be formed to prevent the abuse of it.

Perhaps no restraints are more forcible, than such as arise from responsibility to some superior power.—Hence it is that the true policy of a republican government is, to frame it in such manner, that all persons who are concerned in the government, are made accountable to some superior for their conduct in office.—This responsibility should ultimately rest with the People. To have a government well administered in all its parts, it is requisite the different departments of it should be separated and lodged as much as may be in different hands. The legislative power should be in one body, the executive in another, and the judicial in one different from either—But still each of these bodies should be accountable for their conduct.[112] Hence it is impracticable, perhaps, to maintain a perfect distinction between these several departments—For it is difficult, if not impossible, to call to account the several officers in government, without in some degree mixing the legislative and judicial. The legislature in a free republic are chosen[113] by the people at stated periods, and their responsibility consists, in their being amenable to the people. When the term, for which they are chosen, shall expire, who will then have opportunity to displace them if they disapprove of their conduct—but it would be improper that the judicial should be elective, because their business requires that they should possess a degree of law knowledge, which is acquired only by a regular education, and besides it is fit that they should be placed, in a certain degree in an independent situation, that they may maintain firmness and steadiness in their decisions.[114] As the people therefore ought not to elect the judges, they cannot be amenable to them immediately, some other mode of amenability must therefore be devised for these, as well as for all other officers which do not spring from the immediate choice of the people: this is to be effected by making one court subordinate to another, and by giving them cognizance of the behaviour of all officers; but on this plan we at last arrive at some supreme, over whom there is no power to controul but the people themselves. This supreme controling power should be in the choice of the people, or else you establish an authority independent, and not amenable at all, which is repugnant to the principles of a free government. Agreeable to these principles I suppose the supreme judicial ought to be liable to be called to account, for any misconduct, by some body of men, who depend upon the people for their places; and so also should all other great officers in the State, who are not made amenable to some superior officers. This policy seems in some measure to have been in view of the framers of the new system, and to have given rise to the institution of a court of impeachments—How far this Court will be properly qualified to execute the trust which will be reposed in them, will be the business of a future paper to investigate. To prepare the way to do this, it shall be the business of this, to make some remarks upon the constitution and powers of the Senate, with whom the power of trying impeachments is lodged.

The following things may be observed with respect to the constitution of the Senate. 2.9.198

1st. They are to be elected by the legislatures of the States and not by the people, and each State is to be represented by an equal number.

2d. They are to serve for six years, except that one third of those first chosen are to go out of office at the expiration of two years, one third at the expiration of four years, and one third at the expiration of six years, after which this rotation is to be preserved, but still every member will serve for the term of six years.

3d. If vacancies happen by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the legislature of any State, the executive is authorised to make temporary appointments until the next meeting of the legislature.

4. No person can be a senator who has not arrived to the age of thirty years, been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who is not at the time he is elected an inhabitant of the State for which he is elected.

2.9.199 The apportionment of members of Senate among the States is not according to numbers, or the importance of the States; but is equal. This, on the plan of a consolidated government, is unequal and improper; but is proper on the system of confederation—on this principle I approve of it.[115] It is indeed the only feature of any importance in the constitution of a confederated government. It was obtained after a vigorous struggle of that part of the Convention who were in favor of preserving the state governments. It is to be regretted, that they were not able to have infused other principles into the plan, to have secured the government of the respective states, and to have marked with sufficient precision the line between them and the general government.

2.9.200 The term for which the senate are to be chosen, is in my judgment too long, and no provision being made for a rotation will, I conceive, be of dangerous consequence.

It is difficult to fix the precise period for which the senate should be chosen. It is a matter of opinion, and our sentiments on the matter must be formed, by attending to certain principles. Some of the duties which are to be performed by the senate, seem evidently to point out the propriety of their term of service being extended beyond the period of that of the assembly. Besides as they are designed to represent the aristocracy of the country, it seems fit they should possess more stability, and so continue a longer period than that branch who represent the democracy. The business of making treaties and some other which it will be proper to commit to the senate, requires that they should have experience, and therefore that they should remain some time in office to acquire it.—But still it is of equal importance that they should not be so long in office as to be likely to forget the hand that formed them, or be insensible of their interests. Men long in office are very apt to feel themselves independent [and] to form and pursue interests separate from those who appointed them. And this is more likely to be the case with the senate, as they will for the most part of the time be absent from the state they represent, and associate with such company as will possess very little of the feelings of the middling class of people. For it is to be remembered that there is to be a federal city, and the inhabitants of it will be the great and the mighty of the earth. For these reasons I would shorten the term of their service to four years. Six years is a long period for a man to be absent from his home, it would have a tendency to wean him from his constituents.

2.9.201 A rotation in the senate, would also in my opinion be of great use. It is probable that senators once chosen for a state will, as the system now stands, continue in office for life. The office will be honorable if not lucrative. The persons who occupy it will probably wish to continue in it, and therefore use all their influence and that of their friends to continue in office.—Their friends will be numerous and powerful, for they will have it in their power to confer great favors; besides it will before long be considered as disgraceful not to be re-elected. It will therefore be considered as a matter of delicacy to the character of the senator not to return him again.—Every body acquainted with public affairs knows how difficult it is to remove from office a person who is [has?] long been in it. It is seldom done except in cases of gross misconduct. It is rare that want of competent ability procures it. To prevent this inconvenience I conceive it would be wise to determine, that a senator should not be eligible after he had served for the period assigned by the constitution for a certain number of years; perhaps three would be sufficient. A farther benefit would be derived from such an arrangement; it would give opportunity to bring forward a greater number of men to serve their country, and would return those, who had served, to their state, and afford them the advantage of becoming better acquainted with the condition and politics of their constituents. It farther appears to me proper, that the legislatures should retain the right which they now hold under the confederation, of recalling their members. It seems an evident dictate of reason, that when a person authorises another to do a piece of business for him, he should retain the power to displace him, when he does not conduct according to his pleasure. This power in the state legislatures, under confederation, has not been exercised to the injury of the government, nor do I see any danger of its being so exercised under the new system. It may operate much to the public benefit.

These brief remarks are all I shall make on the organization of the senate. 2.9.202
The powers with which they are invested will require a more minute investigation.

This body will possess a strange mixture of legislative, executive and judicial powers, which in my opinion will in some cases clash with each other.

1. They are one branch of the legislature, and in this respect will possess equal powers in all cases with the house of representatives; for I consider the clause which gives the house of representatives the right of originating bills for raising a revenue as merely nominal, seeing the senate be[116] authorised to propose or concur with amendments.

2. They are a branch of the executive in the appointment of ambassadors and public ministers, and in the appointment of all other officers, not otherwise provided for; whether the forming of treaties, in which they are joined with the president, appertains to the legislative or the executive part of the government, or to neither, is not material.

3. They are part of the judicial, for they form the court of impeachments.

It has been a long established maxim, that the legislative, executive and 2.9.203 judicial departments in government should be kept distinct. It is said, I know, that this cannot be done. And therefore that this maxim is not just, or at least that it should only extend to certain leading features in a government. I admit that this distinction cannot be perfectly preserved. In a due ballanced government, it is perhaps absolutely necessary to give the executive qualified legislative powers, and the legislative or a branch of them judicial powers in the last resort. It may possibly also, in some special cases, be adviseable to associate the legislature, or a branch of it, with the executive, in the exercise of acts of great national importance. But still the maxim is a good one, and a separation of these powers should be sought as far as is practicable. I can scarcely imagine that any of the advocates of the system will pretend, that it was necessary to accumulate all these powers in the senate.

2.9.204 There is a propriety in the senate's possessing legislative powers; this is the principal end which should be held in view in their appointment. I need not here repeat what has so often and ably been advanced on the subject of a division of the legislative power into two branches—The arguments in favor of it I think conclusive. But I think it equally evident, that a branch of the legislature should not be invested with the power of appointing officers. This power in the senate is very improperly lodged for a number of reasons—These shall be detailed in a future number.[117]

Brutus.

1. This essay was replied to by Pelatiah Webster in a pamphlet, "The Weakness of Brutus Exposed," published in Philadelphia in 1787; Ford, Pamphlets 117–31.

2. Cf. Federal Farmer I, 2.8.9, whose argument Brutus follows in many respects. Jeffrey points to numerous specific similarities. University of Cincinnati Law Review 40, no. 4 (1971): 643 ff., passim, nn. 5, 10, 32, 35, 45, 60, 64.

3. The taxing power is discussed at length in essays V–VIII, 2.9.55–101.

4. See V, 2.9.60–61; cf. Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.51.

5. These powers are discussed in VIII–X, 2.9.93–129.

6. The judiciary is discussed in XI–XV, 2.4.130–96.

7. The classic exposition of the meaning of the necessary and proper clause is in The Federalist no. 33. See also Ford, Pamphlets 233–34 (Aristides), 356–57 (Iredell); McMaster and Stone 329–30 (Wilson). For other Anti-Federalist discussions of this clause see Centinel V, 2.7.97; Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.49; Old Whig II, 3.3.12; Countryman from Dutchess County 6.6.25 n. 12.

8. Beccaria, An Essay on Crimes and Punishments ch. 26, "Of the Spirit of Family in States." On editions of this work, see above, Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.97 n. 61.

9. The subject of representation is discussed at length in essays III and IV, 2.9.34–54.

10. The argument here should, of course, be compared with that of Publius in The Federalist no. 10. See also Federal Farmer VIII, 2.8.108, and Cato III, 2.6.13 n. 8.

11. Cf. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.24 n. 19; and Brutus IV, 2.9.47.

12. See IV, 2.9.48–50.

13. Cf. the discussion of the executive by Franklin in the Philadelphia Convention, Farrand I, 81–85 (2 June). Brutus does not treat the executive at any length. For the discussion by Federal Farmer, see above, XIV, 2.8.177–82. See also "The Weakness of Brutus Exposed," Ford, Pamphlets 130; and Federal Farmer XIV, 2.8.179 n. 107.

14. Cf. Federal Farmer's scheme of rights, VI, 2.8.80–86.

15. See IX, 2.9.102.

16. Brutus' argument calls to mind the more famous but fundamentally identical statement by Publius: "If men were angels, no government would be necessary. If angels were to govern men, neither external nor internal controuls on government would be necessary. In framing a government which is to be administered by men over men, the great difficulty lies in this: you must first enable the government to controul the governed; and in the next place, oblige it to controul itself." The Federalist no. 51, 349. Publius differs from Brutus in his solution of this difficulty; and to understand the Anti-Federalists it is necessary to grasp both the difference and the profound agreement upon which it rests. See IV, 2.9.45–46; XVI, 2.9.197.

17. James Wilson, "Address to Citizens of Philadelphia," McMaster and Stone 143. Wilson's argument is not the "piece of foolishness" that William Jeffrey calls it (University of Cincinnati Law Review 40, no. 4 [1971]: 681n), as is suggested by the great efforts made by the Anti-Federalists in refuting it. The fuller view is that Wilson's argument has a solid basis but is insufficient to prove that a bill of rights is unnecessary.

18. These bills of rights can be found in Thorpe, Federal and State Constitutions.

19. The quotation is from the Maryland constitution of 1776, Declaration of Rights, arts. XXII–XXIII. Virginia, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Pennsylvania had similar provisions.

20. The quotation is from the North Carolina constitution, Declaration of Rights, art. XIV. Maryland, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Virginia, and Pennsylvania had similar provisions.

21. The constitutions of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, North Carolina, New York, Massachusetts, New Hampshire had such provisions regarding the militia. The constitutions of Massachusetts, Maryland, New Hampshire prohibited the keeping up of standing armies "without the consent of the legislature." The constitutions of North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Virginia advised the avoidance of standing armies "in time of peace." See The Federalist no. 24, 153 and note; no. 26, 167–68. For Brutus' criticism of Publius on standing army, see IX, 2.9.111–14.

22. Edmund Randolph was one of the few Federalists who attempted to meet this objection (see Elliot III, 464–66), though McKean and Yeates made similar but weaker attempts in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention (McMaster and Stone 278–79, 296. For other Anti-Federal discussions of this point see, Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.51–52; XVI, 2.8.196–97; Agrippa XIV, 4.6.66; Henry 5.16.24, 36; Cincinnatus I, 6.1.4–5; Old Whig II, 3.3.7 ff.

23. Cf. Old Whig III, 3.3.15; Agrippa VI, 4.6.22 ff; One of the Common People 4.8.1 ff. For Federalist arguments, of varying penetration, that the new government will be limited by existing state bills of rights, see Ford, Pamphlets 48 (A Citizen of America), 148 (An American Citizen); Ford, Essays 398 (Williamson); McMaster and Stone 112–13 (A Citizen of Pennsylvania); New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 18 January 1788 (Alfredus); The Country Journal and the Poughkeepsie Advertiser 15 April 1788 (A Friend to Good Government); Massachusetts Centinel 28 November 1787 (One of the Middle Interest). "The State Declarations of Rights are not repealed by this Constitution," Roger Sherman said in the Philadelphia convention, "and being in force are sufficient." Farrand II, 588 (12 September).

24. The Spirit of Laws XI, ch. 6. Brutus abridges the part of Montesquieu's comment relating to representation.

25. This is not a new paragraph in the original.

26. Cf. XVI, 2.9.199, where Brutus takes a different view. The question of the apportionment of Senate seats equally among the states was one on which the Anti-Federalists were equivocal. Like Brutus, The Federal Farmer seems to have changed his mind; see above, III, 2.8.28; XI, 2.8.143. See also Martin 2.4.35, 42; Centinel I, 2.7.23; Impartial Examiner 5.14.34; Symmes 4.5.2

27. Above, II, 2.9.23–24. For references to other Anti-Federalist discussions see Federal Farmer II, 2.8.15 n. 11.

28. Cf. The Federalist nos. 35–36; for other Anti-Federalist discussions of the natural aristocracy see Federal Farmer VII, 2.8.97 n. 64.

29. Brutus probably refers to Alexander Hamilton and Gouverneur Morris and perhaps also to Nathaniel Gorham and Rufus King. Farrand I, 282–311, 381–82, 375–76, 392–93, 513–14; II, 490–91. While no one in the Convention expressed exactly the opinion Brutus describes, John Francis Mercer—an Anti-Federalist and probably the author of the essays of A [Maryland] Farmer—came close; see Farrand II, 284–85, and [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.29. Cf. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.37.

30. Essay IV, 2.9.45–54.

31. Note that Brutus does not seem to acknowledge here a possibility of a tyranny of the many; but see V, 2.9.56. Cf. Federal Farmer V, 2.8.60; Agrippa XVI, 4.6.73; [Maryland] Farmer I, 5.1.15 and n. 11; Henry 5.16.14. On the Federalist side see, in addition to The Federalist no. 10, Ford, Pamphlets 200–201 (Fabius), 354 (Marcus); Virginia Independent Chronicle 6 February 1788 (The State Soldier).

32. This is not a new paragraph in the original.

33. The original reads, "going into so an entire consolidation. . . ."

34. See below, V–X, 2.9.55–129. Many Anti-Federalists made this somewhat desperate argument. See Federal Farmer III, 2.8.34; Mason 5.17.1; Smith 6.12.9, 38–40.

35. The original reads, "and of whose talents . . . they are total strangers to. . . ."

36. Cf. The Federalist nos. 27–28.

37. Ephesians 5:29.

38. II Kings 8:13.

39. Compare Publius' different formulation of the issue, The Federalist nos. 23, 150–51; no. 31, 197. Cf. VI, 2.9.66.

40. See above, Federal Farmer XVII, 2.8.204 n. 123.

41. See Ford, Pamphlets 50–51 (A Citizen of America), and McMaster and Stone 274–75 (McKean, answering Smilie, ibid. 268–69). Cf. The Federalist no. 41. See Brutus VI, 2.9.77–78.

42. "As the duties of superintending the national defence and of securing the public peace against foreign or domestic violence, involve a provision for casualties and dangers, to which no possible limit can be assigned, the power of making that provision ought to know no other bounds than the exigencies of the nation and the resources of the community." The Federalist no. 31, 195–96, and generally nos. 30–36.

43. In addition to the discussion immediately following, Brutus treats this question in essay VI, 2.9.64–82.

44. Publius replies to this argument in The Federalist nos. 32 and 34.

45. "Money is, with propriety, considered as the vital principle of the body politic; as that which sustains its life and motion and enables it to perform its most essential functions." The Federalist no. 30, 188.

46. "This mode of reasoning," Publius argues, "appears sometimes to turn upon the suggestion of usurpation in the national government; at other times it seems to be designed only as a deduction from the constitutional operation of its intended powers. It is only in the latter light, that it can be admitted to have any pretensions to fairness. . . . [A]ll observations founded upon the danger of usurpation, ought to be referred to the composition and structure of the government, not to the nature or extent of its powers." The Federalist no. 31, 197.

47. Publius argues that there is no legal or constitutional power in either the national or the state governments to annul the taxes of the other. "And in practice there is little reason to apprehend any inconvenience; because in a short course of time the wants of the States will naturally reduce themselves within a very narrow compass; and in the interim, the United States will in all probability find it convenient to abstain wholly from those objects to which the particular States would be inclined to resort." The Federalist no. 34, 210. See above, Federal Farmer III, 2.8.39 n. 29.

48. Discussed in The Federalist no. 35, 216–18.

49. See above, n. 39.

50. No state interposition here!

51. See below, n. 84.

52. Brutus does not reach this question.

53. Matthew 6:24; Luke 16:13.

54. See Ford, Pamphlets 50 (Noah Webster). The quotation is slightly altered from the original. See above, V, 2.9.58.

55. P. 147. The statement is slightly revised from the original.

56. Publius does not quite admit this. He says: "If the circumstances of our country are such, as to demand a compound instead of a simple, a confederate instead of a sole government, the essential point which will remain to be adjusted, will be to discriminate the OBJECTS, as far as it can be done, which shall appertain to the different provinces or departments of power; allowing to each the most ample authority for fulfilling the objects committed to its charge." The Federalist no. 23 (italics added). Other Federalists were less equivocal. See for example McMaster and Stone 99 (P. Webster); Ford, Pamphlets 121–22, 128 (A Citizen of Philadelphia), 252 (Aristides); Ford, Essays 238 ff. (A Citizen of New Haven); Elliot III, 301 (Pendleton). On the critical importance of the line to be drawn between federal and state powers see Monroe 5.21.17 n. 8.

57. The Federalist no. 23, 147.

58. Cf. the forceful argument to this effect made by George Mason in the Constitutional Convention, Farrand I, 112–13 (4 June); see below, Old Whig VIII, 3.3.53–54; Philadelphiensis VI, 3.9.37–38; [Maryland] Farmer V, 5.1.82; Henry 5.16.2.

59. Publius calls the policy "of tying up the hands of government from offensive war founded upon reasons of state" a "novel and absurd experiment in politics." The Federalist no. 34, 211. See [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.4.

60. See the exchange between Roger Sherman and James Madison regarding the objects of the general government, Farrand I, 133–36 (6 June).

61. Cf. the intriguing discussion of the causes of hostilities among nations in The Federalist no. 6.

62. See above, Federal Farmer VI, 2.8.74 n. 54.

63. On the comparative merits of the administration of the state and federal governments, see The Federalist no. 27, 172–75. See below, n. 87.

64. See The Federalist no. 41, 276–77. Publius points out that the growth of imports for consumption will not grow in the same proportion as the growth of the population and economy in general. See Centinel II, 2.7.52 n. 30.

65. The space is left blank by Brutus.

66. See The Federalist no. 24; Ford, Pamphlets 51–52 (A Citizen of America), 234–35 (Aristides). Some of the more interesting of the Anti-Federal discussions of the dangers of a standing army, in addition to that of Brutus, are those of Federal Republican 3.6.21; DeWitt 4.3.9, 14, 28–29; [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.4; [Maryland] Farmer II, 5.1.33, 45–49; Impartial Examiner 5.14.8.

67. James Wilson, "Address to Citizens of Philadelphia," McMaster and Stone 145–46; The Federalist no. 24, 155–57. See also Ford, Pamphlets 234–36 (Aristides), 363–66 (Marcus); Ford, Essays 156–57 (A Landholder); McMaster and Stone 101, 107 (Pelatiah Webster), 170 (A Federalist), 373 (McKean). Other Federalists denied that a "standing army," properly speaking, is provided for. See An American Citizen [Tench Coxe], in Ford, Pamphlets 150–51.

68. Cobbett's Parliamentary History of England (London 1811), VIII (1722–33), 904–10.

69. See The Federalist no. 84; Mason 2.2.1 n. 1; Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.50 nn. 38–40.

70. See above, nn. 66, 67.

71. A Citizen of America [Noah Webster], "An Examination . . . ," Ford, Pamphlets 51–52. Compare in this connection the more subtle argument of An American Citizen [Tench Coxe] in Ford, Pamphlets 150–51.

72. See Federal Farmer X, 2.8.127 n. 80.

73. I know of no such Federalist language. James Wilson did argue in favor of the power to maintain a standing army as necessary to secure "the dignity and safety" of the country. McMaster and Stone 145–46. Publius, tough-minded as ever, admits that military force may have to turn inward: "seditions and insurrections are unhappily maladies as inseparable from the body politic, as tumours and eruptions from the natural body; that the idea of governing at all times by the simple force of law (which we have been told is the only admissible principle of republican government) has no place but in the reveries of those political doctors, whose sagacity disdains the admonitions of experimental instruction." The Federalist no. 28, 176. See above, n. 66.

The possibility of military enforcement of federal law was a major Anti-Federal concern. See for example Cato III, 2.6.17; Federal Farmer II, 2.8.23; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.50; Columbian Patriot 4.28.4.

74. Cf. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.39.

75. The Federalist no. 24, 154–55.

76. Article VI. Publius' statement is that "two only [of the State constitutions] contained an interdiction of standing armies in time of peace; that the other eleven had either observed a profound silence on the subject, or had in express terms admitted the right of the legislature to authorize their existence." The Federalist no. 24, 153–54. Publius refers in his next paper (no. 25, 159–60) to the provision in the Articles of Confederation prohibiting the states from maintaining military forces in peacetime without the consent of Congress.

77. VIII, 2.9.100–101.

78. See John Marshall, The Life of George Washington (Philadelphia 1804–7; 2d ed. 1839) IV, 74 ff.

79. The original reads, "evils."

80. The Federalist no. 24, 155–57.

81. The Federalist no. 25, 161; see Marcus [James Iredell], Ford, Pamphlets 364–65.

82. The Federalist no. 25, 162–63.

83. The Federalist no. 26, 168–69.

84. See VI, 2.9.69; Federal Farmer X, 2.8.128 n. 82; Henry, 5.16.2, 14; Smith 6.12.31. Publius agrees, indeed insists, that the states have no constitutional check on the general legislature. See The Federalist nos. 15, 16, especially p. 103. Cf. Tocqueville, Democracy in America I, ch. 8, subsection entitled "What Distinguishes the Federal Constitution of the United States of America from All Other Federal Constitutions." On the states as arms of revolution, see The Federalist no. 26, 168–69; no. 28, 178–79; no. 46, 321–22; no. 60, 404.

85. The Federalist no. 26, 169.

86. See above, essays I, III, IV, 2.9.1–21, 34–54.

87. The federal government, Publius argued two months earlier, "must carry its agency to the persons of the citizens. It must stand in need of no intermediate legislations, but must itself be empowered to employ the arm of the ordinary magistrate to execute its own resolutions. The majesty of the national authority must be manifested through the medium of the courts of justice. The government of the Union, like that of each State, must be able to address itself immediately to the hopes and fears of individuals; and to attract to its support those passions which have the strongest influence upon the human heart. It must, in short, possess all the means, and have a right to resort to all the methods, of executing the powers, with which it is intrusted, that are possessed and exercised by the governments of the particular States." The Federalist no. 16, 102–3. Jeffrey suggests that there is a contradiction between this argument and Publius' statement the next day (no. 17, 106) that the administration of private justice and other local matters can never be desirable cares of a general jurisdiction. Jeffrey thinks that the "entire performance must have been the cause of much innocent merriment among knowledgeable New Yorkers, as well as the source of considerable irritation to Federalists who had abundant reasons to feel ashamed at his sophistries and pettifogging." University of Cincinnati Law Review 40, no. 4 (1971): 739 n. 47. Careless readers may have had some such reactions, yet it is to be hoped that there were not many who came to such harsh conclusions on such slender evidence. Even on their face, the two statements of Publius are not contradictory, though it is true that their reconciliation points to further questions. These statements are, moreover, part of a larger and subtle argument by Publius looking to the eventual replacement of the state governments by the federal government in the hearts and minds of the people. The attentive reader can follow this argument in The Federalist no. 16, 102–3; no. 17, 106–7; and no. 27, 171–74. See above, Cato III, 2.6.20 n. 14; Federal Farmer XVIII, 2.8.13 n. 128. See John Smilie's keen analysis in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, McMaster and Stone 270–71. See also Smith 6.12.31.

88. See below, n. 101.

89. Cf. Publius' narrow interpretation of the "equity" jurisdiction, The Federalist no. 80, 539–40.

90. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England I, 61–62.

91. Above, I, V–X, 2.9.1–21, 55–129.

92. See I, 2.9.1–21; V, 55–63; XII, 2.9.153 ff.

93. See The Federalist no. 33, and above, n. 7.

94. The original reads, "there appears."

95. Commentaries on the Laws of England III, 45.

96. The original reads, "president."

97. Cf. The Federalist no. 78, 524–26. The power of judicial review of acts of the legislature was explicitly assumed by a number of Anti-Federalist and Federalist writers, though seldom so thoughtfully argued as by Brutus and Publius. See for example, Martin 2.4.89; Centinel XVI, 2.7.168; Ford, Pamphlets 234 (Aristides); McMaster and Stone 304–5 (Wilson). Cf. the provocative comparison of Brutus and Publius in Ann Stuart Diamond, "The Anti-Federalist Brutus," Political Science Reviewer, Fall 1976.

98. Referring, no doubt, to The Federalist, especially no. 33, 204–6, and no. 44, 302–5, both of which had been published at this time.

99. See The Federal Farmer's suggestion that fictional residence or action in the federal city may be used as the means of establishing federal jurisdiction, XVIII, 2.8.224.

100. Commentaries on the Laws of England III, 42.

101. This premise is of course also the basis of Publius' different conclusion. No. 78, 525: "The interpretation of the laws is the proper and peculiar province of the courts. A constitution is, in fact, and must be regarded by the judges as, a fundamental law. It therefore belongs to them to ascertain its meaning as well as the meaning of any particular act proceeding from the legislative body. If there should happen to be an irreconcilable variance between the two, that which has the superior obligation and validity ought, of course, to be preferred; or, in other words, the Constitution ought to be preferred to the statute, the intention of the people to the intention of their agents." The Federalist no. 78.

102. See Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419 (1793), the outcry over which led to the Eleventh Amendment.

103. See the discussion of this matter by A Democratic Federalist, below, 3.5.6, and references collected there in n. 6.

104. The original reads, "on appeals. It does not. . ."

105. Trevett v. Weeden (1786); see Frank G. Bates, Rhode Island and the Formation of the Union (New York 1898) 131–38; William W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution II, 965–68.

106. The "continued" signifies merely that the series is being continued, apparently because there was a larger than usual gap between the last essay and this one. There is no essay by Brutus in the Journal between "XIV continued," on 6 March, and this one; and this is evidently the whole of XV and not a continuation.

107. The original reads, "last report."

108. The original reads, "sit aside."

109. See XI, 2.9.130–44.

110. Publius denies that the power to declare an act of the legislature void supposes "a superiority of the judicial to the legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both, and that where the will of the legislature, declared in its statutes, stands in opposition to that of the people, declared in the Constitution, the judges ought to be governed by the latter rather than the former. They ought to regulate their decisions by the fundamental laws rather than by those which are not fundamental." The Federalist no. 78, 525.

111. The original reads, "adoption."

112. Although a system of separation of functions is advocated, there is nothing in Brutus like Publius' discussion of separation of powers in The Federalist no. 51, and there is no articulation of the connection between the principle of responsibility, on which so much emphasis is laid, and the principle of balanced government. See above, Centinel I, 2.7.7 n. 4; II, 2.7.50 n. 29.

113. The original reads, "in a free and republic are chosen. . . ." Jeffrey suggests "in a free and [equal?] republic are chosen. . . ." University of Cincinnati Law Review 40, no. 4 (1971): 773, n. 73.

114. Cf. The Federalist no. 78.

115. Cf. above, III, 2.9.40.

116. The original reads, "the Senate we authorised. . ."

117. No further essays were published.

The Complete Anti-Federalist

The Complete Anti-Federalist

Edited, with Commentary and Notes, by

Herbert J. Storing

With the Assistance of Murray Dry

VOLUME 3

Pennsylvania

The University of Chicago Press
Chicago and London

The University of Chicago Press, Chicago 60637
The University of Chicago Press, Ltd., London

©1981 by The University of Chicago
All rights reserved. Published 1981
Printed in the United States of America

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Main entry under title:

The Complete Anti-Federalist

Includes bibliographical references.
Contents: v. 1. What the Anti-Federalists were for—v. 2. Objections of non-signers of the Constitution and Major series of essays at the outset—v. 3. Pennsylvania—[etc.]
1. United States—Constitutional law—Collected works.
I. Storing, Herbert J., 1928–77. II. Dry, Murray.
KF4515.C65 342.73'029 81-10287
ISBN 0-226-77573-9 (set) 347.30229 AACR2

Contents

VOLUME THREE

Pennsylvania

Contents of Other Volumes vii
A Note on Cross References xi
Works Frequently Cited xiii

Introduction 3
3.1 Speech of William Findley in the Pennsylvania Assembly (28 September 1787) 5
3.2 Address of the Minority of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives (4 October 1787) 11
3.3 Essays of An Old Whig (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer October 1787–February 1788) 17
3.4 Essay by Montezuma (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 17 October 1787) 53
3.5 Essay of A Democratic Federalist (Pennsylvania Herald 17 October 1787) 58
3.6 A Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican (1787) 65
3.7 Address of John Humble (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 29 October 1787) 89
3.8 Letter by An Officer of the Late Continental Army (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 6 November 1787) 91
3.9 Essays of Philadelphiensis (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer November 1787–April 1788) 99
3.10 Essay by Alfred (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer 13 December 1787) 141
3.11 The Address and Reasons of Dissent of the Minority of the Convention of Pennsylvania to Their Constitutents (Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser 18 Decembet 1787) 145
3.12 Essays by William Penn (Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer January 1788) 168

3.13 Essay by Deliberator (Philadelphia Freeman's Journal 20 February 1788) 176
3.14 The Fallacies of the Freeman Detected by A Farmer (Philadelphia Freeman's Journal April 1788) 181
3.15 Essay by None of the Well-Born Conspirators (Philadelphia Freeman's Journal 23 April 1788) 194
3.16 The Government of Nature Delineated, or An Exact Picture of the New Federal Constitution, by Aristocrotis (Carlisle 1788) 196

Contents of Other Volumes

VOLUME ONE

Foreword by Joseph Cropsey
Preface by Murray Dry
Prefatory Notes by Herbert J. Storing

What the Anti-Federalists Were For

1 Introduction
2 Conservatives
3 The Small Republic
4 Union
5 The Federalist Reply
6 The Aristocratic Tendency of the Constitution
7 Complex Government
8 Bill of Rights
9 Conclusion

The Articles of Confederation, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions
The Constitution of the United States, Keyed to the Principal Anti-Federalist Discussions

VOLUME TWO

PART I

Objections of Non-Signers of the Constitution

2.1 Elbridge Gerry (3 November 1787)
2.2 George Mason (1787)
2.3 Robert Yates and John Lansing (14 January 1788)
2.4 Luther Martin (1788)
2.5 Edmund Randolph (10 October 1787)

PART 2

Major Series of Essays at the Outset

2.6 Cato (September 1787–January 1788)
2.7 Centinel (October 1787–April 1788)
2.8 The Federal Farmer (1787 and 1788)
2.9 Brutus (October 1787–April 1788)

VOLUME FOUR

Massachusetts and New England

4.1 Anon., "A confederation" (9 October 1787)
4.2 A Gentleman in a Neighbouring State (October 1787)
4.3 John DeWitt (October–December 1787)
4.4 Vox Populi (October–November 1787)
4.5 William Symmes (15 November 1787)
4.6 Agrippa (November 1787–February 1788)
4.7 A Federalist (26 November 1787)
4.8 One of the Common People (3 December 1787)
4.9 Candidus (December 1787–January 1788)
4.10 Cornelius (December 1787)
4.11 Poplicola (24 December 1787)
4.12 Helvidius Priscus (December 1787–February 1788)
4.13 A Republican Federalist (December 1787–February 1788)
4.14 Samuel (10 January 1788)
4.15 Hampden (January–February 1788)
4.16 A Customer (March 1788)
4.17 A Farmer (January–June 1788)
4.18 Charles Turner (17 January and 6 February 1788)
4.19 The Yeomanry of Massachusetts (25 January 1788)
4.20 An American (28 January 1788)
4.21 A Bostonian (4 February 1788)
4.22 A Watchman (February 1788)
4.23 A Friend to the Rights of the People, A Friend to the Republic (February 1788)
4.24 David (7 March 1788)
4.25 A Newport Man (March 1788)
4.26 Consider Arms, Malichi Maynard, and Samuel Field (April 1788)
4.27 Phileleutheros (May 1788)
4.28 A Columbian Patriot (1788)

Volume Five

PART 1

Maryland

5.1 A Farmer (February–April 1788)
5.2 A Farmer and Planter (April 1788)
5.3 Samuel Chase (April 1788)
5.4 Minority of the Maryland Ratifying Convention (May 1788)
5.5 John Francis Mercer (April or May 1788)

PART 2

Virginia and the South

5.6 Richard Henry Lee (16 October 1787)
5.7 Cato Uticensis (17 October 1787)
5.8 A Proposal for Reviving Christian Conviction (October 1787)
5.9 A Georgian (15 November 1787)
5.10 Cato (November–December 1787)
5.11 Tamony (9 January 1788)
5.12 Rawlins Lowndes (January 1788)
5.13 Republicus (February and March 1788)
5.14 The Impartial Examiner (February–June 1788)
5.15 Brutus (14 May 1788)
5.16 Patrick Henry (June 1788)
5.17 George Mason (4 June 1788)
5.18 Denatus (11 June 1788)
5.19 A Delegate Who Has Catched Cold (June 1788)
5.20 Sentiments of Many (18 June 1788)
5.21 James Monroe (1788)

Volume Six

PART 1

New York

6.1 Cincinnatus (November–December 1787)
6.2 A Son of Liberty (8 November 1787)
6.3 Brutus, Jr. (8 November 1787)
6.4 An Observor (19 November 1787)
6.5 A Citizen (24 November 1787)
6.6 A Countryman from Dutchess County (November 1787–February 1788)

6.7 A Countryman (December 1787–January 1788)
6.8 Sidney (February–March 1788)
6.9 Sydney (June 1788)
6.10 Albany Antifederal Committee (26 April 1788)
6.11 A Plebeian (1788)
6.12 Melancton Smith (June 1788)
6.13 George Clinton (June–July 1788)

PART 2

Conclusion

6.14 Mercy Warren (1805)

VOLUME SEVEN

Index

A Note on Cross References

For convenient cross reference, and without any other editorial purpose, a three-part number has been assigned to each paragraph (or group of paragraphs where they are brief) of the writings assembled in The Complete Anti-Federalist. The first number denotes the volume, the second the position of the essay or series within that volume, and the third the paragraph. A reference to, for example, Federal Republican 3.16.13 locates a passage in the Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention, by A Federal Republican, which can be found in volume 3 of this edition. These numbers are distinct from any numbering by the authors themselves or any of their publishers; Centinel III, 2.7.73 refers to the third letter of Centinel, in volume 2 above. The abbreviation "intro." is used for Storing's introductions to volumes or parts of volumes as well as the introductions to individual texts. A reference to, say, 2.8.intro. denotes the introductory sketch and outline of the Federal Farmer, located in volume 2. Cross references to volume 1 are by page number. A cross reference from one note to another uses a three-part number plus a note number, so that the reader may refer to the text as well as the note if necessary.

Murray Dry

Works Frequently Cited

John Adams, Works	The Works of John Adams, ed. Charles Francis Adams (Boston 1851)
Blackstone, Commentaries	William Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England (1765–69)
Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution	William W. Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution in the History of the United States (Chicago 1953)
Curtis, Constitutional History	George Ticknor Curtis, Constitutional History of the United States: From Their Declaration of Independence to the Close of the Civil War (New York 1889)
Documentary History of the Constitution	A Documentary History of the Constitution of the United States of America, 1786–1870; Derived from the Records, Manuscripts, and Rolls Deposited in the Bureau of Rolls and Library of the Department of State (Washington, D.C., 1894–1905)
Elliot	The Debates of the State Conventions on the Adoption of the Federal Constitution, as Recommended by the General Convention at Philadelphia in 1787, 2d ed., ed. Jonathan Elliot (Philadelphia 1866)
Evans, Early American Imprints	Charles Evans, Early American Imprints, 1639–1800 (Worcester, Mass., 1955–)
Farrand	The Records of the Federal Convention of 1787, ed. Max Farrand (New Haven 1911–37)
The Federalist	The Federalist, ed. Jacob E. Cooke (Middletown, Conn., 1961)
Ford, Essays	Essays on the Constitution of the United States, Published during Its Discussion by the People,

	1787–1788, ed. Paul Leicester Ford (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1892)
Ford, Pamphlets	Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States, Published during Its Discussion by the People, 1787–1788, ed. Paul Leicester Ford (Brooklyn, N.Y., 1888)
Lee, Letters	The Letters of Richard Henry Lee, ed. James Curtis Ballagh (New York 1911–14)
Lincoln, Collected Works	Abraham Lincoln, Collected Works, ed. Roy P. Basler (New Brunswick, N.J., 1953)
Lincoln, Speeches and Writings	Abraham Lincoln: His Speeches and Writings, ed. Roy P. Basler (Cleveland and New York 1946)
Madison, Writings (ed. Hunt)	The Writings of James Madison, ed. Gaillard Hunt (New York 1900–1910)
McMaster and Stone	Pennsylvania and the Federal Constitution, 1787–1788, ed. John Bach McMaster and Frederick D. Stone (Published for the Subscribers by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, 1888)
Peters	Peters' United States Supreme Court Reports
Thorpe, Federal and State Constitutions	The Federal and State Constitutions, Colonial Charters, and Other Organic Laws of the States, Territories, and Colonies Now or Heretofore Forming the United States of America, comp. Francis Newton Thorpe (Washington, D.C., 1931–44)
Washington, Writings	The Writings of George Washington from the Original Manuscript Sources, 1745–1799, ed. John C. Fitzpatrick (Washington, D.C., 1931–44)

Pennsylvania

Introduction

The first state to take action on the Constitution was Pennsylvania, where sharp party divisions centered upon the state's 1776 constitution, which established what one historian called "the first triumph of democracy" and another "the most democratic form of government ever tried by an American state."[1] The government was one of legislative dominance—the traditional form in the Proprietary regime—a multiple and weak executive, and a judiciary dependent on the legislature. The defenders of this constitution, the "Constitutionalists," later Anti-Federalists, saw it as the means of protecting the ordinary people of Pennsylvania, particularly the farm people, from the wealthier, better educated, better connected commercial and propertied classes. The opponents, the "Republicans," saw it as defective in principle, because of its lack of provision for stability and balance, and as illiberal and undemocratic in practice.[2] Additional objects of contention were the severe test oaths required of citizens by the constitution and subsequent legislation, and the Bank of North America, whose Pennsylvania charter was abruptly repealed by the Constitutionalist-controlled legislature leading to a Republican legislative victory in 1786. Political power alternated between these groups—often by popular response to excessive partisanship and vindictiveness on one side or the other—with the Republicans increasingly looking to a more energetic federal government, while the Constitutionalists remained steadfastly local. Samuel Bannister Harding describes the situation in Pennsylvania on the eve of the ratification debate as follows:

> In the State were two parties, embittered by a dozen years of violent struggle. On the one side, and for the moment in power, stood the greater proportion of the men of property, of education, of large ideas, and federal views; six of the eight delegates sent by the State to the Federal convention had come from their number, and the other two—Franklin and Ingersoll—if not neutral, were at most but moderate Constitutionalists. On the other side the leadership had been assumed by men of obscure birth, of little education or property, and of the narrowest views. Small wonder, then, that the cause espoused by the first met with the violent condemnation of the second, and that the contest which ensued was unprecedented in virulence and animosity.[3]

Moving very quickly, the Republican-controlled legislature called for a convention to meet on 20 November. While they did not achieve for Pennsylvania the honor of being the first state to ratify—Delaware having unanimously ratified on 7 December—the Pennsylvania convention acceded to the Constitution on 12 December by the substantial margin of 46 to 23. The Pennsylvania Anti-Federalists remained unreconciled, however, and continued to press their attack on the Constitution, providing much material for the debate in other states.

1. Douglass, Rebels and Democrats 214. Samuel Bannister Harding, "Party Struggles over the First Pennsylvania Constitution," Annual Report of the American Historical Association for the Year 1894 (Washington, D.C., 1895) 376. See also Harry Marlin Tinkcom, The Republicans and Federalists in Pennsylvania 1790–1801 (Harrisburg 1950) 1; and David Hawke, In the Midst of a Revolution (Philadelphia 1961). For a general background in Pennsylvania see, in addition to the above, Brunhouse, The Counter Revolution in Pennsylvania, 1776–1790; Paul Leicester Ford, "The Adoption of the Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776," Political Science Quarterly September 1895; Jensen, New Nation; Charles H. Lincoln, The Revolutionary Movement in Pennsylvania, 1760–1776 (Philadelphia 1901); McDonald, We the People; McDonald, E Pluribus Unum; Allan Nevins, The American States during and after the Revolution, 1775–1789 (New York 1924); J. Paul Selsam, The Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776 (Philadelphia 1935).

2. McDonald may exaggerate when he says that in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention it was Wilson who argued on democratic grounds and Smilie and Findley who took the ground of republican principle; but there is enough truth in this view to seriously qualify and complicate the common terms of the arguments about the degree of "democracy" in both the Pennsylvania and the U.S. constitutions. See We the People 165.

3. Harding, Annual Report of the American Historical Association 1894 391.

Speech of William Findley in the Pennsylvania Assembly

28 September 1787

On 28 September 1787, only eleven days after the adjournment of the Constitutional Convention, before the Congress had concluded its consideration of the proposed Constitution and during the waning days of the session of the Pennsylvania Assembly, George Clymer proposed to the latter body that elections be held the next month to select delegates for a state convention to consider the Constitution. Robert Whitehill immediately moved for a postponement until the next session; this was discussed and soundly defeated. Hugh Brackenridge then argued that there was no need to wait for Congress to act, contending that he had "not been able to discover any principle on which an idea of this nature can be founded."[1] In the speech printed here, William Findley attempted to provide that principle.[2] Findley, second in ability only to George Bryan among the Anti-Federalists and, like him (and John Smilie, another Anti-Federalist leader in Pennsylvania), born in Ireland, was a leading western Constitutionalist. He later bore the brunt of the opposition in the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, to which Bryan was not elected, and produced a series of Anti-Federal essays as An Officer of the Late Continental Army.[3]

Findley urged that Pennsylvania should stand, as she had stood in the past, on the rock of legitimacy, which was the rock of federalism. The argument is essentially that the ratification should follow the course laid down in the Articles of Confederation rather than that laid down in the Constitution. This was an appropriate Anti-Federalist argument so long as there was some possibility of adhering to the established conventions; but there never was much chance of that, and consequently the more common Anti-Federalist argument was not Findley's but, for example, Cato's, which emphasized the illegality of the Convention, the need for a recourse to the original authority of the people to legitimize the Constitution, and the consequent need for due deliberation in taking such a fundamental step.[4] The Pennsylvania Anti-Federalists themselves made the same argument once it was clear that the established channels of legitimacy had been breached.[5]

1. See McMaster and Stone 40; for the full report of this debate see ibid. 27–72, and n. 2 below.

2. The speech is reprinted from Proceedings and Debates of the General Assembly of Pennsylvania, Taken in short-hand by Thomas Lloyd (Philadelphia 1787) I, 125–28.

3. See below, 3.8. Little has been written about Findley. See the biographical sketch by W. H. Egle in McMaster and Stone 727–30; and Asa E. Martin, "William Findley," Dictionary of American Biography 385–86. See also the autobiographical letter printed as "William Findley of Westmoreland, Pennsylvania," Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography 5 (1881): 440–50.

4. See Cato II, 2.6.9.

5. See Pennsylvania House Minority 3.2.4–7.

3.1.1 I do not intend to reply to the arguments used in favour of the present measure—but only examine the ground on which we stand.—When the question was on postponement, I did not think it right, that gentlemen should have introduced the observations which they did, nor that the manner of speaking, which some used, was proper.[1] It was only addressed to the passions, and in my reply I do not mean to justify such language, by using what may be similar. No, Sir, I intend to address the judgment, and not the passions of any man. I have, no doubt, but a Convention might be called, and will be called. That it ought to be called, and will be called, is seen so clearly, that I shall add nothing to enforce it—therefore, I take it—that the propriety of calling a convention is not the question before us. After declaring my sentiments so far, I shall proceed—Sir, now to examine the ground on which we stand—I believe we stand on foederal ground; therefore, we are not in a state of nature. If we were in a state of nature, all the arguments produced, for hastening this business, would apply—but as we are not, I would observe, that the most deliberate manner of proceeding, is the best manner—But the manner in which this subject has been introduced, is an indeliberate manner, and seems to argue, that we are not on foederal ground. The design of carrying this through, I say, Sir, is a presumption, that we are in a state of nature: if that is the case, then it can only be proper to use this expedition. What I mean, Sir, by a state of nature, is with respect to the confederation, or union of the states, and not any wise alluding to our particular state government. Now my opinion is, Sir, that we are on foederal ground—that the foederal convention was a foederal convention—that it had the powers of a foederal convention, and that they were limited to act foederally—that they have acted agreeable to the limitation, and have acted foederally. I know by some of the arguments which have been used, that some gentlemen suppose otherwise. Well then, Sir, we will have recourse to the confederation itself, and then to the law which appointed delegates to the convention, and let them decide whether we are on foederal ground or not.

3.1.2 The sixth article of the confederation says, "No two or more states shall enter into any treaty, confederation, or alliance whatever between them, without the consent of the United States in Congress assembled, specifying, accurately, the purposes for which the same is to be entered into, and how long it shall continue." It may be said this don't apply—Well let us examine what it says further in the thirteenth article—"The articles of confederation shall be inviolably observed by every state, and the union shall be perpetual; nor shall any alteration at any time hereafter be made in any of them, unless such alteration be agreed to in a congress of the United States, and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every state." Now did we act in conformity with these articles by passing the law appointing delegates to the convention, or did we not? I say we did. I know the contrary has been said, but let us have recourse to our own act. I don't mean, as I said before, to reply particularly to any arguments, but to establish the point that we have all along acted upon foederal principles, and that we ought to continue foederal, and I have no doubt but we shall. But what says the preamble of the law—Hear our own words, Sir,—"Whereas the general assembly of this commonwealth, taking into their serious consideration the representations heretofore made to the legislatures of the several states in the union, by the United States in Congress assembled," &c. It has been mentioned that we took it up in consequence of Virginia's having engaged in the measure; and as the reasons are only mentioned in the preamble, they may not deserve much attention, but the second section of the law decides this point. The words are, after enumerating the persons, that they are hereby constituted and appointed deputies from this state, with powers to meet such deputies as may be appointed and authorized by the other states to assemble in the said convention at the city aforesaid, and to join with them in devising, deliberating on, and discussing all such alterations and further provisions as may be necessary to render the foederal constitution fully adequate to the exigencies of the Union; and in reporting such act or acts for that purpose, to the United States in Congress assembled, as when agreed to by them, and duly confirmed by the several states, will effectually provide for the same.[2]

Now I consider it as a question of importance, whether we are to take up 3.1.3
the new constitution, as being in a state of nature, or acting on federal ground, whether we stand unconnected or subordinate to the present confederation; if we are bound by that, it obliges us to continue on federal ground. I should conceive, that we are still bound by the confederation, and that the conduct of the House has hitherto been federal; that the convention was federal as appears by their appointment, and their report to Congress. Did they, Sir, address their report to this House? No, Sir, they did not. It is true, Sir, we were honored with a report from our own delegates. No, Sir, I retract the word—the delegates were honored; they did themselves the honour of communicating the result of their deliberations. But did the convention address this House? No, Sir, they did not. They addressed Congress, as they were ordered to do.—Hitherto the business has been in a federal channel, and this, Sir, is the first step that places us upon unfederal ground. The report is before Congress, and it is to be presumed Congress will agree to it—but has such a length of time elapsed, as to induce us to suspect they will not concur, or to justify our going into it without their recommendation? We may act, Sir, without due deliberation, and hurry on without consideration, but Congress will not. I know the propriety of waiting to hear from them must have weight with every Member, and I ask every gentleman in this House, will they take upon themselves to doubt of the acquiescence of Congress, in order to furnish an argument for dispatch? If any will, let him say so, and take the consequences upon his character. No doubt can be entertained, but Congress will recommend, as the acquisition of power is a desirable object with them. Their disposition must be to promote the present plan, but they must wish to preserve the appearance of decency on such a subject. I ask, can any gentleman suppose but what Congress will come readily into it? They who have been many years recommending and requiring, nay I may say, begging for such powers as are now proposed to be given them, cannot change their disposition, and decline receiving an increase. Well, what does all this tend to prove; have we not all along been a federal state, remarkably so? And shall we be the first to step out of our way wantonly, and without any reason? Certainly we will not.[3]

3.1.4 However, I suppose some gentlemen will say, it is necessary for Pennsylvania to shew a ready compliance on the present occasion—that it is absolutely necessary to supercede the existing confederation. Why, Sir, we know that nothing, no argument, no opposition can withstand the plea of necessity—well, but the absolute necessity must arise from the dangers we are in. Now where are any dangers to be avoided while Congress are going only through their usual forms to recommend this measure? They must have time to read and consider the plan; it must go through the usual course of business. Circular letters must be prepared and sent with authenticated copies of the new form of government. I am of opinion all this will be done with proper speed, and the communications will be made as soon as possible. Why send the plan to Congress at all, if we must act upon it without their approbation. If the present confederation is not adequate to the great national purposes, it is fair to put it in competition with the proposed one. We know it was framed by good and wise men, and so was this. Wise and great men were employed in framing both. Nay, some of the same men prepared them—but as time and experience have shewn a revision to be necessary, has it not been entered into [on] a federal ground? And will the state of Pennsylvania quit this to answer the concealed purposes of those, who urge on the present measure? No, I hope not,—but they will agree to leave it to another House, by which time the usual formalities may be given it by the United States. Surely Pennsylvania can take it up early enough to prevent any damage that is feared. In doing so, we act federally. What are held out as inducements to act with such precipitation, as some Members say the honor of being foremost; but I would rather say the dishonor of acting unfederally; and will any federal purposes be answered by a breach of the confederation, which can counterbalance the disgrace of being the first to dissolve the union? And, Sir, it is not convenient that one state should enter into this measure any length of time before the others. This is one reason of waiting the recommendation of Congress—for then the new constitution comes officially and all are prepared to go hand in hand in perfecting the work—but will a name justify us for a breach of faith unnecessarily, and no necessity is alledged to justify the measure. Sir, in acting the part I do in supporting federal measures, I am justified by every citizen, who will think with deliberation on a subject of this importance. I have supposed the gentlemen who support the resolutions before you, have some object in view which is not understood. I have a right for such suspicion, or why was it delayed to the last but one day of the sessions? We do not treat this subject which is allowed to be one of importance with any respect; we treat it rather as a matter of no importance, when we hurry it on in this manner. Why, Sir, even the trifling business of appointing a prothonotary, or register, is made the order of the day. Certainly then we treat this with indignity.

There must be some reasons for this, but though I cannot see it[,] I may 3.1.5 suppose it, and I would ask the gentleman whether it is that they may have the merit of promoting a business which appears to be very popular; but will this consist with our federal engagements. I would go further, and assign another reason against it, but I may be supposed to touch it with indelicacy. It may be asked, was this House elected with a view of entering into matters of this importance? I say this may be indelicate, as the House have elected delegates to convention—but then, Sir, I have shewed they had that right by the articles of confederation, so that the House so far did their duty.—It is true they happened in their choice of delegates, to choose a number of their own Members, but in this they were also justified for one reason; perhaps they thought them better judges of what would be for the benefit of a state they regulated by their legislation. I believe nothing was improper in this; but, I remember, it was lamented that some persons were not chosen better to represent the country interest. And it is these very men, who now come forward with the resolutions, they, no doubt, are able to decide; but I think they should indulge others with time, for a like consideration—therefore, I hope they will agree to let it lie over to the next House. I don't think that it will be then too late, and few or none of the other states can be forwarder than ourselves, in calling a convention.

1. Referring to the Federalist discussion of the merits of the Constitution and allusions to the character and motives of the Anti-Federalist leaders.

2. Farrand III, 565–66.

3. Mr. Hugh Brackenridge: "All efforts to restore energy to the federal government have proved ineffectual, when exerted in the mode directed by the 13th article of the confederation, and it is in consequence of this that recourse is once more had to the authority of the people. The first step toward obtaining this was anti-federal; the acquiescence of Congress was anti-federal; the whole process has been anti-federal so far as it was not conducted in the manner prescribed by the articles of union. But the first and every step was federal, inasmuch as it was sanctioned by the PEOPLE OF THE UNITED STATES. The member from Westmoreland [Mr. Findley] pleases his fancy with being on federal ground, pursuing federal measures, and being a very federal sort of person; he concludes we are not in a state of nature, because we are on federal ground. But, Sir, we are not on federal ground, but on the wild and extended field of nature, unrestrained by any former compact, bound by no peculiar tie; at least so far are we disengaged as to be capable of forming a constitution which shall be the wonder of the universe. It is on the principle of self-conservation that we act. The former articles of confederation have received sentence of death, and though they may be on earth, yet are inactive, and have no efficacy." McMaster and Stone 58.

Address of the Minority of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives

4 October 1787

The Pennsylvania legislature did not proceed on Findley's federal ground but called for a convention to meet on 20 November. The Anti-Federalists tried to block action by boycotting the Assembly, but two of them were brought to the house by a group of Philadelphia citizens and retained there by the Federalists to make a quorum. The "Sixteen Seceders' " account of the action, together with their objections to the Constitution, was published in the Pennsylvania Packet, 4 October 1787, from which it is taken here; and it was quickly and widely reprinted. The author is identified by Konkle as George Bryan.[1] McMaster and Stone print several replies, the most substantial of which are essays by Pelatiah Webster and A Citizen of Pennsylvania.[2]

1. See Konkle, George Bryan and the Pennsylvania Constitution, 1731–1791 308. The Centinel essays and the "Address and Reasons of Dissent" of the Minority of the Pennsylvania ratifying convention, also said by Konkle to have been written by George Bryan, were in fact probably written by his son Samuel (see Centinel II, 2.7 intro. n. 4, and Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.8 n. 2); but the son does not appear to have claimed the authorship of the address of the minority of the House of Representatives.
2. McMaster and Stone 89–113.

An Address of the Subscribers Members of the late House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania to their Constituents.

Gentlemen,

When in consequence of your suffrages at the last election we were chosen to represent you in the General Assembly of this commonwealth, we accepted of the important trust, with a determination to execute it in the best manner we were able, and we flatter ourselves we acted in such a 3.2.1

manner as to convince you, that your interests with that of the good of the state has been the object of our measures.

3.2.2 During the fall a[nd?] spring sessions of the legislature, on the recommendation of the Congress of the United States, your representatives proceeded to the appointment of delegates to attend a convention to be held in the city of Philadelphia, for the purposes of revising and amending the present articles of confederation, and to report their proceedings to Congress, and when adopted by them, and ratified by the several states, to become binding on them as part of the confederation of the United States. We lamented at the time, that a majority of our legislature appointed men to represent this state who were all citizens of Philadelphia, none of them calculated to represent the landed interest of Pennsylvania, and almost all of them of one political party, men who have been uniformly opposed to that constitution for which you have on every occasion manifested your attachment.[1] We were apprehensive at the time, of the ill consequences of so partial a representation, but all opposition was in vain. When the convention met, members from twelve states attended, and after deliberating upwards of four months on the subject, agreed on a plan of government which was sent forward by them to Congress, and which was reported to the house by the delegates of Pennsylvania as mere matter of information, and printed in the newspapers of the city of Philadelphia; but the house had not received it officially from Congress, nor had we the least idea, that as the annual election was so near, we should be called upon to deliberate, much less to act on so momentous a business; a business of the utmost importance to you and your posterity. We conceived it required the most minute examination and mature consideration, and that it ought to be taken up by the next house. Judge then of our surprise on finding the last day but one in the sessions, a member of the house who had been a delegate in the convention [George Clymer], without any previous notice or any intimation of his intentions to the house, offer a resolution recommending the calling a convention to consider of the proposed constitution, and to direct the electing members for the same, at so early a period as the day of your annual election, thus attempting to surprise you into a choice of members—to approve or disapprove of a constitution, which, is to entail happiness or misery forever without giving time to the greatest part of the state even to see, much less to examine the plan of government.

3.2.3 Our duty to ourselves and our regard for your dearest interests induced us to oppose the measure by every possible argument that we could suggest at the time; but all our efforts were insufficient even to produce a postponement until the afternoon. We urged and urged in vain the constant practice of the house when any important business was to be brought on, of giving previous notice and making it the order of the day sometime before hand; that no bill, however trifling, was passed without three readings, and without this formality which gave the members time and opportunity to think on the subject; that the rules were adhered to so strictly, that even the building of a bridge, or the laying out a road, could not be determined on without this form; but this, the most important of all matters, was to be done by surprise, and as we conceived with design to preclude you from having it in your power to deliberate on the subject. Our anxiety for your interests was great, but notwithstanding the firmest and most determined opposition, no respite could be obtained, and the first resolution was adopted by a majority of the house, when they adjourned till the afternoon to complete the business. In these circumstances we had no alternative, we were under a necessity of either returning to the house, and by our presence enabling them to call a convention before our constituents could have the means of information, or time to deliberate on the subject, or by absenting ourselves from the house, prevent the measure taking place. Our regard for you induced us to prefer the latter, and we determined not to attend in the afternoon. We conceived that at the time we were chosen you had no view to this business, and we could see no inconvenience nor loss of time from deferring a matter of such importance and which would in its consequences affect, or perhaps, annihilate our own constitution, as well as that of every constitution in the union to a house chosen after the people had some knowledge of the plan, especially as the next house will meet at so early a period, and a convention could be called by them time enough to meet in a few months, which would be as early as any state in the union, and would be allowing you time to make up your minds on a matter which appeared to us to require so much deliberation. Thus circumstanced and thus influenced, we determined the next morning, again to absent ourselves from the house, when James M'Calmont, esquire, a member from Franklin, and Jacob Miley, esquire, a member from Dauphin, were seized by a number of citizens of Philadelphia, who had collected together for that purpose, their lodgings were violently broken open, their cloaths torn, and after much abuse and insult, they were forcibly dragged through the streets of Philadelphia to the State house, and there detained by force, and in the presence of the majority, who had, the day before, voted for the first of the proposed resolutions, treated with the most insulting language; while the house so formed proceeded to finish their resolutions, which they mean to offer to you as the doings of the legislature of Pennsylvania. On this outrageous proceeding we make no comment. The inhabitants of Franklin and Dauphin have been grossly insulted by the treatment of their members.[2] We know the feelings of the people of these counties are sufficiently keen; it becomes us, not to add to them by dwelling longer on the subject; but as our conduct may, and we have no doubt, will be misrepresented, we thought it our duty to lay before our constituents, to whom alone we are accountable, a real state of facts; that they may judge for themselves. We need not tell you, that we could have no interested motive to influence our conduct. A sense of that duty which we owed to you and to ourselves, could have alone induced us to submit to the variety of abuse and insults which many of us have experienced, for not consenting to a measure that might probably have surprised you into a surrender of your dearest rights. Our conduct has at least had the good effect to lengthen out the time of election, and induced them to postpone the election for members of the convention until the first Tuesday in November next; whereas the resolution first proposed, directed it to be holden for all the counties east of Bedford, on the day of the annual election, nine days from the time of proposing the measure.

3.2.4 We cannot conclude without requesting you to turn your serious attention to the government now offered to your consideration: "We are persuaded that a free and candid discussion of any subject tends greatly to the improvement of knowledge, and that a matter in which the public are so deeply interested cannot be too well understood. A good constitution and government is a blessing from heaven, and the right of posterity and mankind; suffer then we intreat you no interested motive, sinister view, or improper influence to direct your determinations or biass your judgements."[3] Provide yourselves with the new constitution offered to you by the convention, look it over with attention that you be enabled to think for yourselves. We confess when the legislature appointed delegates to attend the convention, our ideas extended no farther than a revision or amendment of the present confederation, nor were our delegates, by the acts of assembly appointing them, authorised to do more, as will appear by referring to the said act, the second section of which describes their powers in the following words, viz.

3.2.5 2. Be it enacted, and it is hereby enacted by the representatives of the freemen of the commonwealth of Pennsylvania in general assembly met, and by the authority of the same. That Thomas Mifflin, Robert Morris, George Clymer, Jared Ingersoll, Thomas Fitzsimons, James Wilson and Governeur Morris, Esquires, are hereby appointed deputies from this state to meet in the convention of the deputies of the respective states of North-America, to be held at the city of Philadelphia, on the second day of the month of May next. And the said Thomas Mifflin, Robert Morris, George Clymer, Jared Ingersoll, Thomas Fitzsimons, James Wilson and Governeur Morris, Esquires, or any four of them are hereby constituted and appointed deputies from this state, with powers to meet such deputies as may be appointed and authorised by the other states to assemble in the said convention at the city aforesaid, and to join with them in devising, deliberating on, and discussing all such alterations and further provisions as may be necessary to render the federal constitution fully adequate to the exigencies of the union; and in reporting such act or acts for that purpose, to the United States in Congress assembled, as when agreed to by them, and duly confirmed by the several states, will effectually provide for the same.[4]

3.2.6 You will therefore perceive that they had no authority whatever from the legislature, to annihilate the present confederation and form a constitution entirely new, and in doing which they have acted as mere individuals, not as the official deputies of this commonwealth. If however, after mature deliberation you are of opinion that the plan of government which they have offered for your consideration is best calculated to promote your political happiness and preserve those invaluable privileges you at present enjoy, you will no doubt chose men to represent you in convention who will adopt it; if you think otherwise you will, with your usual firmness, determine accordingly.

You have a right, and we have no doubt you will consider whether or not 3.2.7
you are in a situation to support the expence of such a government as is now offered to you, as well as the expence of your state government? or whether a legislature consisting of three branches,[5] neither of them chosen annually, and that the senate, the most powerful, the members of which are for six years, are likely to lessen your burthens or encrease your taxes? or whether in case your state government should be annihilated, which will probably be the case, or dwindle into a mere corporation, the continental government will be competent to attend to your local concerns? You can also best determine whether the power of levying and imposing internal taxes at pleasure, will be of real use to you or not? or whether a continental collector assisted by a few faithful soldiers will be more eligible than your present collectors of taxes? You will also in your deliberations on this important business judge, whether the liberty of the press may be considered as a blessing or a curse in a free government, and whether a declaration for the preservation of it is necessary? or whether in a plan of government any declaration of rights should be prefixed or inserted? You will be able likewise to determine, whether in a free government there ought or ought not to be any provision against a standing army in time of peace? or whether the trial by jury in civil causes is become dangerous and ought to be abolished? and whether the judiciary of the United States is not so constructed as to absorb and destroy the judiciaries of the several states? you will also be able to judge whether such inconveniencies have been experienced by the present mode of tryal between citizen and citizen, of different states as to render a continental court necessary for that purpose? or whether there can be any real use in the appellate jurisdiction with respect to fact as well as law? we shall not dwell longer on the subject; one thing however, it is proper you should be informed of: the convention were not unanimous with respect to men though they were as states, several of those who have signed did not fully approve of the plan of government, and three of the members, viz. Governor Randolph and Colonel George Mason of Virginia, and Eldridge Gerry, Esquire, of Massachusetts, whose characters are very respectable, had such strong objections as to refuse signing. The confederation no doubt is defective and requires amendment and revision, and had the convention extended their plan to the enabling the United States to regulate commerce, equalize the impost, collect it throughout the United States and have the entire jurisdiction over maritime affairs, leaving the exercise of internal taxation to the separate states, we apprehend there would have been no objection to the plan of government.

3.2.8 The matter will be before you, and you will be able to judge for yourselves. "Shew that you seek not yourselves, but the good of your country, and may he who alone has dominion over the passions and understandings of men enlighten and direct you aright, that posterity may bless God for the wisdom of their ancestors."[6]

James M'Calmont	John Gilchrist
Robert Clark	Abraham Smith
Jacob Miley	Robert Whitehill
Alexander Wright	David Mitchell
John M'Dowell	John Piper
John Flenniken	Samuel Dale
James Allison	William Findley
Theophilus Philips	James Barr.

Saturday, Sept. 29, 1787.

1. With the Republicans in control of the state legislature, and considering the party animosities in Pennsylvania, it is not surprising that the Pennsylvania delegation to the Philadelphia Convention in 1787 was made up of men from their own party. It must also be said, however, that the Constitutionalists seem to have underestimated the importance of the Convention. George Bryan somewhat vaguely recalled that "very little bustle was made and little or no opposition." Konkle, George Bryan 300. Harding reports that Constitutionalist leader William Findley was asked to attend the Convention but declined on the ground that he could not afford to serve without a salary. Annual Report of the American Historical Association 1894 391 n. 2. The Constitutionalist posture was a typical grudging acquiescence to Republican initiatives in strengthening the confederation. On Pennsylvania's response to the proposal for a 5 percent federal impost, see Brunhouse, The Counter Revolution in Pennsylvania 132.

2. An Independent Citizen replied that the persons responsible for this action "were induced by motives of necessity, and public good to exert themselves in bringing your servants as well as theirs, to that duty from which they had disgracefully absconded." McMaster and Stone 87.

3. It is not clear whether this is a quotation or only set off for emphasis; but no source has been found.

4. Farrand III, 565–66; see Republican Federalist 4.13.10 n. 6.

5. Pelatiah Webster made a lengthy and well-reasoned reply to this criticism, in which he defended a separation of powers as promoting mature deliberation. McMaster and Stone 95–99.

6. Again, it is not clear whether this is a quotation or only set off for emphasis; but no source has been found.

Essays of An Old Whig

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTER
October 1787–February 1788

The essays of An Old Whig appeared in the Philadelphia Independent Gazetteer mainly during October and November 1787. They are not in the first rank of Anti-Federalist writings, but they are moderate and reasonably well argued and were reprinted rather widely in Pennsylvania, New York, and Massachusetts. The author is not known. A sketch of the essays follows.

Essay I. Once the Constitution is adopted, amendment will be extremely difficult, because the provisions for amendment are complex and require a high degree of agreement, because the states will have been reduced to "forms and shadows," because the great and powerful will not desire amendments, and because the press may be restrained on the principle that the people should not trouble themselves with government. We ought therefore not to hasten to a conclusion.

Essay II. James Wilson's argument that the Constitution reserves to the people all powers not explicitly granted is not tenable: (1) there is no such provision; (2) the powers actually granted, and particularly the necessary and proper clause, are unlimited; (3) there is no bill of rights under which the people could appeal to the courts; and (4) the supremacy clause is the capstone of this system of national legislative supremacy. We are left entirely dependent on the wisdom and virtue of the members of Congress.

Essay III. The treaty power is dangerous in its scope and implication. It is said that the power will not be abused, but the study of patriots is to restrain power so as to prevent abuse. The provisions of state bills of rights are no protection against, e.g., congressional restraint of the liberty of the press. The provision for trial by jury in criminal cases is not a sufficient protection against governmental oppression, for the government can tyrannize by way of civil suits for penalties, forfeitures, and demand for public debts as well as criminal prosecutions. There is no reason why the trial by jury in civil cases could not have been guaranteed.

Essay IV. Our chief danger is overhasty action in response to admitted difficulties; a second convention ought to be called. The proposed Constitution will annihilate separate state governments; no republic ever existed over so large an area. We ought to form a plan of confederation that will support continental union, while at the same time maintaining the rights of the separate states and liberties of the subjects. We are in a favorable period for establishing a good constitution, but it will require a careful attention to a bill of rights. A bill of rights not only protects the individual but strengthens government by strengthening the attachment of the people.

Essay V. Discussion of need for a bill of rights continued, with special reference to the need to protect liberty of conscience against the enthusiasm for uniformity of opinion that is always ready to extinguish dissent. Turning to the form of government, the President is clothed with dangerous powers and is in fact an elected king. It would be better to adopt a hereditary monarchy immediately if this is what is wanted. The office must be "either reduced to a lower pitch of power or made perpetual and hereditary" (3.3.31).

Essay VI. An efficient federal government, which is needed, could be secured by giving Congress power to regulate trade and lay and collect duties on impost. The proposed unlimited taxing power could be used to negate any state tax or regulation. The proponents say that direct taxes will not be necessary, but they will be used if granted, and if they are not needed why grant the power? The true distinction is between internal and external taxes; the maintenance of the federal system, and thus of republican government, depends on maintaining this distinction.

Essay VII. If the choice were between the proposed Constitution and no continental government, An Old Whig would choose the former, but the situation is not so deplorable. Some say that the common people should leave the matter to their superiors, but this is not the language of the Revolution. An Old Whig proposes that the Constitution be neither adopted nor rejected but that (1) new state conventions be called to suggest objections and amendments (about which there will be much agreement) and (2) a second federal convention be called to revise the proposal and with a prior agreement to abide by its decision.

Essay VIII. In this epilogue (which followed the main series after a period of two months), An Old Whig returns to the theme of his first essay. The time for amendments is before rather than after the Constitution is adopted. Both the tendency of rulers to keep all the power they can and the difficulty of the amendment procedure make it likely that no substantial changes will be made once the Constitution is adopted.

I

Mr. Printer,

3.3.1 I am one of those who have long wished for a federal government, which should have power to protect our trade and provide for the general security of the United States. Accordingly, when the constitution proposed by the late convention made its appearance, I was disposed to embrace it almost without examination; I was determined not to be offended with trifles or to scan it too critically. "We want something: let us try this; experience is the best teacher: if it does not answer our purpose we can alter it: at all events it will serve for a beginning." Such were my reasonings;—but, upon further reflection, I may say that I am shaken with very considerable doubts and scruples. I want a federal constitution; and yet I am afraid to concur in giving my consent to the establishment of that which is proposed. At the same time I really wish to have my doubts removed, if they are not well founded. I shall therefore take the liberty of laying some of them before the public, through the channel of your paper.

In the first place, it appears to me that I was mistaken in supposing that 3.3.2
we could so very easily make trial of this constitution and again change it at our pleasure. The conventions of the several states cannot propose any alterations—they are only to give their assent and ratification. And after the constitution is once ratified, it must remain fixed until two thirds of both the houses of Congress shall deem it necessary to propose amendments; or the legislatures of two thirds of the several states shall make application to Congress for the calling a convention for proposing amendments, which amendments shall not be valid till they are ratified by the legislatures of three fourths of the several states, or by conventions in three fourths thereof, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress.—This appears to me to be only a cunning way of saying that no alteration shall ever be made; so that whether it is a good constitution or a bad constitution, it will remain forever unamended. Lycurgus, when he promulgated his laws to the Spartans, made them swear that they would make no alterations in them until he should return from a journey which he was then about to undertake.—He chose never to return, and therefore no alterations could be made in his laws. The people were made to believe that they could make trial of his laws for a few months or years, during his absence, and as soon as he returned they could continue to observe them or reject at pleasure. Thus this celebrated Republic was in reality established by a trick. In like manner the proposed constitution holds out a prospect of being subject to be changed if it be found necessary or convenient to change it; but the conditions upon which an alteration can take place, are such as in all probability will never exist. The consequence will be that, when the constitution is once established, it never can be altered or amended without some violent convulsion or civil war.[1]

The conditions, I say, upon which any alterations can take place, appear 3.3.3 to me to be such as never will exist—two thirds of both houses of Congress or the legislatures of two thirds of the states, must agree in desiring a convention to be called. This will probably never happen; but if it should happen, then the convention may agree to the amendments or not as they think right; and after all, three fourths of the states must ratify the amendments.—Before all this labyrinth can be traced to a conclusion, ages will revolve, and perhaps the great principles upon which our late glorious revolution was founded, will be totally forgotten. If the principles of liberty are not firmly fixed and established in the present constitution, in vain may we hope for retrieving them hereafter. People once possessed of power are always loth to part with it; and we shall never find two thirds of a Congress voting or proposing any thing which shall derogate from their own authority and importance, or agreeing to give back to the people any part of those privileges which they have once parted with—so far from it[,] that the greatest occasion there may be for a reformation, the less likelihood will there be of accomplishing it. The greater the abuse of power, the more obstinately is it always persisted in. As to any expectation of two thirds of the legislatures concurring in such a request, it is if possible, still more remote. The legislatures of the states will be but forms and shadows, and it will be the height of arrogance and presumption in them, to turn their thoughts to such high subjects. After this constitution is once established, it is too evident that we shall be obliged to fill up the offices of assemblymen and councillors, as we do those of constables, by appointing men to serve whether they will or not, and fining them if they refuse. The members thus appointed, as soon as they can hurry through a law or two for repairing highways or impounding cattle, will conclude the business of their sessions as suddenly as possible; that they may return to their own business.—Their heads will not be perplexed with the great affairs of state—We need not expect two thirds of them ever to interfere in so momentous a question as that of calling a Continental convention.—The different legislatures will have no communication with one another from the time of the new constitution being ratified, to the end of the world. Congress will be the great focus of power as well as the great and only medium of communication from one state to another. The great, and the wise, and the mighty will be in possession of places and offices; they will oppose all changes in favor of liberty; they will steadily pursue the acquisition of more and more power to themselves and their adherents.[2] The cause of liberty, if it be now forgotten, will be forgotten forever.—Even the press which has so long been employed in the cause of liberty, and to which perhaps the greatest part of the liberty which exists in the world is owing at this moment;—the press may possibly be restrained of its freedom, and our children may possibly not be suffered to enjoy this most invaluable blessing of a free communication of each others sentiments on political subjects—Such at least appear to be some men's fears, and I cannot find in the proposed constitution any thing expressly calculated to obviate these fears; so that they may or may not be realized according to the principles and dispositions of the men who may happen to govern us hereafter. One thing however is calculated to alarm our fears on this head;—I mean the fashionable language which now prevails so much and is so frequent in the mouths of some who formerly held very different opinions;—THAT COMMON PEOPLE HAVE NO BUSINESS TO TROUBLE THEMSELVES ABOUT GOVERNMENT.[3] If this principle is just the consequence is plain that the common people need no information on the subject of politics. Newspapers, pamphlets and essays are calculated only to mislead and inflame them by holding forth to them doctrines which they have no business or right to meddle with, which they ought to leave to their superiors. Should the freedom of the press be restrained on the subject of politics, there is no doubt it will soon after be restrained on all other subjects, religious as well as civil. And if the freedom of the press shall be restrained, it will be another reason to despair of any amendments being made in favor of liberty, after the proposed constitution shall be once established. Add to this, that under the proposed constitution, it will be in the power of the Congress to raise and maintain a standing army for their support, and when they are supported by an army, it will depend on themselves to say whether any amendments shall be made in favor of liberty.

If these reflections are just it becomes us to pause, and reflect previously 3.3.4
before we establish a system of government which cannot be amended; which will entail happiness or misery on ourselves and our children. We ought I say to reflect carefully, we ought not by any means to be in haste; but rather to suffer a little temporary inconvenience, than by any precipitation to establish a constitution without knowing whether it is right or wrong, and which if wrong, no length of time will ever mend. Scarce any people ever deliberately gave up their liberties; but many instances occur in history of their losing them forever by a rash and sudden act, to avoid a pressing inconvenience or gratify some violent passion of revenge or fear. It was a celebrated observation of one of our Assemblies before the revolution, during their struggles with the proprietaries, that "those who would give up essential liberty to purchase a little temporary safety deserve neither liberty nor safety."[4]

For the present I shall conclude with recommending to my countrymen 3.3.5
not to be in haste, to consider carefully what we are doing. It is our own concern; it is our own business; let us give ourselves a little time at least to read the proposed constitution and know what it contains; for I fear that many, even of those who talk most about it have not even read it, and many others, who are as much concerned as any of us, have had no opportunity to read it. And it is certainly a suspicious circumstance that some people who are presumed to know most about the new constitution, seem bent upo forcing it on their countrymen without giving them time to know what they are doing.

Hereafter I may trouble you further on some other parts of this important subject; but I fear this letter is already too long.

Yours.
An Old Whig.

II

Mr. Printer,

3.3.6 Since writing my last, in which I stated some doubts respecting the new federal constitution and expressed a wish that those doubts might be removed, I have met with the printed speech of James Wilson, Esquire.—This speech I find was made for the express purpose of removing objections from the minds of those who doubted, like myself, and wished to be satisfied; and except one or two hard names that have escaped the speaker, it bears the marks of more candor than is to be found in most of the production, which have been ushered into the world in support of the same measure. This speech also deserves the more attention as coming from a man of abilities fresh from "the impressions of four months constant attention to the subject."[5] The subject however is one of those which it imports us all very carefully to examine. I have therefore paid very considerable attention to his arguments, at the same time that I have examined with some care the foundation upon which they are built. Still I remain unsatisfied; and the more unsatisfied, as I have been disappointed in my hope of conviction, from a quarter, from which so much was to be expected—You will give me leave therefore to state shortly in your paper, some of those difficulties which still remain with me.

3.3.7 The first principle which the gentleman endeavours to establish in his speech is a very important one, if true; and lays a sure foundation to reason upon, in answer to the objection which is made to the new constitution, from the want of a bill of rights. The principle is this: that "in delegating federal powers, the congressional authority is to be collected, not from tacit implication, but from the positive grant expressed in the instrument of union," "that every thing which is not given is reserved."[6] If this be a just representation of the matter, the authority of the several states will be sufficient to protect our liberties from the encroachments of Congress, without any continental bill of rights; unless the powers which are expressly given to Congress are too large.

3.3.8 Without examining particularly at present, whether the powers expressly given to Congress are too large or too small, I shall beg leave to consider, whether the author of this speech is sufficiently accurate in his statement of the proposition above referred to.—To strip it of unnecessary words, the position may be reduced to this short sentence, "that every thing which is not expressly given to Congress is reserved";[7] or in other words "that Congress cannot exercise any power or authority that is not in express words delegated to them."—This certainly is the case under the first articles of confederation which hitherto have been the rule and standard of the powers of Congress; for in the second of those articles "each state retains its sovereignty[,] freedom and independence and every power, jurisdiction and right which is not by this confederation expressly delegated to the United States in Congress assembled." It was the misfortune of these articles of confederation that they did not by express words give to Congress power sufficient for the purposes of the union; for Congress could not go beyond those powers so expressly given. The position of the speech, therefore is strictly true if applied to the first articles of confederation; "that every thing which is not expressly given is reserved." We are not however to suppose that the speaker meant insidiously to argue from an article in the old confederation in favor of the new constitution, unless the same thing was also in the new constitution. Let us then fairly examine whether in the proposed new constitution there be any thing from which the gentleman can be justified in this opinion, "that every thing which is not expressly given to Congress is reserved."

3.3.9 In the first place then it is most certain that we find no such clause or article in the new constitution. There is nothing in the new constitution which either in form or substance bears the least resemblance to the second article of the confederation. It might nevertheless be a fair argument to insist upon from the nature of delegated powers, that no more power is given in such cases than is expressly given. Whether or not this ground of argument would be such as we might safely rest our liberties upon; or whether it would be more prudent to stipulate expressly as is done in the present confederation for the reservation of all such powers as are not expressly given, it is hardly necessary to determine at present. It strikes me that by the proposed constitution, so far from the reservation of all powers that are not expressly given, the future Congress will be fully authorised to assume all such powers as they in their wisdom or wickedness, according as the one or the other may happen to prevail, shall from time to time think proper to assume.

3.3.10 Let us weigh this matter carefully; for it is certainly of the utmost importance, and, if I am right in my opinion, the new constitution vests Congress with such unlimited powers as ought never to be entrusted to any men or body of men. It is justly observed that the possession of sovereign power is a temptation too great for human nature to resist; and although we have read in history of one or two illustrious characters who have refused to enslave their country when it was in their power;—although we have seen one illustrious character in our own times resisting the possession of power when set in competition with his duty to his country, yet these instances are so very rare, that it would be worse than madness to trust to the chance of their being often repeated.

3.3.11 To proceed then with the enquiry, whether the future Congress will be restricted to those powers which are expressly given to them. I would observe that in the opinion of Montesquieu, and of most other writers, ancient as well as modern, the legislature is the sovereign power.[8] It is certainly the most important. If any one doubts this, let him reflect upon the frequent inroads which the legislature of Pennsylvania has made upon the other branches of government: Inroads which it is much to be feared, if the powers of government in Pennsylvania should ever in time to come be an object worth contending about, no council of censors will ever be able to check or restrain.[9] Let us then see what are the powers expressly given to the legislature of Congress, and what checks are interposed in the way of the continental legislature's assuming what further power they shall think proper to assume.

3.3.12 To this end let us look to the first article of the proposed new constitution, which treats of the legislative powers of Congress; and to the eighth section which pretends to define those powers. We find here that the congress, in its legislative capacity, shall have the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties and excises; to borrow money; to regulate commerce; to fix the rule for naturalization and the laws of bankruptcy; to coin money; to punish counterfeiters; [to] establish post offices and post roads; to secure copy rights to authors; to constitute tribunals; to define and punish piracies; to declare war; to raise and support armies; to provide and support a navy; to make rules for the army and navy; to call forth the militia; to organize, arm and discipline the militia; to exercise absolute power[10] over a district of ten miles square, independant of all the state legislatures, and to be alike absolute over all forts, magazines, arsenals, dockyards and other needful buildings thereunto belonging." This is a short abstract of the powers expressly given to Congress. These powers are very extensive, but I shall not stay at present to inquire whether these express powers were necessary to be given to Congress? whether they are too great or too small? My object is to consider that undefined, unbounded and immense power which is comprised in the following clause;—"And, to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this constitution in the government of the United States; or in any department or offices [officer] thereof."[11] Under such a clause as this can any thing be said to be reserved and kept back from Congress? Can it be said that the Congress have no power but what is expressed? "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper" is in other words to make all such laws which the Congress shall think necessary and proper,—for who shall judge for the legislature what is necessary and proper?—Who shall set themselves above the sovereign?—What inferior legislature shall set itself above the supreme legislature?—To me it appears that no other power on earth can dictate to them or controul them, unless by force; and force either internal or external is one of those calamities which every good man would wish his country at all times to be delivered from.—This generation in America have seen enough of war and its usual concomitants to prevent all of us from wishing to see any more of it;—all except those who make a trade of war. But to the question;—without force what can restrain the Congress from making such laws as they please? What limits are there to their authority?—I fear none at all; for surely it cannot justly be said that they have no power but what is expressly given to them, where by the very terms of their creation they are vested with the powers of making laws in all cases necessary and proper; when from the nature of their power they must necessarily be the judges, what laws are necessary and proper. The British act of Parliament, declaring the power of Parliament to make laws to bind America in all cases whatsoever,[12] was not more extensive; for it is as true as a maxim, that even the British Parliament neither could nor would pass any law in any case in which they did not either deem it necessary and proper to make such law or pretend to deem it so. And in such cases it is not of a farthing consequence whether they really are of opinion that the law is necessary and proper, or only pretend to think so; for who can overrule their pretensions?—No one; unless we had a bill of rights to which we might appeal, and under which we might contend against any assumption of undue power and appeal to the judicial branch of the government to protect us by their judgements. This reasoning I fear Mr. Printer is but too just; and yet, if any man should doubt the truth of it; let me ask him one other question, what is the meaning of the latter part of the clause which vests the Congress with the authority of making all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution ALL OTHER POWERS;—besides the foregoing powers vested, &c. &c. Was it thought that the foregoing powers might perhaps admit of some restraint in their construction as to what was necessary and proper to carry them into execution? Or was it deemed right to add still further that they should not be restrained to the powers already named?—besides the powers already mentioned, other powers may be assumed hereafter as contained by implication in this constitution. The Congress shall judge of what is necessary and proper in all these cases and in all other cases;—in short in all cases whatsoever.

Where then is the restraint? How are Congress bound down to the powers expressly given? what is reserved or can be reserved? 3.3.13

Yet even this is not all—as if it were determined that no doubt should remain, by the sixth article of the constitution it is declared that, "this constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitutions or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding." The Congress are therefore vested with the supreme legislative power, without controul. In giving such immense, such unlimited powers, was there no necessity of a bill of rights to secure to the people their liberties? Is it not evident that we are left wholly dependent on the wisdom and virtue of the men who shall from time to time be the members of Congress? and who shall be able to say seven years hence, the members of Congress will be wise and good men, or of the contrary character.

As I mean to pursue this subject in some other letters, I shall conclude for the present; and am,

Yours,
An Old Whig.

III

Mr. Printer,

3.3.14 "Great men are not always wise,"[13] they have their seasons of inattention, and their moments of frailty and error, in which it is too evident, they are not wholly exempted from the infirmity of human nature. We ought not therefore implicitly to approve and admire, without examination, every act that proceeds even from the best and wisest of mankind. The proposed new plan of federal government, is undoubtedly the work of some of the ablest and best men in this country; but yet we are not, for that reason only, to believe that it is free from imperfection. The convention themselves inform us that the constitution which they offer to us, is the effect of mutual accommodations and concessions, in which mode it is certain that the best and wisest propositions are not always those which are adopted. Indeed it appears to me that, after all the time which has been spent in this business, the convention at the close of their session have been glad to lay hold of any system in which a majority could possibly concur, so as not to separate without doing any thing; and that the model of government now before us, is at least the work of haste and inattention. To be convinced of this, let us turn again to the sixth article, which I have referred to in the close of my last letter. By this article, not only the "proposed constitution and laws of the United States, which shall be made in pursuance thereof"; but also "all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, any thing in the constitutions or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding."—The power of making treaties is vested in the president, with the concurrence of two thirds of the senators present; so that the president and two thirds of the senate have power to make laws in the form of treaties, independent of the legislature itself. If Great Britain, for instance, were willing to enter into a treaty with us, upon terms which would be inconsistent with the liberties of the people and destructive of the very being of a Republic, the consent of our president for the time being, and of two thirds of the senators present, even though the senators present should be but a very small part of the senate, will give such a treaty the validity of a law. What power will there be anywhere to prevent this?—None.—Where all power legislative and executive is vested in one man or one body of men, treaties are made by the same authority which makes the laws; but where the legislature is extinct [distinct?] from the executive, the approbation of the legislature ought to be had, before a treaty should have the force of a law; and even in England the parliament is constantly applied to for their sanction to every treaty which tends to introduce an innovation or the slightest alteration in the laws in being, the law there is not altered by the treaty itself; but by an act of parliament which confirms the treaty, and alters the law so as to accommodate it to the treaty. The King in council has no such power. The only answer which can be made to this objection, which is so obvious, to the power given by the proposed constitution to the executive of making treaties, which shall be the "supreme law of the land," is, that it is not to be supposed they will abuse such power.—But yet we find that men in all ages have abused power, and that it has been the study of patriots and virtuous legislators at all times to restrain power, so as to prevent the abuse of it.—What then ought to be done, it may be asked.—Are treaties to be sent to all the different state legislatures for their approbation? By no means. But no treaty ought to be suffered to alter the law of the land, without the consent of the continental legislatures; the powers of the continental legislatures ought to be exactly defined; and there ought to be a bill of rights firmly established, which neither treaties nor acts of the legislature can alter.

Let us however give fair play to the answer which has been attempted to 3.3.15 be given to this Objection. The author of the speech tells us, that a bill of rights would have been superfluous and absurd; because "no powers are given to Congress but what are expressly given";[14] and "that we shall still enjoy those privileges of which we are not divested either by the intention or the act that brought that body into existence.—For instance, the liberty of the press.—What controul can proceed from the federal government to shackle or destroy that sacred palladium of national freedom?"[15]—What controul!—Suppose that an act of the continental legislature should be passed to restrain the liberty of the press;—to appoint licensers of the press in every town in America;—to limit the number of printers;—and to compel them to give security for their good behaviour, from year to year, as the licenses are renewed: If such a law should be once passed, what is there to prevent the execution of it?—By the sixth article of the proposed constitution, this act of the continental legislature is "the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every state shall be bound thereby, ANY THING IN THE CONSTITUTION OR LAWS OF ANY STATE TO THE CONTRARY NOTWITHSTANDING."—Suppose a printer should be found hardy enough to contravene such a law when made, and to contest the validity of it.—He is prosecuted we will suppose, in this state—he pleads in his defence, that by the constitution of Pennsylvania, it is declared "that the freedom of the press ought not to be restrained."—What will this avail him? The judge will be obliged to declare that "notwithstanding the constitution of any state," this act of the continental legislature which restrains the freedom of the press, is "the supreme law; and we must punish you—The bill of rights of Pennsylvania is nothing here. That bill of rights indeed is binding upon the legislature of Pennsylvania, but it is not binding upon the legislature of the continent." Such must be the language and conduct of courts, as soon as the proposed continental constitution shall be adopted.

3.3.16 As to the trial by jury, the question may be decided in a few words. Any future Congress sitting under the authority of the proposed new constitution, may, if they chuse, enact that there shall be no more trial by jury, in any of the United States; except in the trial of crimes; and this "SUPREME LAW" will at once annul the trial by jury, in all other cases. The author of the speech supposes that no danger "can possibly ensue, since the proceedings of the supreme court are to be regulated by the Congress, which is a faithful representation of the people; and the oppression of government is effectually barred; by declaring that in all criminal cases the trial by jury shall be preserved."[16] Let us examine the last clause of this sentence first.—I know that an affected indifference to the trial by jury has been expressed, by some persons high in the confidence of the present ruling party in some of the states;[17]—and yet for my own part I cannot change the opinion I had early formed of the excellence of this mode of trial even in civil causes. On the other hand I have no doubt that whenever a settled plan shall be formed for the extirpation of liberty, the banishment of jury trials will be one of the means adopted for the purpose.—But how is it that "the oppression of government is effectually barred by declaring that in all criminal cases the trial by jury shall be preserved?"—Are there not a thousand civil cases in which the government is a party?—In all actions for penalties, forfeitures and public debts, as well as many others, the government is a party and the whole weight of government is thrown into the scale of the prosecution[,] yet these are all of them civil causes.—These penalties, forfeitures and demands of public debts may be multiplied at the will and pleasure of government.—These modes of harrassing the subject have perhaps been more effectual than direct criminal prosecutions.—In the reign of Henry the Seventh of England, Empson and Dudley acquired an infamous immortality by these prosecutions for penalties and forfeitures.[18]—Yet all these prosecutions were in the form of civil actions; they are undoubtedly objects highly alluring to a government.—They fill the public coffers and enable government to reward its minions at a cheap rate.—They are a profitable kind of revenge and gratify the officers about a court, who study their own interests more than corporal punishment.—Perhaps they have at all times been more eagerly pursued than mere criminal prosectuions.—Shall trial by jury be taken away in all these cases and shall we still be told that "we are effectually secured against the oppressions of government?" At this rate Judges may sit in the United States, as they did in some instances before the war, without a jury to condemn people's property and extract money from their pockets, to be put into the pockets of the judges themselves who condemn them; and we shall be told that we are safe from the oppression of government.—No, Mr. Printer, we ought not to part with the trial by jury; we ought to guard this and many other privileges by a bill of rights, which cannot be invaded. The reason that is pretended in the speech why such a declaration[,] as a bill of rights requires, cannot be made for the protection of the trial by jury;—"that we cannot with any propriety say 'that the trial by jury shall be as heretofore' in the case of a federal system of jurisprudence,["—][19] is almost too contemptible to merit notice.—Is this the only form of words that language could afford on such an important occasion? Or if it were [,] to what did these words refer when adopted in the constitutions of the states?—Plainly sir, to the trial by juries as established by the common law of England in the state of its purity;—That common law for which we contended so eagerly at the time of the revolution, and which now after the interval of a very few years, by the proposed new constitution we seem ready to abandon forever; at least in that article which is the most invaluable part of it; the trial by jury.

Still however the great answer to all the objections that are made or can be made to the proposed constitution is this;—that there is no danger in trusting the Congress with any power: They will not abuse it. I shall conclude this letter with asking such as are willing to satisfy themselves with this answer only to look back for ten or twelve years and recollect what a mighty change has taken place in the political opinions of many people since that time. If they have forgotten let me beg of them to read over the publications of the years, 1774, 1775, 1776 and 1777. What was the spirit, what was the complaints of those times from Congress down to the smallest meeting of the people? Our present language will be found to give the lie to our former professions; and we have sinned egregiously in wading thro' such an ocean of blood, if we were not well founded in the pretensions upon which we encountered the horrors of a civil war in establishing the revolution.—If such has been the change, as a very short examination will convince any man[,] that has taken place in a few years past, what right have we to trust to the existence of such pure and immaculate virtue in time to come, that we should tamely and implicitly surrender our liberties at discretion into the hands of a government whose constituent members are totally unknown to us. Solomon has told us that no man knows whether a fool or a wise man is to inherit his estate;[20] neither do we know whether honest and virtuous men or knaves and tyrants are to regulate our future councils. Let us then guard ourselves, as far as we can, against the possibility of being enslaved by wicked men, whilst the power of guarding ourselves is in our own hands. I know that the country is distressed; but it is not distressed beyond the power of remedy.—Let us take care that we do not involve ourselves in slavery, from the distresses of which we can never redeem ourselves.

3.3.17

Your's, &c.
An Old Whig.

IV[21]

Mr. Printer,

3.3.18 This is certainly a very important crisis to the people of America; experience seems to have convinced every one, that the articles of confederation, under which Congress have hitherto attempted to regulate the affairs of the United States, are insufficient for the purposes intended; that we are a ruined people unless some alteration can be effected. The public mind has therefore been raised to the highest pitch of expectation, and the evident need of relief from the many distresses, public and private, in which we are involved has reduced us to such a state, that we can hardly endure a disappointment. Scarcely any thing that could be proposed by the convention, in this state of people's minds, would fail of being eagerly embraced. Like a person in the agonies of a violent disease, who is willing to swallow any medicine, that gives the faintest hope of relief; the people stood ready to receive the new constitution, in almost any form in which it could be presented to them. The zealous supporters of the proposed constitution, seem to be not unwilling to avail themselves of this disposition: and therefore it is strongly inculcated, that if we do not adopt this constitution, we shall not be able to establish another, but be left to our present weakness, confusion and distress. If I was pursuaded that this is really the case, I hardly know whether I should vote for rejecting any government however unfriendly to the liberties of the people, which promised to give vigour to the councils of this country; for any government is better than none. However, I do not see that it is by any means impracticable, for us yet to correct such errors and imperfections, as appear to exist in the proposed constitution; and whilst there is a possibility of procuring a better constitution, it is the duty of every good man to accomplish it.

3.3.19 By the proposed constitution, every law, before it passes, is to undergo repeated revisions; and the constitution[s] of every state in the union provide, for the reversion [revision?] of the most trifling laws, either by their passing through different houses of assembly and senate, or by requiring them to be published for the consideration of the people. Why then is a constitution which affects all the inhabitants of the United States, which is to be the foundation of all laws and the source of misery or happiness to one quarter of the globe; why is this to be so hastily adopted or rejected, that it cannot admit of a revision?—If a law to regulate highways, requires to be leisurely considered and undergo the examination of different bodies of men, one after another, before it be passed, why is it that the framing of a constitution for the government of a great people; a work which has been justly considered as the greatest effort of human genius, and which, from the beginning of the world has so often baffled the skill of the wisest men in every age, shall be considered as a thing to be thrown out, in the first shape which it may happen to assume? Where is the impracticability of a revision? Cannot the same power which called the late convention, call another? Are not the people still their own masters? If, when the several state conventions come to consider this constitution, they should not approve of it, in its present form, they may easily apply to Congress and state their objections. Congress may as easily direct the calling another convention, as they did the calling the last. The plan may then be reconsidered, deliberately received and corrected; so as to meet the approbation of every friend to his country. A few months only will be necessary for this purpose; and if we consider the magnitude of the object, we shall deem it well worth a little time and attention—It is much better to pause and reflect beforehand, than to repent when it is too late; when no peaceable remedy will be left us, and unanimity will be forever banished. The struggles of the people against a bad government, when it is once fixed, afford but a gloomy picture in the annals of mankind. They are often unfortunate, they are always destructive of public and private happiness; but the peaceable consent of a people to establish a free and effective government, is one of the most glorious objects that is ever exhibited in the theatre of human affairs. Some I know, have objected, that another convention will not be likely to agree upon any thing—I am far however from being of that opinion. The public voice cries so loudly for a new constitution, that I have no doubt we shall have one of some sort.—My only fear is, that the impatience of the people will lead them to accept the first that is offered them, without examining whether it is right or wrong; and after all, if a new convention cannot agree upon any amendments in the constitution, which is at present proposed, we can still adopt this in its present form; and all further opposition being vain, it is to be hoped we shall be unanimous in endeavouring to make the best of it. The experiment is at least worth trying, and I shall be much astonished, if a new convention called together for the purpose of revising the proposed constitution, do not greatly reform it.

I find that a number of pens are employed, in pointing out the defects in the proposed constitution—Without descending therefore, into minute particulars, I shall confine the remainder of my observations in this letter, to one or two of the most important considerations. 3.3.20

It is beyond a doubt that the new federal constitution, if adopted, will in a great measure destroy, if it do not totally annihilate, the separate governments of the several states. We shall, in effect, become one great Republic.—Every measure of any importance, will be Continental.—What will be the consequence of this? One thing is evident—that no Republic of so great a magnitude, ever did, or ever can exist. But a few years elapsed, from the time in which ancient Rome extended her dominions beyond the bounds of Italy, until the downfal of her Republic; and all political writers agree, that a Republican government can exist only in a narrow territory: but a confederacy of different Republics has, in many instances, existed and flourished for a long time together—The celebrated Helvetian league, which exists at this moment in full vigor, and with unimpaired strength, whilst its origin may be traced to the confines of antiquity, is one, among many examples on this head; and at the same time furnishes an eminent proof of how much less importance it is, that the constituent parts of a confederacy of Republics may be rightly framed than it is, that the confederacy itself should be rightly organized;—for hardly any two of the Swiss cantons have the same form of government, and they are almost equally divided in their religious principles, which have so often rent asunder the firmest establishments.[22] A confederacy of Republics must be the establishment in America, or we must cease altogether to retain the Republican form of government. From the moment we become one great Republic, either in form or substance, the period is very shortly removed, when we shall sink first into monarchy, and then into despotism.—If there were no other fault in the proposed constitution, it must sink by its own weight. The continent of North-America can no more be governed by one Republic, than the fabled Atlas could support the heavens. Is it not worthy a few months labour, to attempt the rescuing this country from the despotism, which at this moment holds the best and fairest regions of the earth in thraldom and wretchedness?—To attempt the forming a plan of confederation, which may may enable us at once to support our continental union with vigor and efficacy, and to maintain the rights of the separate states and the invaluable liberty of the subject? These ideas of political felicity, to some people, may seem like the visions of an Utopian fancy; and I am persuaded that some amongst us have as little disposition to realize them, as they have to recollect the principles, which inspired us in our revolt from Great-Britain. But there is at least, this consolation in aiming at excellence, that, if we do not obtain our object, we can make considerable progress towards it.—The science of politics has very seldom had fair play. So much of passion, interest and temporary prospects of gain are mixed in the pursuit, that a government has been much oftener established[,] with a view to the particular advantages or necessities of a few individuals, than to the permanent good of society. If the men, who, at different times, have been entrusted to form plans of government for the world, had been really actuated by no other views than a regard to the public good, the condition of human nature in all ages would have been widely different, from that which has been exhibited to us in history. In this country perhaps we are possessed of more than our share of political virtue. If we will exercise a little patience, and bestow our best endeavours on the business, I do not think it impossible, that we may yet form a federal constitution, much superior to any form of government, which has ever existed in the world;—but, whenever this important work shall be accomplished, I venture to pronounce, that it will not be done without a careful attention to the framing of a bill of rights.

3.3.21 Much has been said and written, on the subject of a bill of rights;—possibly without sufficient attention to the necessity of conveying distinct and precise ideas of the true meaning of a bill or rights. Your readers, I hope, will excuse me, if I conclude this letter with an attempt to throw some light on this subject.

3.3.22 Men when they enter into society, yield up a part of their natural liberty, for the sake of being protected by government. If they yield up all their natural rights they are absolute slaves to their governors. If they yield up less than is necessary, the government is so feeble, that it cannot protect them.—To yield up so much, as is necessary for the purposes of government; and to retain all beyond what is necessary, is the great point, which ought, if possible, to be attained in the formation of a constitution. At the same time that by these means, the liberty of the subject is secured, the government is really strengthened; because wherever the subject is convinced that nothing more is required from him, than what is necessary for the good of the community, he yields a chearful obedience, which is more useful than the constrained service of slaves.—To define what portion of his natural liberty, the subject shall at all times be entitled to retain, is one great end of a bill of rights. To these may be added in a bill of rights some particular engagements of protection, on the part of government[;] without such a bill of rights, firmly securing the privileges of the subject, the government is always in danger of degenerating into tyranny; for it is certainly true, that "in establishing the powers of government, the rulers are invested with every right and authority, which is not in explicit terms reserved."[23]—Hence it is, that we find the rulers so often lording over the people at their will and pleasure. Hence it is that we find the patriots, in all ages of the world, so very solicitous to obtain explicit engagements from their rulers, stipulating, expressly, for the preservation of particular rights and privileges.

3.3.23 In different nations, we find different grants or reservations of privileges appealed to in the struggles between the rulers and the people, many of which in the different nations of Europe, have long since been swallowed up and lost by time, or destroyed by the arbitrary hand of power. In England we find the people, with the Barons at their head, exacting a solemn resignation of their rights from king John, in their celebrated magna charta, which was many times renewed in Parliament, during the reigns of his successors. The petition of rights was afterwards consented to by Charles the first, and contained a declaration of the liberties of the people. The habeas corpus act, after the restoration of Charles the Second, the bill of rights, which was obtained from the Prince and Princess of Orange on their accession to the throne[,] and the act of settlement, at the accession of the Hanover family, are other instances to shew the care and watchfulness of that nation, to improve every opportunity, of the reign of a weak prince, or the revolution in their government, to obtain the most explicit declarations in favor of their liberties. In like manner the people of the country, at the revolution, having all power in their own hands, in forming the constitutions of the several states, took care to secure themselves by bills of rights, so as to prevent, as far as possible, the encroachments of their future rulers upon the rights of the people. Some of these rights are said to be unalienable, such as the rights of conscience: yet even these have been often invaded, where they have not been carefully secured by express and solemn bills and declarations in their favor.

3.3.24 Before we establish a government, whose acts will be THE SUPREME LAW OF THE LAND, and whose power will extend to almost every case without exception, we ought carefully to guard ourselves by a BILL OF RIGHTS, against the invasion of those liberties which it is essential for us to retain, which it is of no real use to government to strip us of; but which in the course of human events have been too often insulted with all the wantonness of an idle barbarity.

Your's,
An Old Whig.

V[24]

Mr. Printer,

3.3.25 In order that people may be sufficiently impressed, with the necessity of establishing a BILL OF RIGHTS in the forming of a new constitution, it is very proper to take a short view of some of those liberties, which it is of the greatest importance for Freemen to retain to themselves, when they surrender up a part of their natural rights for the good of society.

3.3.26 The first of these, which it is of the utmost importance for the people to retain to themselves, which indeed they have not even the right to surrender, and which at the same time it is of no kind of advantage[25] to government to strip them of, is the LIBERTY OF CONSCIENCE. I know that a ready answer is at hand, to any objections upon this head. We shall be told that in this enlightened age, the rights of conscience are perfectly secure: There is no necessity of guarding them; for no man has the remotest thoughts of invading them. If this be the case, I beg leave to reply that now is the very time to secure them.—Wise and prudent men always take care to guard against danger beforehand, and to make themselves safe whilst it is yet in their power to do it without inconvenience or risk.—[W]ho shall answer for the ebbings and flowings of opinion, or be able to say what will be the fashionable frenzy of the next generation? It would have been treated as a very ridiculous supposition, a year ago, that the charge of witchcraft would cost a person her life in the city of Philadelphia; yet the fate of the unhappy old woman called Corbmaker, who was beaten—repeatedly wounded with knives—mangled and at last killed in our streets, in obedience to the commandment which requires "that we shall not suffer a witch to live," without a possibility of punishing or even of detecting the authors of this inhuman folly, should be an example to warn us how little we ought to trust to the unrestrained discretion of human nature.

Uniformity of opinion in science, morality, politics or religion, is undoubtedly a very great happiness to mankind; and there have not been wanting zealous champions in every age, to promote the means of securing so invaluable a blessing. If in America we have not lighted up fires to consume Heretics in religion, if we have not persecuted unbelievers to promote the unity of the faith, in matters which pertain to our final salvation in a future world, I think we have all of us been witness to something very like the same spirit, in matters which are supposed to regard our political salvation in this world. In Boston it seems at this very moment, that no man is permitted to publish a doubt of the infalibility of the late convention, without giving up his name to the people, that he may be delivered over to speedy destruction; and it is but a short time since the case was little better in this city.[26] Now this is a portion of the very same spirit, which has so often kindled the fires of the inquisition: and the same Zealot who would hunt a man down for a difference of opinion upon a political question which is the subject of public enquiry, if he should happen to be fired with zeal for a particular species of religion, would be equally intolerant. The fact is, that human nature is still the same that ever it was: the fashion indeed changes; but the seeds of superstition, bigotry and enthusiasm, are too deeply implanted in our minds, ever to be eradicated; and fifty years hence, the French may renew the persecution of the Huguenots, whilst the Spaniards in their turn may become indifferent to their forms of religion. They are idiots who trust their future security to the whim of the present hour. One extreme is always apt to produce the contrary, and those countries, which are now the most lax in their religious notions, may in a few years become the most rigid, just as the people of this country from not being able to bear any continental government at all, are now flying into the opposite extreme of surrendering up all the powers of the different states, to one continental government. 3.3.27

The more I reflect upon the history of mankind, the more I am disposed to 3.3.28 think that it is our duty to secure the essential rights of the people, by every precaution; for not an avenue has been left unguarded, through which oppression could possibly enter in any government[,] without some enemy of the public peace and happiness improving the opportunity to break in upon the liberties of the people; and none have been more frequently successful in the attempt, than those who have covered their ambitious designs under the garb of a fiery zeal for religious orthodoxy. What has happened in other countries and in other ages, may very possibly happen again in our own country, and for aught we know, before the present generation quits the stage of life. We ought therefore in a bill of rights to secure, in the first place, by the most express stipulations, the sacred rights of conscience. Has this been done in the constitution, which is now proposed for the consideration of the people of this country?—Not a word on this subject has been mentioned in any part of it; but we are left in this important article, as well as many others, entirely to the mercy of our future rulers.

3.3.29 But supposing our future rulers to be wicked enough to attempt to invade the rights of conscience; I may be asked how will they be able to effect so horrible a design? I will tell you my friends—The unlimited power of taxation will give them the command of all the treasures of the continent; a standing army will be wholly at their devotion, and the authority which is given them over the militia, by virtue of which they may, if they please, change all the officers of the militia on the continent in one day, and put in new officers whom they can better trust; by which they can subject all the militia to strict military laws, and punish the disobedient with death, or otherwise, as they shall think right: by which they can march the militia back and forward from one end of the continent to the other, at their discretion; these powers, if they should ever fall into bad hands, may be abused to the worst of purposes. Let us instance one thing arising from this right of organizing and governing the militia. Suppose a man alledges that he is conscientiously scrupulous of bearing Arms.—By the bill of rights of Pennsylvania he is bound only to pay an equivalent for his personal service.[27]—What is there in the new proposed constitution to prevent his being dragged like a Prussian soldier to the camp and there compelled to bear arms?—This will depend wholly upon the wisdom and discretion of the future legislature of the continent in the framing their militia laws; and I have lived long enough to hear the practice of commuting personal service for a paltry fine in time of war and foreign invasion most severely reprobated by some persons who ought to have judged more rightly on the subject—Such flagrant oppressions as these I dare say will not happen at the beginning of the new government; probably not till the powers of government shall be firmly fixed; but it is a duty we owe to ourselves and our posterity if possible to prevent their ever happening. I hope and trust that there are few persons at present hardy enough to entertain thoughts of creating any religious establishment for this country; although I have lately read a piece in the newspaper, which speaks of religious as well as civil and military offices, as being hereafter to be disposed of by the new government;[28] but if a majority of the continental legislature should at any time think fit to establish a form of religion, for the good people of this continent, with all the pains and penalties which in other countries are annexed to the establishment of a national church, what is there in the proposed constitution to hinder their doing so? Nothing; for we have no bill of rights, and every thing therefore is in their power and at their discretion. And at whose discretion? We know not any more than we know the fates of those generations which are yet unborn.

3.3.30 It is needless to repeat the necessity of securing other personal rights in the forming a new government. The same argument which proves the necessity of securing one of them shews also the necessity of securing others. Without a bill of rights we are totally insecure in all of them; and no man can promise himself with any degree of certainty that his posterity will enjoy the inestimable blessings of liberty of conscience, of freedom of speech and of writing and publishing their thoughts on public matters, of trial by jury, of holding themselves, their houses and papers free from seizure and search upon general suspicion or general warrants; or in short that they will be secured in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property without depending on the will and pleasure of their rulers.

3.3.31 If we pass over the consideration of this subject so essential to the preservation of our liberties, and turn our eyes to the form of the government which the Convention have proposed to us, I apprehend that changing the prospect will not wholly alleviate our fears.—A few words on this head, will close the present letter. In the first place the office of President of the United States appears to me to be clothed with such powers as are dangerous. To be the fountain of all honors in the United States, commander in chief of the army, navy and milita, with the power of making treaties and of granting pardons, and to be vested with an authority to put a negative upon all laws, unless two thirds of both houses shall persist in enacting it, and put their names down upon calling the yeas and nays for that purpose, is in reality to be a KING as much a King as the King of Great-Britain, and a King too of the worst kind;—an elective King.[29]—If such powers as these are to be trusted in the hands of any man, they ought for the sake of preserving the peace of the community at once to be made hereditary.—Much as I abhor kingly government, yet I venture to pronounce where kings are admitted to rule they should most certainly be vested with hereditary power. The election of a King whether it be in America or Poland, will be a scene of horror and confusion; and I am perfectly serious when I declare that, as a friend to my country, I shall despair of any happiness in the United States until his office is either reduced to a lower pitch of power or made perpetual and hereditary.—When I say that our future President will be as much a king as the king of Great-Britain, I only ask of my readers to look into the constitution of that country, and then tell me what important prerogative the King of Great-Britain is entitled to, which does not also belong to the President during his continuance in office.—The King of Great-Britain it is true can create nobility which our President cannot; but our President will have the power of making all the great men, which comes to the same thing.—All the difference is that we shall be embroiled in contention about the choice of the man, whilst they are at peace under the security of an hereditary succession.—To be tumbled headlong from the pinnacle of greatness and be reduced to a shadow of departed royalty is a shock almost too great for human nature to endure.[30] It will cost a man many struggles to resign such eminent powers, and ere long, we shall find, some one who will be very unwilling to part with them.—Let us suppose this man to be a favorite with his army, and that they are unwilling to part with their beloved commander in chief; or to make the thing familiar, let us suppose, a future President and commander in chief adored by his army and the militia to as great a degree as our late illustrious commander in chief; and we have only to suppose one thing more, that this man is without the virtue, the moderation and love of liberty which possessed the mind of our late general, and this country will be involved at once in war and tyranny. So far is it from its being improbable that the man who shall hereafter be in a situation to make the attempt to perpetuate his own power, should want the virtues of General Washington; that it is perhaps a chance of one hundred millions to one that the next age will not furnish an example of so disinterested a use of great power. We may also suppose, without trespassing upon the bounds of probability, that this man may not have the means of supporting in private life the dignity of his former station; that like Caesar, he may be at once ambitious and poor, and deeply involved in debt.—Such a man would die a thousand deaths rather than sink from the heights of splendor and power into obscurity and wretchedness. We are certainly about giving our president too much or too little; and in the course of less than twenty years we shall find that we have given him enough to enable him to take all. It would be infinitely more prudent to give him at once as much as would content him, so that we might be able to retain the rest in peace; for if once power is seized by violence not the least fragment of liberty will survive the shock. I would therefore advise my countrymen seriously to ask themselves this question;—Whether they are prepared TO RECEIVE A KING? If they are[,] to say so at once, and make the kingly office hereditary; to frame a constitution that should set bounds to his power, and, as far as possible secure the liberty of the subject. If we are not prepared to receive a king, let us call another convention to revise the proposed constitution, and form it anew on the principles of confederacy of free republics; but by no means, under pretence of a republic, to lay the foundation for a military government, which is the worst of all tyrannies.

Yours, &c.
An Old Whig.

VI

Mr. Printer,

I think it is an observation of Dean Swift, that, in political matters, all men 3.3.32 can feel, though all cannot see.[31] Agreeably to this doctrine we find, that the necessity of giving additional powers to Congress is at length felt by all men, though it was not foreseen by a great number of the people. As the states, individually could not protect our trade, foreign nations, friends as well as enemies, have combined against it; and at the same time that our trade is more beneficial to any nation in Europe, than the trade of any nation in Europe is to us, because we export provisions and raw materials and receive manufactures in return: we are not suffered to be the carriers of our own produce—foreign bottoms engross the whole of our carrying trade, and we are obliged to pay them for doing that which it is the interest of every people to do for themselves. Our shipwrights are starved, our seamen driven abroad for want of employ, our timber left useless on our hands, our iron-works, once a very profitable branch of business, now almost reduced to nothing, and our money banished from the country. These with the train of concomitant evils which always attend the loss of trade, or a state of trade which is unprofitable, have justly alarmed us all; and I am firmly pursuaded that scarcely a man of common sense can be found, that does not wish for an efficient federal government, and lament that it has been delayed so long. Yet at the same time it is a matter of immense consequence, in establishing a government which is to last for ages, and which, if it be suffered to depart from the principles of liberty in the beginning, will in all probability, never return to them, that we consider carefully what sort of government we are about to form. Power is very easily encreased; indeed it naturally grows in every government; but it hardly ever lessens.

The misfortunes under which we have for some time laboured, and which 3.3.33 still press us severely, would be in a great measure alleviated, if not wholly removed, by devolving upon Congress the power of regulating trade and laying and collecting duties and imposts. If these powers were once fully vested in Congress, trade would immediately assume a new face, money and people would flow in upon us, and the vast tracts of ungranted lands would be a mine of wealth for many years to come. I am pursuaded, that with this addition to the powers of Congress, we should soon find them sufficient for every purpose; and it is very certain that if we did not find them sufficient, we could easily encrease them. But instead of being contented with this, the late convention by their proposed constitution, seem to have resolved to give the new continental government every kind of power whatsoever, throughout the United States. This power I have already attempted to shew, is not limited by any stipulations in favour of the liberty of the subject, and it is easy to shew, that it will be equally unchecked by any restraint from the individual states. The treasure of the whole continent will be entirely at their command. "The Congress shall have power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises." And what are the individual states to do, or how are they to subsist? may they also lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises? If they should, the miserable subject will be like sheep twice shorne; the skin must follow the fleece. But the fact is, that no individual state can collect a penny, unless by the permission of Congress; for the "laws of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, any thing in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary, notwithstanding."[32] The laws of the individual states, will be only Leges sub graviore Lege: for the power of enacting laws necessarily implies the power of repealing laws; and therefore Congress, being the supreme legislatures, may annul or repeal the laws of the individual states, whenever they please. Not a single source of revenue will remain to any state, which Congress may not stop at their sovereign will and pleasure; for if any state attempt to impose a tax or levy a duty, contrary to the inclination of Congress, they have only to exert their supreme legislative power and the law imposing such tax or duty, is done away in a moment. For instance, it will very soon be found inconvenient to have two sets of excise officers in each town or county in every state, they will be in danger of clashing with each other, it will then be found "necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers vested by the constitution in the government of the United States, or in some department or officer thereof," to forbid the individual states to levy any more excise. Congress may chuse to impose a stamp-duty. It will be very inconvenient for people to run back and forward to different offices, to procure double stamps, and therefore it will be thought "necessary and proper" to forbid any state to meddle with stamp-duties. The same will be the case with many other taxes. They will be in danger of clashing with each other, if Congress and the several states should happen to lay taxes on the same article. The States therefore individually, will be restrained from imposing any taxes upon such articles as Congress shall think proper to tax. They must then try to find out other articles for taxation, which Congress have not thought proper to touch. This I fear will be a difficult task: for the expensive court to be maintained by the great president, the pay of the standing army and the numerous crouds of hungry expectants, who have lost their all, and it will be said, have lost it by their zeal for the new constitution, must necessarily employ the sharpest wits among their ablest financiers, to devise every possible mode of taxation; and besides, if an individual state should hit upon a new tax that should happen to be productive, there is no doubt but it would soon be taken from it and appropriated to the use of the United States. The inhabitants of the TEN MILE SQUARE, would find ways and means to dispose of all the money that could possibly be raised in every part of the United States. What then will become of the separate governments? They will be annihilated; absolutely annihilated; for no man will ever submit to the wretchedness and contempt of holding any office under them.

3.3.34 The advocates of the proposed constitution, seem to be aware of the difficulty I have hinted at, and therefore it is, I presume, that in conversation as well as in their publications, we are told that under the proposed constitution,"direct taxation will be unnecessary"; that "it is probable the principal branch of revenue will be duties on imports."[33] Some of those who have used such language in public and private, I believe to be very honest men; and I would therefore ask of them, what security they can give us, that the future government of the continent will in any measure confine themselves to the duties upon imports, or that the utmost penny will not be exacted which can possibly be collected either by direct or indirect taxation? How can they answer for the conduct of our future rulers? We have heard enough of these fair promises for the good behaviour of men in office, to learn to doubt of their fulfilment[;] unless we guard ourselves by much better security, there will be no bounds to the new government. They will not have as much to spare for the separate states to collect as Lazarus picked up of the fragments from the rich man's table. There are mouths at this moment gaping in the United States for all that can possibly be collected;—a confederacy is already formed for dividing the public cake to the last crum; and I wish they may not quarrel for more.

3.3.35 But if I were mistaken in this opinion; if in the language of these gentlemen, "it is probable that the principal branch of the public revenue will be duties on imports";—if it is probable that these with the back lands and the post-office will be sufficient, where was the necessity of being in such haste to grant more;—to grant all without limits or restrictions? Men do not usually give up their whole purse where they can pay with part. Why might we not try at least how far the customs and back lands would go before we give all away from the separate states, without reserving any thing for their support.

3.3.36 The true line of distinction which should have been drawn in describing the powers of Congress, and those of the several states, should have been that between internal and external taxation.[34] I am persuaded that the existence of the several states in their separate capacities, and of the United States in their collective capacity, depends upon the maintaining such distinction. Without the power of imposing duties on foreign commerce and regulating trade, the United States will be weak and contemptible, and, indeed, their union must be speedily dissolved: And on the other hand, if the Legislature of the United States shall possess the powers of internal as well as external taxation, the individual states in their separate capacities, will be less than the shadows of a name.

3.3.37 I observe that the late delegates of Connecticut, in their letter to the Governor, speak of the power of direct taxation as an authority which need not be exercised if each state will "furnish the quota."[35] Yet there is no doubt but they may exercise this power if they choose to do it; and they alone will have the right of judging what quotas the several states shall be required to furnish. They may ask as much as they please, and if the states do not furnish all they ask, they may tax at their pleasure; under these circumstances the power of internal taxation will undoubtedly by exercised by the Continental Legislature. If it be said that it is to be expected that the Congress will exercise this power with moderation, I venture to pronounce that those who indulge such hopes, are not acquainted with the principles of human nature. Independent of the multitudinous expectations which the followers of the proposed Constitution entertain in their own favor, which alone, if gratified, would consume the treasures of two such continents as this; there is a spirit of rivalship in power, which will not suffer two suns to shine in the same firmament, one will speedily darken the other, and the individual states will be as totally eclipsed, as the stars in the meridian blaze of the sun. We have seen too much of this spirit in the several states, under the present loose and futile confederation. A jealousy of the powers of Congress in the separate states, which is founded in the same rivalship of power, and which, however contemptible it may appear, was alike founded in the principles of human nature, may furnish us an exemplary lesson upon this head: And when we verge to the other extreme by vesting all power in Congress, we shall find them equally jealous of any power in the individual states, and equally possessed of the same spirit of rivalship, which heretofore denied the necessary supplies from the states to Congress.—We shall never be able to support the collective powers of the United States in Congress, and the powers of the individual states in their separate capacities, without drawing the line fairly between them. If we leave the states individually to the mercy of the Continental Government, they will be stript of the last penny which is necessary for their support; if we give all powers to one, there will be nothing left for the others. The lust of dominion, where it is indulged, will swallow up the whole.

3.3.38 But I shall be told that if Congress are left to depend upon requisitions from the individual states for any part of the necessary supplies, the same difficulty will remain which has hitherto existed; and I may be asked, what shall we do if the supplies should fall short? I answer that although nothing but a very serious necessity of money for continental purposes will ever procure supplies upon requisition from the separate states, yet when that necessity exists in any degree that is really alarming to the whole community, I do not think that such supplies are to be dispaired of. We have seen many instances of aid being furnished, even voluntarily upon pressing occasions, which should teach us to rely on the exertions of the states upon occasions of real and not mere imaginary necessity. One thing will certainly follow from the Continental Government being restrained to external taxation;—that it will be under the necessity of exercising more oeconomy than it has done, especially during the late war. We have been witnesses of such a profuse expenditure of public money at some periods, as these states could never support. This profusion ought to convince us that if all the treasures of the continent are intrusted to the power of Congress, there is too much reason to fear that the whole will be consumed by them, and nothing left to the individual states; and judging from past experience we may venture to presage that the people will be fleeced without mercy, if no check is maintained upon the power of Congress in the articles of taxation.

We ought to be very fully convinced of an absolute necessity existing 3.3.39 before we entrust the whole power of taxation to the hands of Congress; and the moment we do so, we ought by consent to annihilate the individual states; for the powers of the individual states will be as effectually swallowed as a drop of water in the ocean; and the next consequence will be a speedy dissolution of our republican form of government.

Yours, &c.
An Old Whig.

VII

Mr. Printer,

Many people seem to be convinced that the proposed constitution is liable 3.3.40 to a number of important objections; that there are defects in it which ought to be supplied, and errors which ought to be amended; but they apprehend that we must either receive this constitution in its present form, or be left without any continental government whatsoever. To be sure, if this were the case, it would be most prudent for us, like a man who is wedded to a bad wife, to submit to our misfortune with patience, and make the best of a bad bargain. But if we will summon up resolution sufficient to examine into our true circumstances, we shall find that we are not in so deplorable a situation as people have been taught to believe, from the suggestions of interested men, who wish to force down the proposed plan of government without delay, for the purpose of providing offices for themselves and their friends. We shall find, that, with a little wisdom and patience, we have it yet in our power, not only to establish a federal constitution, but to establish a good one.

It is true that the continental convention has directed their proposed 3.3.41 constitution to be laid before a convention of delegates to be chosen in each state, "for their assent and ratification," which seems to preclude the idea of any power in the several conventions, of proposing any alterations, or indeed of even rejecting the plan proposed, if they should disapprove of it. Still, however, the question recurs, what authority the late convention had to bind the people of the United States, to any particular form of government, or to forbid them to adopt such form of government as they should think fit. I know it is a language frequent in the mouths of some heaven-born PHAETONS amongst us, who like the son of Apollo, think themselves entitled to guide the chariot of the sun; that common people have no right to judge of the affairs of government; that they are not fit for it; that they should leave these matters to their superiors.[36] This however, is not the language of men of real understanding, even among the advocates for the proposed constitution; but these still recognize the authority of the people, and will admit, at least in words, that the people have a right to be consulted. Then I ask, if the people in the different states have a right to be consulted, in the new form of continental government, what authority could the late convention have to preclude them from proposing amendments to the plan they should offer? Had the convention any right to bind the people to the form of government they should propose? Let us consider this matter.

3.3.42 The late convention were chosen by the general assembly of each state; they had the sanction of Congress;—for what? To consider what alterations were necessary to be made in the articles of confederation. What have they done? They have made a new constitution for the United States. I will not say, that in doing so, they have exceeded their authority; but on the other hand, I trust that no man of understanding amongst them will pretend to say, that any thing they did or could do, was of the least avail to lessen the rights of the people to judge for themselves in the last resort. This right, is perhaps, unalienable, but at all events, there is no pretence for saying that this right was ever meant to be surrendered up into the hands of the late continental convention.

3.3.43 The people have an undoubted right to judge of every part of the government which is offered to them: No power on earth has a right to preclude them; and they may exercise this choice either by themselves or their delegates legally chosen to represent them in the State-Convention.—I venture to say that no man, reasoning upon revolution principles, can possibly controvert this right.

3.3.44 Indeed very few go so far as to controvert the right of the people to propose amendments; but we are told that the thing is impracticable; that if we begin to propose amendments there will be no end to them; that the several states will never agree in their amendments; that we shall never unite in any plan; that if we reject this we shall either have a worse or none at all; that we ought therefore to adopt this at once, without alteration or amendment.—Now these are very kind gentlemen, who insist upon doing so much good for us, whether we will or not. Idiots and maniacs ought certainly to be restrained from doing themselves mischief, and should be compelled to that which is for their own good. Whether the people of America are to be considered in this light, and treated accordingly, is a question which deserves, perhaps, more consideration than it has yet received. A contest between the patients and their doctors, which are mad or which are fools, might possibly be a very unhappy one. I hope at least that we shall be able to settle this important business without so preposterous a dispute. What then would you have us do, it may be asked? Would you have us adopt the proposed Constitution or reject it? I answer that I would neither wish the one nor the other. Though I would be far from pretending to dictate to the representatives of the people what steps ought to be pursued, yet a method seems to present itself so simple, so perfectly calculated to obviate all difficulties, to reconcile us with one another, and establish unanimity and harmony among the people of this country, that I cannot forbear to suggest it. I hope that most of my readers have already anticipated me in what I am about to propose. Whether they have or not, I shall venture to state it, in the humble expectations that it may have some tendency to reconcile honest men of all parties with one another.

The method I would propose is this— 3.3.45

1st. Let the Conventions of each state, as they meet, after considering the proposed Constitution, state their objections and propose their amendments.

So far from these objections and amendments clashing with each other in irreconcileable discord, as it has been too often suggested they would do, it appears that from what has been hitherto published in the different states in opposition to the proposed Constitution, we have a right to expect that they will harmonize in a very great degree. The reason I say so, is, that about the same time, in very different parts of the continent, the very same objections have been made, and the very same alterations proposed by different writers, who I verily believe, know nothing at all of each other, and were very far from acting a premeditated concert, and that others who have not appeared as writers in the newspapers, in the different states, have appeared to act and speak in perfect unison with those objections and amendments, particularly in the article of a Bill of Rights. That in short, the very same sentiments seem to have been echoed from the different parts of the continent by the opposers of the proposed Constitution; and these sentiments have been very little contradicted by its friends, otherwise than by suggesting their fears, that by opposing the Constitution at present proposed, we might be disappointed of any federal government or receive a worse one than the present.—It would be a most delightful surprize to find ourselves all of one opinion at last; and I cannot forbear hoping that when we come fairly to compare our sentiments, we shall find ourselves much more nearly agreed than in the hurry and surprize in which we have been involved on this subject, we ever suffered ourselves to imagine.[37]

2d. When the Conventions have stated these objections and amendments, 3.3.46
let them transmit them to Congress and adjourn, praying that Congress will direct another Convention to be called from the different states, to consider of these objections and amendments, and pledging themselves to abide by whatever decision shall be made by such future Convention on the subject;

whether it be to amend the proposed Constitution or to reject any alteration and ratify it as it stands.

3.3.47 3d. If a new Convention of the United States should meet, and revise the proposed Constitution, let us agree to abide by their decision.—It is past a doubt that every good citizen of America pants for an efficient federal government—I have no doubt we shall concur at last in some plan of continental government, even if many people could imagine exceptions to it; but if the exceptions which are made at present, shall be maturely considered and even be pronounced by our future representatives as of no importance; (which I trust they will not) even in that case, I have no doubt that almost every man, will give up his own private opinion and concur in that decision.

3.3.48 4th. If by any means another Continental Convention should fail to meet, then let the Conventions of the several states again assemble and at last decide the great solemn question whether we shall adopt the Constitution now proposed, or reject it? And, whenever it becomes necessary to decide upon this point, one at least who from the beginning has been invariably anxious for the liberty and independence of his country, will concur in adopting and supporting this Constitution, rather than none;—though I confess I could easily imagine, some other form of confederation, which I should think better entitled to my hearty approbation;—and indeed I am not afraid of a worse.

I am, &c.
An Old Whig.

VIII[38]

Mr. Printer,

3.3.49 It is the fate of political controversies to begin with argument and end with abuse; and hence we find, in many instances, that a subject which for a time, has engaged the most earnest attention of the people, is at length quitted with horror and disgust. The question, however, concerning the total adoption of the plan of government, proposed by the late federal convention, is too important for good men to suffer themselves to be diverted from giving it a full consideration by the bounding of squibs or the whizzing of political firebrands. I therefore persuade myself that a few candid observations on this subject will yet be heard with attention.

3.3.50 The real question is this;—Whether the people of this country ought to adopt the proposed constitution in its present form, without limitation or alteration, or whether we ought to insist upon amendments being made previous to its adoption.

Most men seem to agree that amendments ought to be made in the proposed plan in some stage of the business; and all seem agreed that an efficient form of continental government ought to be established. Shall we then first adopt the constitution and afterwards amend it; or shall we first amend it and afterwards adopt it? Let us for a moment consider the propriety of adopting it first, and trusting to its being afterwards amended. These necessary amendments, after the constitution is adopted, can only be made in one of two ways;—either by our future rulers in the continental legislature by their own act—or in the way provided for in the fifth article, by a convention to be called for proposing amendments, whenever two-thirds of both houses shall deem it necessary, or whenever the legislatures of two-thirds of the states shall make application for that purpose, such amendments afterwards to be valid if ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, if Congress should think proper to call them. This latter mode is so intricate, that an attempt to investigate it is like endeavouring to trace the windings of a labyrinth, and I have therefore observed that people willingly turn aside from the subject, as confused and disgusting. Some former observations on this article[39] I found were very little attended to: However I will attempt once more to find a clue to its mazes, after I shall first have considered that more inviting ground of expectation to which most of those who assume the name of federalists turn their eyes with so much confidence.

First then, the general expectation seems to be that our future rulers will rectify all that is amiss. If a bill of rights is wanting, they will frame a bill of rights. If too much power is vested in them, they will not abuse it; nay, they will divest themselves of it. The very first thing they will do, will be to establish the liberties of the people by good and wholesome ordinances, on so solid a foundation as to baffle all future encroachments from themselves or their successors. Much good no doubt might be done in this way; if Congress should possess the most virtuous inclinations, yet there are some things which it will not be in their power to rectify. For instance; the appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, which is given to the supreme court of the continent, and which annihilates the trial by jury in all civil causes, the Congress can only modify:—They cannot extinguish this power, so destructive to the principles of real liberty. It would not by any means be extravagant to say, that a new continental convention ought to be called, if it were only for the sake of preserving that sacred palladium—THE INESTIMABLE RIGHT OF TRIAL BY JURY.—But even if we were to delude ourselves so far as to believe that it would be entirely in the power of the future legislature to set every thing right, to build up our liberties against all invasions, and to protect us from every political calamity, still we ought not to repose all our liberty and all our happiness in the virtue of our future rulers. I speak not with reference to any particular set of men. I pretend not to know who will be our rulers one year hence. In the state of Pennsylvania I have seen the administration of our constitution in the hands of its bitterest enemies, during near one half of its existence; and I shall not be at all surprized to find that if the new continental government shall be set a-going, that the jockies who at present have vaulted into the saddle, should be the first to be thrown into the dirt and trampled upon; nor, on the other hand, that some of those who are foremost in contending for a permanent security to the rights of the people, should be in the first rank of oppressors. These things have frequently happened; and the only safe way of reasoning on political subjects is, to consider men, abstractly as men, with like passions and infirmities throughout the world, in every age, and every country; and to believe that the same guards and checks against arbitrary power, which were necessary two thousand years ago, are equally necessary at present, and will be so two thousand years hence. Idolatry is the parent of errors in politics as well as religion;—and an implicit confidence in our rulers now, will be abused as much as implicit confidence in priests ever was in the days of superstition. I know well that instances of political moderation may be found, and a tyrant has before now descended from the plenitude of power, satiated with dominion, or worn out with care; but there is not one instance on record in all history of a number of men voluntarily abandoning the powers of an aristocracy. Look at the Decemviri, look at the thirty tyrants of Athens, look at all the lordly aristocracies that ever existed, and shew me one instance—such an instance cannot be shewn. Nay farther, a single monarch has many times used his power with moderation; but a number of men combined in an aristocracy, never knew what moderation meant. They are all struggling to be most powerful, all aiming to enrich themselves and provide for their friends, and all of them plundering the people. And shall we foolishly, after so many thousand examples, trust to the virtue and moderation of our future rulers, to divest themselves of those powers which may be abused to our prejudice, and are no way useful to our protection? Not to insist upon Swift's ludicrous tale of Jack's hanging himself at the instigation of Humphry Hocus, on the promise of being cut down before he should be dead, and when he had hanged himself, of being left to kick his heels in the air,[40] the moral of which, by the bye, is strictly founded in human nature;—let us attend to a more serious fable.—"A man, says Aesop, coming into a wood, begged the trees to grant him the favor of a handle to his axe. The whole forest consented; upon which he provided himself with a strong handle; which he had no sooner done, than he began to fell the trees without number, then the trees, though too late, repented of their weakness, and an universal groan was heard throughout the forest. At length, when the man came to cut down the tree which had furnished him with the handle, the trunk fell to the ground uttering these words: Fool that I was! I have been the cause of my own destruction."[41] If we perish in America, we shall have no better comfort than the same mortifying reflection, that we have been the cause of our own destruction.

3.3.51

I have said that many of the liberties which, by the proposed constitution, 3.3.52 are to be surrendered up into the hands of our rulers, will be of no use towards the protection of the people; and a little reflection will convince us, that it is certainly the case. If, indeed, government were really strengthened by such surrender, if the body of the people were made more secure, or more happy by the means, we ought to make the sacrifice. An individual ought to submit to be tossed about, imprisoned and treated injuriously, if the good of his country should require it; and every individual in the community ought to strip himself of some convenience for the sake of the public good.

I know it is an error not uncommon to believe, that a government is the 3.3.53 more powerful in proportion as it is more tyrannical; but this is not the case: so far from it, that it has always been found, that free countries have been able to exert powers far superior to those in which a more absolute government prevailed. For instance, a senate which is master of its own elections, without any or with very little dependence on the people, would not be able to exert as much force as a senate which is freely elected by the people; because the cheerful support which would be yielded in the latter case, would far exceed that which could be exacted by the mere force of authority. Again; how could the stripping people of the right of trial by jury conduce to the strength of the state? Do we find the government in England at all weakened by the people retaining the right of trial by jury? Far from it. Yet these things which merely tend to oppress the people, without conducing at all to the strength of the state, are the last which aristocratic rulers would consent to restore to the people; because they encrease the personal power and importance of the rulers. Judges, unincumbered by juries, have been ever found much better friends to government than to the people. Such judges will always be more desireable than juries to a self-created senate, upon the same principle that a large standing army, and the entire command of the militia and of the purse, is ever desireable to those who wish to enslave the people, and upon the same principle that a bill of rights is their aversion.

In like manner, if we should trace the several branches of the proposed 3.3.54 constitution, which are obnoxious to the liberties of the people, we shall find them to consist of such articles as are rather fitted to encrease the powers of the rulers, than the strength of the nation. Union is the great source of strength to a nation, not vassalage. To an aristocratic government vassalage is the great object even at the expence of union among the people. We ought not, therefore, by any means to rely upon the virtue of our future rulers for a reformation of those things which at present are amiss in the proposed constitution. The president and senate will ever be grasping at more and more power until they are completely masters of the people, and the president at last master of all.

Let us then turn to the article in the proposed constitution, which pro- 3.3.55 vides for the making alterations at some future period; and let us figure to ourselves the time when two-thirds of both houses of Congress shall think it necessary to call a convention, or two-thirds of the legislatures of the individual states shall apply for the calling of a convention, and when a continental convention shall agree upon amendments, and when the legislatures of three-fourths of the states, or three-fourths of the conventions to be called in the several states, if Congress shall prefer that mode of proceeding, shall ratify such amendments; and again, after all these strainings, and filtrings, and refinings, of the hopes and expectations of the people through the channels of power, when the amendments so asked for, proposed, digested, twistificated, altered, and at last ratified, will be of any essential importance. For my part I would full as soon sit down and take my chance of winning an important privilege to the people, by the casting of the dice 'till I could throw sixes an hundred times in succession.—There is no doubt but the thing has been purposely contrived to make alterations extremely difficult; and so it certainly ought to be if the proposed constitution were a good one. I do not therefore so much blame the late federal convention for making their constitution very difficult of alteration, as I insist upon it as an argument in favor of making our amendments beforehand. A machine which cannot be taken to pieces after it is once set a-going, ought to be very well finished at first.

3.3.56 Yet this is not all the difficulty. Inveterate power is at all times very hard to be controuled. Habits, connexions, dependence, and a thousand circumstances in course of time, rivet the chains of slavery 'till we grow either callous to their galling, or too feeble to shake them off, or too listless to resist. Ask the beaten Turk to resume his liberty, or the tired horse to resume his pristine freedom.—As well might you ask the galled sons of America, a few years hence, to assert the native rights of men, if the proposed constitution be once fixed upon us. It will be extremely difficult to change it for the better even in the beginning; but in a little time it will become utterly impossible.

3.3.57 A little prudence, a little patience, and a little serious reflection, would lead us to concur in calling a new convention, to revise the constitution proposed to us. That convention, I have no doubt, if fully, freely, and deliberately chosen, would concur in some essential amendments; and we might yet be a united and a happy people.

Yours, &c.
An Old Whig.

1. On the general problem of founding and the differences between ancient examples, including that of Lycurgus, and this new American founding, see The Federalist no. 38, 239–41; on amendments, see no. 80, 590–94; and Poplicola's reply to this essay in the Massachusetts Centinel 31 October 1787.

2. Poplicola argues that another principle will operate: "It is always to be remembered that the members of this body are under the instructions of their constituents, and it cannot be forgotten, that the love of popularity, next to the love of interest, is the strongest principle of the human heart—Ambition will find its object, as much in the applause of the world, as in the continuance and extension of any official acquirement, supposing honour and integrity to have no influence." Ibid.

3. See Lowndes 5.12.1. Such language was in fact very rare, although the Federalists did argue that very great reliance ought to be placed on the wise and patriotic men who drafted the Constitution. (See Federal Republican 3.6.5 n. 4). A week after this essay was published, however, Caesar confessed that he considered the multitude "in general as very ill qualified to judge for themselves what government will best suit their peculiar situations; nor is this to be wondered at. The science of government is not easily understood." Ford, Essays 287; see also Cato II, 2.6.8 n. 6, Centinel I, 2.7.3. Publius' argument in The Federalist no. 49 is considerably more subtle.

4. Votes and Proceedings of the House of Representatives of the Province of Pennsylvania (Philadelphia 1752–76) IV, 501. Cf. The Federalist no. 8, 45: "Safety from external danger is the most powerful director of national conduct. Even the ardent love of liberty will, after a time, give way to its dictates. The violent destruction of life and property incident to war—the continual effort and alarm attendant on a state of continual danger, will compel nations the most attached to liberty, to resort for repose and security, to institutions, which have a tendency to destroy their civil and political rights. To be more safe they, at length, become willing to run the risk of being less free."

5. McMaster and Stone 143. This is Wilson's speech of 6 October 1787, commented on in detail in Centinel II. See Centinel II, 2.7.35.

6. Ibid.

7. Wilson does not use the term "expressly." See The Federalist no. 44, 303–4.

8. Montesquieu does not say this. See The Spirit of Laws II, ch. 2; XI, ch. 6. The writer may have been thinking of someone like Locke (The Second Treatise of Civil Government XI) or Blackstone (Commentaries I, 46, 49, 52).

9. An Old Whig apparently does not follow the Pennsylvania Constitutionalist party in his view of the Pennsylvania constitution, suggesting perhaps that he is from out of state or an individual not active in Pennsylvania politics. See Centinel IX, 2.7.128–34.

10. The constitutional phrase is "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever."

11. For argument in rebuttal to the following remarks on the "necessary and proper" and "supremacy" clauses, see The Federalist nos. 33 and 34. See Brutus I, 2.9.8–9 and n. 7.

12. The Declaratory Act, 1766.

13. Job 32:9.

14. See above, n. 7.

15. McMaster and Stone 143–44.

16. Ibid. 145.

17. Federalist expressions of anything like indifference to trial by jury are rare. See, however, the reservations expressed by Noah Webster, writing as "America" in the New York Daily Advertiser 31 December 1787 (reprinted in Webster's Collection of Essays [1790] 146–47). See also Alfredus in the New Hampshire Freeman's Oracle 18 January 1788, quoted by A [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.16. The Federalists did argue that juries were often not used and were not proper in admiralty and chancery jurisdictions (for references, see Federal Farmer II, 2.8.19 n. 16); that practice regarding use of juries in civil cases varied widely among the states (see Wilson, McMaster and Stone 353); that trial by jury of the vicinage was no longer important (Ford, Pamphlets 53 [A Citizen of America]); and that juries might be biased (Elliot IV, 295 [Barnwell]). See Plebeian 6.11.15 n. 13.

18. See Henry Hallam, The Constitutional History of England (New York 1886) I, 30.

19. McMaster and Stone 145 (a close paraphrase).

20. Ecclesiastes 2:18–19.

21. This paper was also printed as a broadside (Evans, Early American Imprints no. 20379).

22. Cf. The Federalist no. 19, 122–23; Newport Man 4.25.3; [Maryland] Farmer III, 5.1.52–53; Henry 5.16.8.

23. Wilson, "Address to the Citizens of Philadelphia," McMaster and Stone 143 (a close paraphrase, but Wilson writes "representatives" not "rulers"). See Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.50 nn. 38–40.

24. This paper was also printed as a broadside (Evans, Early American Imprints no. 20380).

25. The original reads "advantages."

26. See Philadelphiensis I, 3.9.2.

27. Constitution of Pennsylvania, 1776, Declaration of Rights, sec. 8.

28. I have not found this piece.

29. Publius compares the proposed presidency with the British monarchy in The Federalist no. 69; see also Philadelphiensis XII, 3.9.96 n. 37.

30. Publius sees the problem but finds the solution in the President's eligibility for reelection. "Would it promote the peace of the community, or the stability of the government, to have half a dozen men who had had credit enough to be raised to the seat of the supreme magistracy, wandering among the people like discontented ghosts, and sighing for a place which they were destined never more to possess?" The Federalist no. 72, 438.

31. The source of this comment has not been found.

32. Cf. The Federalist nos. 32–34; Federal Farmer III, 2.8.39 n. 29.

33. The latter quotation is from the letter of Sherman and Ellsworth to the Governor of Connecticut; see below, note 35. Sherman elaborated this argument in his Letters from A Citizen of New Hampshire, Ford, Essays 239. On the question of the need for direct taxation, see above, Centinel II, 2.7.52 n. 30.

34. Cf. The Federalist no. 30, 190; Brutus V, 2.9.63.

35. Letter from the Hon. Roger Sherman and the Hon. Oliver Ellsworth, Esqs., delegates from the State of Connecticut, in the late federal convention, to His Excellency, the Governor of Said State, 26 September 1787, Elliot I, 491–92; cf. Federal Farmer III, 2.8.39 n. 28.

36. See above, note 3.

37. The original reads, "than in the hurry . . . than we ever suffered. . . ."

38. This essay is numbered VII in the newspaper.

39. See above, I, 3.3.1–5.

40. John Arbuthnot, An Appendix to John Bull Still in His Senses or Law Is a Bottomless Pit (London 1712) ch. 3, 14–20.

41. Benjamin Cole, ed., Select Tales and Fables with Prudential Maxims in Prose and Verse (London 1746), fable 10, "The Clown and the Word."

Essay by Montezuma

(PHILADELPHIA) INDEPENDENT GAZETTEER
17 October 1787

Irony was not a strong point in Anti-Federalist writing. This essay by Montezuma is in the form of a Federalist explanation of the Constitution and of its underlying anti-democratic intentions. It is described by Main as "the most unequivocal printed criticism of the Constitution from the democratic point of view. . . ."[1] However, despite his inclusion in both the Borden and the Kenyon collections, Montezuma is a good deal less penetrating than, for example, Aristocrotis, whose essay is similar in type and general argument.[2] But he does present a view of the illicit designs of the "well born" and "better kind" of people that must have been shared by many (though no one knows how many). His argument concerning the jurisdiction of the federal courts is interesting and substantial; and his description of the workings of the system of representation presents the underside, as it were, of the arguments on representation put forward by writers like The Federal Farmer and Melancton Smith.

1. Main, Antifederalists 173.
2. Borden, The Antifederalist Papers 20–30; Kenyon, The Antifederalists 61–67; see Aristocrotis 3.16.

Mr. Oswald.

That the enclosed defence may be laid open to the general scrutiny of my fellow citizens, I request a place for it in your paper.

Lycurgus.

We the Aristicratic party of the United States, lamenting the many inconveniencies to which the late confederation subjected the well-born, the better kind of people bringing them down to the level of the rabble, and holding in utter detestation, that frontispiece to every bill of rights—"that all men are born equal," beg leave (for the purpose of drawing a line be- 3.4.1

tween such as we think were ordained to govern, and such as were made to bear the weight of government without having any share in its administration) to submit to our friends in the first class for their inspection, the following defence of our monarchical, aristocratical democracy.

3.4.2 1st. As a majority of all societies consist of men who (though totally incapable of thinking or acting in governmental matters) are more readily led than driven, we have thought meet to indulge them in something like a democracy in the new constitution, which part we have designated by the popular name of the House of Representatives; but to guard against every possible danger from this lower house, we have subjected every bill they bring forward, to the double negative of our upper house and president—nor have we allowed the populace the right to elect their representatives annually, as usual, lest this body should be too much under the influence and controul of their constituents, and thereby prove the "weatherboard of our grand edefice, to shew the shiftings of every fashionable gale,"[1] for we have not yet to learn that little else is wanting, to aristocratize the most democratical representative than to make him somewhat independent of his political creators—We have taken away that rotation of appointment which has so long perplexed us—that grand engine of popular influence; every man is eligible into our government, from time to time for life—this will have a two-fold good effect; first it prevents the representatives from mixing with the lower class, and imbibing their foolish sentiments, with which they would have come charged on re-election.

3.4.3 2d. They will from the perpetuality of office be under our eye, and in a short time will think and act like us, independently of popular whims and prejudices; for the assertion "that evil communications corrupt good manners,"[2] is not more true than its reverse. We have allowed this house the power to impeach, but we have tenaciously reserved the right to try. We hope gentlemen, you will see the policy of this clause—for what matters it who accuses, if the accused is tried by this friends—In fine, this plebian house will have little power, and that little be rightly shaped by our house of gentlemen, who will have a very extensive influence, from their being chosen out of the genteeler class, and their appointment being almost a life, one as seven years is the calculation on a man's life, and they are chosen for six: It is true, every third senatorial seat is to be vacated duennually, but two-thirds of this influential body will remain in office, and be ready to direct or (if necessary) bring over to the good old way, the young members, if the old ones should not be returned; and whereas many of our brethren, from a laudable desire to support their rank in life above the commonality, have not only deranged their finances, but subjected their persons to indecent treatment (as being arrested for debt, etc.) we have framed a privilege clause, by which they may laugh at the fools who trusted them; but we have given out that this clause was provided, only that the members might be able without interruption, to deliberate on the important business of their country.

We have frequently endeavoured to effect in our respective states, the happy discrimination which pervades this system, but finding we could not bring the states into it individually, we have determined, and in this our general plan we have taken pains to leave the legislature of each free and independent state, as they now call themselves, in such a situation that they will eventually be absorbed by our grand continental vortex, or dwindle into petty corporations, and have power over little else than yoaking hogs or determining the width of cart wheels—but (aware that an intention to annihilate state legislatures, would be objected to our favorite scheme) we have made their existence (as a board of electors) necessary to ours; this furnishes us and our advocates with a fine answer to any clamours that may be raised on this subject, viz.—We have so interwoven continental and state legislatures that they cannot exist separately; whereas we in truth, only leave them the power of electing us, for what can a provincial legislature do when we possess "the exclusive regulation of external and internal commerce, excise, duties, imposts, post-offices and roads["]; when we and we alone, have the power to wage war, make peace, coin money (if we can get bullion) if not, borrow money, organize the militia and call them forth to execute our decrees, and crush insurrections assisted by a noble body of veterans subject to our nod, which we have the power of raising and keeping even in the time of peace. What have we to fear from state legislatures or even from states, when we are armed with such powers, with a president at our head? (a name we thought proper to adopt in conformity to the prejudices of a silly people who are so foolishly fond of a Republican government, that we were obliged to accommodate in names and forms to them, in order more effectually to secure the substance of our proposed plan, but we all know that Cromwell was a King, with the title of protector.) I repeat it, what have we to fear armed with such powers, with a president at our head who is captain-general of the army, navy and militia of the United States, who can make and unmake treaties, appoint and commission ambassadors and other ministers, who can grant or refuse reprieves or pardons, who can make judges of the supreme and other continental courts, in short who will be the source, the fountain of honor, profit and power, whose influence like the rays of the sun, will diffuse itself far and wide, will exhale all democratical vapours and break the clouds of popular insurrection? But again gentlemen, our judicial power is a strong work, a masked battery, few people see the guns we can and will ere long play off from it; for the judicial power embraces every question which can arise in law or equity, under this constitution and under the laws of "the United States"[3]—(which laws will be you know, the supreme laws of the land)—This power extends to all cases, affecting ambassadors or other public ministers, and "consuls to all cases of admiralty and maratime jurisdiction—to controversies to which the United States are a party, to controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, between citizens of different states, between citizens of the same state claiming lands under grants of different states, and between a state or the citizens thereof and foreign states, citizens or subjects."

3.4.4

3.4.5 Now, can a question arise in the colonial courts, which the ingenuity or sophistry of an able lawyer may not bring within one or other of the above cases? Certainly not. Then our court will have original or appellate jurisdiction in all cases—and if so how fallen are state judicatures—and must not every provincial law yield to our supreme fiat? Our constitution answers yes—then how insignificant will the makers of these laws be—it is in the nature of power to create influence—and finally we shall entrench ourselves so as to laugh at the cabals of the commonalty—a few regiments will to at first, it must be spread abroad that they are absolutely necessary to defend the frontiers. Now a regiment and then a legion must be added quietly, bye and bye a frigate or two must be built, still taking care to intimate that they are essential to the support of our revenue laws and to prevent smuggling. We have said nothing about a bill of rights, for we viewed it as an eternal clog upon our designs—as a lock chain to the wheels of government—though by the way as we have not insisted on rotation in our offices, the simile of a wheel is ill. We have for some time, considered the freedom of the press as a great evil—it spreads information, and begets a licentiousness in the people which needs the rein more than the spur; besides a daring printer may expose the plans of government and lessen the consequence of our president and senate; for these and many other reasons we have said nothing with respect to the "right of the people to speak and publish their sentiments," or about their "palladiums of liberty," and such stuff. We do not much like that sturdy privilege of the people—the right to demand the writ of habeas corpus—we have therefore reserved the power of refusing it in cases of rebellion, and you know we are the judges of what is rebellion. Things as yet are well—Our friends we find have been assiduous in representing our federal calamities, until at length the people at large frightened by the gloomy picture on one side, and allured by the prophecies of some of our fanciful and visionary adherents on the other, are ready to accept and confirm our proposed government without the delay or forms of examination, which was the more to be wished as they are wholly unfit to investigate the principles or pronounce on the merit of so exquisite a system. Impressed with a conviction that this constitution is calculated to restrain the influence and power of the LOWER CLASS—to draw that discrimination we have so long sought after, to secure to our friends privileges and offices, which were not to be valued on under the former government, because they were in common—to take the burthen of legislation and attendance on public business off the commonalty, who will be much better able thereby to prosecute with effect their private business, to destroy that political thirteen headed monster the state sovereignties, to check the licentiousness of the people by making it dangerous to speak or publish daring or tumultuary sentiments, to enforce obedience to laws by a strong executive, aided by military pensioners, and finally to promote the public and private interests of the better kind of people. We submit it to your judgement to take such measure for its adoption as you in your wisdom may think fit.

Signed by unanimous order of the lords spiritual and temporal Montezuma, President.

1. The source of this quotation has not been found.
2. 1 Corinthians 15:33.
3. See Crosskey, Politics and the Constitution I, ch. 21.

Essay of A Democratic Federalist

PENNSYLVANIA HERALD
17 October 1787

Like many other Anti-Federalists, A Democratic Federalist treats James Wilson's discussion of a bill of rights, the federal judiciary, and a standing army. Only with respect to the second (3.5.3–9) does he add significantly to the Anti-Federalist argument; and in a technical but pointed and well-informed discussion of the need for a trial by jury in civil cases he supplements the discussion of The Federal Farmer and others. He investigates the implications of an appellate jurisdiction as to both law and fact, which is both contrary to common law principles and undesirable on broader ground. The essay first appeared in the Pennsylvania Herald 17 October 1787, from which it is taken here.[1] While the author is unknown, he may well have been Richard Henry Lee if, as seems probable, A Democratic Federalist was also Cincinnatus, (see below, 6.1), whose essays continued at length the argument against Wilson.

1. The essay was reprinted in the Pennsylvania Packet 23 October 1787, from which it is taken by McMaster and Stone 150–57.

3.5.1 The arguments of the Honorable Mr. Wilson, expressed in the speech he made at the state-house on the Saturday preceding the general election (as stated in the Pennsylvania Herald,)[1] although extremely ingenious and the best that could be adduced in support of so bad a cause, are yet extremely futile, and will not stand the test of investigation.

3.5.2 In the first place, Mr. Wilson pretends to point out a leading discrimination between the State Constitutions, and the Constitution of the United States.—In the former, he says, every power which is not reserved is given, and in the latter, every power which is not given is reserved: And this may furnish an answer, he adds, to those who object, that a bill of rights has not been introduced in the proposed Federal Constitution.[2] If this doctrine is true, and since it is the only security that we are to have for our natural rights, it ought at least to have been clearly expressed in the plan of government. The 2d. section of the present articles of confederation says: Each State retains its sovereignty, freedom and independance, AND EVERY POWER, JURISDICTION AND RIGHT WHICH IS NOT BY THIS CONFEDERATION EXPRESSLY DELEGATED TO THE UNITED STATES IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED.—This declaration (for what purpose I know not) is entirely omitted in the proposed Constitution. And yet there is a material difference between this Constitution and the present confederation, for Congress in the latter are merely an executive body; it has no power to raise money, it has no judicial jurisdiction. In the other, on the contrary, the federal rulers are vested with each of the three essential powers of government—their laws are to be paramount to the laws of the different States, what then will there be to oppose to their encroachments? Should they ever pretend to tyrannize over the people, their standing army, will silence every popular effort, it will be theirs to explain the powers which have been granted to them; Mr. Wilson's distinction will be forgot, denied or explained away, and the liberty of the people will be no more.

It is said in the 2d. section of the 3d. article of the Federal Plan: "The judicial power shall extend to ALL CASES in law and equity, arising under this constitution." It is very clear that under this clause, the tribunal of the United States, may claim a right to the cognizance of all offences against the general government, and libels will not probably be excluded. Nay, those offences may be by them construed, or by law declared, misprision of treason, an offence which comes literally under their express jurisdiction.—Where is then the safety of our boasted liberty of the press? And in case of a conflict of jurisdiction between the courts of the United States, and those of the several Commonwealths, is it not easy to foresee which of the two will obtain the advantage? 3.5.3

Under the enormous power of the new confederation, which extends to the individuals as well as to the States of America, a thousand means may be devised to destroy effectually the liberty of the press—There is no knowing what corrupt and wicked judges may do in process of time, when they are not restrained by express laws. The case of John Peter Zenger of New-York, ought still to be present to our minds, to convince us how displeasing the liberty of the press is to men in high power[3]—At any rate, I lay it down as a general rule, that wherever the powers of a government extend to the lives, the persons, and properties of the subject, all their rights ought to be clearly and expressly defined—otherwise they have but a poor security for their liberties. 3.5.4

The second and most important objection to the federal plan, which Mr. Wilson pretends to be made in a disingenuous form, is the entire abolition of the trial by jury in civil cases.[4] It seems to me that Mr. Wilson's pretended answer, is much more disingenuous than the objection itself, which I maintain to be strictly founded in fact. He says "that the cases open to trial by jury differing in the different States, it was therefore impracticable to have 3.5.5

made a general rule." This answer is extremely futile, because a reference might easily have been made to the common law of England, which obtains through every State, and cases in the maritime and civil law courts would of course have been excepted. I must also directly contradict Mr. Wilson when he asserts that there is no trial by jury in the courts of chancery—It cannot be unknown to a man of his high professional learning, that whenever a difference arises about a matter of fact in the courts of equity in America or England, the fact is sent down to the courts of common law to be tried by a jury, and it is what the lawyers call a feigned issue.[5] This method will be impracticable under the proposed form of judicial jurisdiction for the United States.

3.5.6 But setting aside the equivocal answers of Mr. Wilson, I have it in my power to prove that under the proposed Federal Constitution, the trial of facts in civil cases by a jury of the Vicinage is entirely and effectually abolished, and will be absolutely impracticable. I wish the learned gentleman had explained to us what is meant by the appellate jurisdiction as to law and fact which is vested in the superior court of the United States?[6] As he has not thought proper to do it, I shall endeavour to explain it to my fellow citizens, regretting at the same time that it has not been done by a man whose abilities are so much superior to mine. The word appeal, if I understand it right, in its proper legal signification includes the fact as well as the law, and precludes every idea of a trial by jury—It is a word of foreign growth, and is only known in England and America in those courts which are governed by the civil or ecclesiastical law of the Romans. Those courts have always been considered in England as a grievance, and have all been established by the usurpations of the ecclesiastical over the civil power. It is well known that the courts of chancery in England were formerly entirely in the hands of ecclesiastics, who took advantage of the strict forms of the common law, to introduce a foreign mode of jurisprudence under the specious name of Equity. Pennsylvania, the freest of the American States has wisely rejected this establishment, and knows not even the name of a court of chancery—And in fact, there can not be any thing more absurd than a distinction between LAW and EQUITY. It might perhaps have suited those barbarous times when the law of England, like almost every other science, was perplexed with quibbles and Aristotelian distinctions, but it would be shameful to keep it up in these more enlightened days. At any rate, it seems to me that there is much more equity in a trial by jury, than in an appellate jurisdiction from the fact.

3.5.7 An appeal therefore is a thing unknown to the common law. Instead of an appeal from facts, it admits of a second, or even third trial by different juries, and mistakes in points of law, are rectified by superior courts in the form of a writ of error—and to a mere common lawyer, unskilled in the forms of the civil law courts, the words appeal from law and fact, are mere nonsense, and unintelligible absurdity.

But even supposing that the superior court of the United States had the authority to try facts by juries of the vicinage, it would be impossible for them to carry it into execution. It is well known that the supreme courts of the different states, at stated times in every year, go round the different counties of their respective states to try issues of fact, which is called riding the circuits. Now, how is it possible that the supreme continental court, which we will suppose to consist at most of five or six judges, can travel at least twice in every year, through the different counties of America, from New Hampshire to Kentuckey and from Kentuckey to Georgia, to try facts by juries of the vicinage. Common sense will not admit of such a supposition. I am therefore right in my assertion, that trial by jury in civil cases, is, by the proposed constitution entirely done away, and effectually abolished. 3.5.8

Let us now attend to the consequences of this enormous innovation, and daring encroachment, on the liberties of the citizens. Setting aside the oppression, injustice, and partiality that may take place in the trial of questions of property between man and man, we will attend to one single case, which is well worth our consideration. Let us remember that all cases arising under the new constitution, and all matters between citizens of different states, are to be submitted to the new jurisdiction. Suppose therefore, that the military officers of congress, by a wanton abuse of power, imprison the free citizens of America, suppose the excise or revenue officers (as we find in Clayton's Reports, page 44 Ward's case)[7]—that a constable, having a warrant to search for stolen goods, pulled down the clothes of a bed in which there was a woman, and searched under her shift,—suppose, I say, that they commit similar, or greater indignities, in such cases a trial by jury would be our safest resource, heavy damages would at once punish the offender, and deter others from committing the same: but what satisfaction can we expect from a lordly court of justice, always ready to protect the officers of government against the weak and helpless citizen, and who will perhaps sit at the distance of many hundred miles from the place where the outrage was committed?—What refuge shall we then have to shelter us from the iron hand of arbitrary power?—O! my fellow citizens, think of this while it is yet time, and never consent to part with the glorious privilege of trial by jury, but with your lives. 3.5.9

But Mr. Wilson has not stopped here—he has told us that a STANDING ARMY, that great support of tyrants, not only was not dangerous, but that it was absolutely necessary.[8]—O! my much respected fellow citizens! and are you then reduced to such a degree of insensibility, that assertions like these will not rouse your warmest resentment and indignation? Are we then, after the experience of past ages, and the result of the enquiries of the best and most celebrated patriots have taught us to dread a standing army above all earthly evils, are we then to go over all the thread-bare common place arguments that have been used without success by the advocates of tyranny, and which have been for a long time past so gloriously refuted! 3.5.10

Read the excellent Burgh in his political disquisitions, on this hackneyed subject, and then say, whether you think that a standing army is necessary in a free country? Even Mr. Hume, an aristocratical writer, has candidly confessed, that an army is a mortal distemper in a government, of which it must at last inevitably perish (2d Burgh 349)[9] and the Earl of Oxford (Oxford the friend of France, and the pretender, the attainted Oxford) said in the British parliament, in a speech on the mutiny bill; that "while he had breath, he would speak for the liberties of his country, and against courts martial and a standing army in peace as dangerous to the constitution," (Ibid page 455 [356]). Such were the speeches even of the enemies to liberty, when Britain had yet a right to be called free. But, says Mr. Wilson, "It is necessary to maintain the appearance of strength even in times of the most profound tranquillity." And what is this more than a thread-bare hackneyed argument, which has been answered over and over in different ages, and does not deserve even the smallest consideration?—Had we a standing army, when the British invaded our peaceful shores? Was it a standing army that gained the battles of Lexington, and Bunker's Hill, and took the ill fated Burgoyne? Is not a well regulated militia sufficient for every purpose of internal defence? And which of you, my fellow citizens, is afraid of any invasion from foreign powers, that our brave militia would not be able immediately to repel?

3.5.11 Mr. Wilson says that he does not know of any nation in the world which has not found it necessary to maintain the appearance of strength in a season of the most profound tranquility; if by this equivocal assertion, he has meant to say that there is no nation in the world without a standing army in time of peace, he has been mistaken. I need only adduce the example of Switzerland, which, like us, is a republic, whose thirteen cantons, like our thirteen States, are under a federal government, and which besides is surrounded by the most powerful nations in Europe, all jealous of its liberty and prosperity: And yet that nation has preserved its freedom for many ages, with the sole help of a militia, and has never been known to have a standing army, except when in actual war.—Why should we not follow so glorious an example, and are we less able to defend our liberty without an army, than that brave but small nation, which with its militia alone has hitherto defied all Europe?

3.5.12 It is said likewise, that a standing army is not a new thing in America—Congress even at this moment have a standing army on foot.—I answer, that precedent is not principle—Congress have no right to keep up a standing army in time of peace:—If they do, it is an infringement of the liberties of the people—wrong can never be justified by wrong—but it is well known that the assertion is groundless, the few troops that are on the banks of the Ohio, were sent for the express purpose of repelling the invasion of the savages, and protecting the inhabitants of the frontiers.—It is our misfortune that we are never at peace with those inhuman butchers of their species, and while they remain in our neighbourhood, we are always, with respect to them, in a state of war—as soon as the danger is over, there is no doubt but Congress will disband their handful of soldiers:—it is therefore not true, that Congress keep up a standing army in a time of peace and profound security.

The objection to the enormous powers of the President and Senate is not the least important of all, but it requires a full discussion and ample investigation—I shall take another opportunity of laying before the public my observations upon this subject, as well as upon every other part of the new constitution.[10] At present I shall only observe, that it is an established principle in America, which pervades every one of our State Constitutions, that the legislative and executive powers ought to be kept forever separate and distinct from each other, and yet in this new constitution we find there are TWO EXECUTIVE BRANCHES, each of which has more or less controul over the proceedings of the legislature. This is an innovation of the most dangerous kind upon every known principle of government, and it will be easy for me to convince my fellow citizens that it will, in the first place, create a Venetian aristocracy, and, in the end, produce an absolute monarchy. 3.5.13

Thus I have endeavoured to answer to the best of my abilities, the principal arguments of Mr. Wilson—I have written this in haste, in a short interval of leisure from my usual avocations. I have only traced the outlines of the subject, and I hope some abler hand will second my honest endeavours.

A Democratic Federalist.

1. This is Wilson's widely discussed "Address to the Citizens of Philadelphia" of 6 October 1787, McMaster and Stone 143–49. The pamphlet version is reprinted (less accurately) in Ford, Pamphlets 155–61. For further information on this speech see Centinel II, 2.7.35 n. 14.

2. McMaster and Stone 143–44. See above, Federal Farmer IV, 2.8.50 n. 39; below, [New Hampshire] Farmer 4.17.2 nn. 1, 2.

3. See Livingston Rutherford, John Peter Zenger, His Press, His Trial, and a Bibliography of Zenger Imprints; also A Reprint of the First Edition of the Trial (New York 1904).

4. McMaster and Stone 144–45.

5. Cf. The Federalist no. 83, 565.

6. Many Anti-Federalists objected that the appellate jurisdiction given to the Supreme Court would enable that Court to review the decisions of juries in matters of fact, thus reducing the trial by jury to a mere form. See Martin 2.4.92–93; Centinel II, 2.7.41; Federal Farmer XV, 2.8.189; Brutus XIV, 2.9.170; Pennsylvania Convention Minority 3.11.38–39; Symmes 4.5.2 (13); Impartial Examiner 5.14.9; Cincinnatus I, 6.1.7. Noah Webster suggested that appeals of questions of fact would be decided by a second jury (Ford, Pamphlets 53); and the Anti-Federalist [New Hampshire] Farmer proposed a jury to sit with the federal Supreme Court (4.17.3). The intention of the framers seems, however, to have been to provide for the customary appellate review of the facts by courts of equity and admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. There was unquestionably some basis for Anti-Federalist concern. The objections were laid to rest in the 7th Amendment, providing not only that civil suits should be tried by jury but also that no fact decided by a jury should be reexamined by any court of the United States except according to the rules of the common law. The matter is discussed by Joseph Story, Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States 2d ed., II, sec. 1762–72, which also includes the pertinent passages from The Federalist nos. 81, 83, and from the leading Supreme Court case, Parsons v. Bedford, 3 Peters 413, 446 (1830). See also James Wilson's explanation, Elliot II, 493–94, 518.

7. John Clayton, Reports of and Pleas of Assises at Yorke: 1631–1650 (London 1651).

8. McMaster and Stone 145–46.

9. James Burgh, Political Disquisitions (London 1774–75) II, bk. 3, ch. 1, p. 349.

10. No further essays appear to have been published, but see below, Cincinnatus IV and V, 6.1.25–43.

A Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention by A Federal Republican 1787

The initials at the end of this essay, "V.P.," seem to stand for Veritas Politica, the pseudonymous author of a short piece published in the Pennsylvania Herald on 27 October, which is in its main parts substantially identical with parts of the pamphlet of A Federal Republican.[1] The pamphlet, which is reprinted here, is dated 28 October, the day after the publication of the short newspaper essay, and is therefore presumably an extension and elaboration of the author's preliminary observations. The original essay is improved and extended to such an extent, however, that it would not be surprising if a second writer had somehow been involved in the pamphlet. An outline of this modest Anti-Federalist piece follows.

I. Introduction (3.6.1–9).
   Articles of Confederation are defective and need remedy; framers are good and wise men, but they can err and be affected by interest; published defences of Constitution are inadequate.
II. Legislature (3.6.10–22).
   A. Organization.
      1. Division of legislature is sound because of importance of preventing bad laws (3.6.10).
      2. Representation of the states.
         a. Representation is too small (3.6.11).
         b. More important, the states are unequally represented, contrary to the basic principles of confederation (3.6.12–14).
      3. The power of Congress over the times, places, and manner of choosing legislators is dangerous (3.6.15–16).
   B. Powers of legislature are excessive.
      1. Unlimited character of general welfare/taxing clause (3.6.17–19).

2. Standing army—extreme danger, especially to manners and virtue of people (3.6.20–21). (Important discussion of connection between virtue and maintenance of freedom.)
3. Power to prohibit importation of slaves leaves slavery intact (3.6.22).

III. Judicial powers are too comprehensive, too mixed with other departments (3.6.23).

IV. The proposed Constitution will tend to reduce the dignity and importance of states (3.6.25–38).
The guarantee of a republican form of government is empty (3.6.25).
Representation is inadequate (3.6.26).
State judicial power will sink to nothing (3.6.29).
States are deprived of necessary ways and means (3.6.30).
Powers of federal government are not in fact confined to general purposes (3.6.31–35).
No provision for freedom of press, which Congress may abridge (3.6.36).
State participation in elections is not enough to maintain states (3.6.37–38).

V. The executive is "too pointedly supreme"; there should be a sovereign executive council instead of a single executive magistrate (3.6.39–42).

VI. Mode of laying taxes (3.6.43–45). Taxes should be distributed by extent (or value) of land rather than by number of inhabitants (a major argument).

VII. Lack of a Bill of Rights (3.6.46–51). At least there should be a declared reservation of power in states.

VIII. Conclusion (3.6.52–56). Constitution conceived in wisdom but at present wears face of tyranny and should be reconsidered.

1. A Review of the Constitution Proposed by the Late Convention Held at Philadelphia, 1787. By A Federal Republican. Printed in Philadelphia, 1787, by Robert Smith and James Prange, "below the Drawbridge the third door below Spruce-Street, in Front and Water-Street."

Sed omnes omnium Charitates Patria una complexa est.
Cic. offic.[1]

Yet not the ties that kindred bosoms bind,
Not all in friendship's holy wreathes entwin'd
Are half so dear, so potent to controul
The gen'rous workings of the Patriot's soul.[2]

To the Freemen of the United States, the following critical remarks upon the Constitution recommended by the late federal Convention, are most humbly inscribed by their very obedient humble servant,

the Author.

Philadelphia, Oct. 28, 1787[3]

Friends and Fellow-Countrymen;

When any nation is about to make a change in its political character, it highly behoves it to summon the experience of ages that have past, to collect the wisdom of the present day, and ascertain clearly those just principles of equal government, that are adapted to secure inviolably the lives, the liberties, and the property of the people. In such a situation are these United States at the present moment.—They are now called to announce the Alpha or the Omega of their political existence, to lay a deep foundation for their national character, and to leave a legacy of happiness or misery to their children's children.—The Constitution recommended to the consideration of the United States, is a subject of general discussion; and, while it involves in its fate the interest of so extensive a country, every sentiment that can be offered upon it, deserves its proportion of the public attention.—It is worth our while, before we make any observations on the Constitution, as it stands recommended, to recur to the motives which gave rise to the calling of a Convention. We were taught by sad experience, the defect of the present articles of confederation, and wisely determined to alter and amend them. 3.6.1

At the framing of the present confederation, the bond of union among the States, which arose from a community of danger, in some measure superseded the necessity of wisdom. A common interest excited us to unite our exertions for the public good. 3.6.2

At such a time a system of government conceived in perfect wisdom, and adopted with deliberation, was not expected; and as soon as those common principles which supplied its defects, ceased to operate, the inconveniences which arose from them, were very sensibly felt. Since that time the seeds of civil dissention have been gradually ripening, and political confusion hath pervaded the States. Commerce hath been declining, our credit suffering, and our respectability, as a nation, hath almost vanished. In such circumstances it was thought proper to collect the patriotic wisdom of the States for the purpose of amending the articles of confederation, which were found to be inadequate to the security of national prosperity and happiness; and of making such additions to supreme power, as our situation testified, were wanted. Necessity, therefore, gave birth to the Convention, and the glaring defects of the late system of confederation, were the objects of its amend- 3.6.3

ment. But was it a total subversion of the confederation, that was intended by Congress or expected by the people? Any one, tolerably acquainted with human nature, can easily discern, that people involved in difficulty, would embrace any change, even if it were evidently and designedly for the worse. But this circumstance ought not to preclude examination. Did we experience any disadvantage from every part of the present confederation? And why alter that which experience itself hath taught us to be good? Was it not expected that some necessary additions to the powers of Congress, together with a few alterations of a smaller nature would constitute the whole of their business? To frame a Constitution entirely new therefore was out of their province. This is not offered as an argument against the Constitution itself, but it would certainly have been wisdom to have reserved that which was known to be good, and to have amended that only which was found defective from experience. But notwithstanding that, if the proposed constitution can be made to appear to be excellent in itself, and properly adapted to secure inviolably the rights and privileges of the peoples; it is the part of every honest man to wish its establishment.

But that upon examination it will be found to be otherwise, I am fully persuaded.

3.6.4 We shall proceed to offer some sentiments on the Constitution proposed for the acceptance of the United States. In doing this, we shall endeavour to state most of the objections which have been made, and collect their force into one point of view.

3.6.5 It may be proper to take notice of an opinion that has been offered to the public. It is said by some, that after having delegated the best and wisest men in our country for the purpose of framing a Constitution for the United States, it would be only presumption to offer any objections to it.[4] This doctrine holds up to view an excess of humility. Any errors which we may imagine to exist in the Constitution, we are to resolve into our own incapacity to fathom them. It is true that we ought to rely much upon the wisdom of those patriots who composed the late Convention; but surely the people for whom they acted have an undoubted right to offer such objections as they may suppose to exist, and that for the purpose of having them accurately solved by more enlightened understandings. It is the part of the doubtful to enquire, and of the wise to answer and instruct. It is from this principle, and this only, that I now offer my thoughts on the subject. Besides the nature and importance of the thing shew the propriety of impartial discussion.

3.6.6 If it be true also, that no public deliberative assembly, however wise, is perfectly uninfluenced by secular interest; but that all are in some degree subject to those temporary relapses from prudence, which passion occasions, we may very naturally suppose that some parts of this Constitution are tinctured with correspondent partiality and weakness. Nature is seldom over-awed by wisdom, and she often times draws her own picture in opposition to the constraint of education. We may without derogating from the characters of the members of Convention, expect to find defects in the Constitution which they have framed; and if the scrutiny of the public eye, viewing it in an infinite variety of lights can discern them, the motives must be dishonorable that prevent the communication of them.

3.6.7 On this subject much hath been published. Most of those pieces, however, which are said to be in favour of the Constitution, are only panegyrics, on those parts which are good, and to which no objections have been made. Mr. Wilson's speech does not come under this description.[5] It was composed in a masterly manner with strength and judgment. In it he has endeavoured to obviate some objections that have been offered to the public. It may be that the force of his arguments is not fully felt: but I think it will appear to any one whose understanding is not immoderately refined, that the writer who stiles himself the Democratic Federalist, is more than equal to him.[6] The Centinel has ably proposed many objections which have not been yet satisfactorily refuted.[7] Probably some of them exist beyond contradiction. The author of a pamphlet, stiled, Remarks on the Address of the Sixteen Members of the Assembly of Pennsylvania, has indeed touched upon many objections, and then dismissed them.[8] His whole performance is coloured with the ridiculous. He is no doubt a friend to Shaftsbury's position, and feels that it is easier to laugh than to reason. There is another pamphlet written by a citizen of America in favour of the Constitution.[9] The author of this deserves much for his style and plausibility of expression. He has made many excellent and wise remarks upon the Constitution. He has instituted a comparison between it and that of Rome and England. He points out several defects in the system of policy amongst the old Romans and modern Britons, and shews with some judgment the superior excellence of the proposed Constitution in its correspondent parts. But this is by no means proving that there are no errors in it. Some objections he has indeed partially considered, but the chief of the piece, which is good in itself, consists in encomiums on those parts which are unexceptionable. His mode of comparison is not just. Wealth and extent of territory have an immediate relation to government. The manners and customs of the people are closely connected with their government. Experience testifies that the manners and habits of the people in their several graduations to refinement have ever controuled their policy.

3.6.8 The excellent Montesquieu himself observes, that "the manners and customs of the people have an intimate connection with their laws."[10] In a comparison therefore, all these things ought to be considered. The same system of policy that might have been excellent in the governments of antiquity, would not probably do at the present day. The question which should be agitated is not whether the proposed constitution be better or worse than those that have from time to time existed; but whether it be in every respect adapted to secure our liberty and happiness at the present stage of the world.

3.6.9 There is one circumstance in the sitting of the late Convention, which bears upon its face the colour of suspicion. It adds one to the many examples of the truth of the common adage (which is founded in a propensity of human nature) that all who have power are fond of exerting it. They had power to controul the manner of their convening, and they did it indeed in a very suspicious way. They excluded themselves as it were from the view of the public, and an injunction of secrecy was imposed on the members. This might have been done to blunt the natural jealousy of the people; but it was depriving them of a guard to their liberties, which they should ever possess. Whatever were the[ir] intentions in shutting out their proceedings from the public ear, it carried in it a suspicious appearance.

But this is a matter small in itself, and for the honor and respect which we profess to entertain for the members of Convention, we are bound to believe that their motives in this particular were honorable, decent and wise.

3.6.10 In reviewing the proposed Constitution, the first thing that strikes us is the division of the legislative authority into two branches. I think that after mature deliberation, this will be acknowledged to be prudent and wise. Yet what some writers have observed upon it is not perfectly true. They have deduced their advantages from improper positions. In the division of the legislative power, [few?] bad bills will probably be passed, but more good ones will be opposed. In forming a just nexus imperii, this ought always to take place. It is better that many good bills should be destroyed than that a single bad one should be permitted to pass. Were it not for this circumstance, there would be little advantage. For although the passion of the one might sometimes be controuled by the coolness of the other; yet the passion of the latter might sometimes counteract the wisdom of the former. Experience however shows it to be wise to divide the legislative power between two distinct bodies.

3.6.11 The next thing that presents itself to view, is the representation of the states.

In the second section of the first article it is said, that representations and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several states, which may be included in this union according to their respective numbers, which shall be determined by adding to the whole number of free persons, including those bound to service for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed, three fifths of all other persons. The actual enumeration shall be made within three years after the first meeting of the Congress of the United States; and within every subsequent term of ten years in such a manner as they shall by law direct. The number of representatives shall not exceed one for every thirty thousand; but each state shall have at least one representative; and until such enumeration shall be made, the state of New-Hampshire shall be entitled to chuse three, Massachusetts eight, Rhode-Island and Providence Plantations one, Connecticut five, New-York six, New-Jersey four, Pennsylvania eight, Delaware one, Maryland six, Virginia ten, North-Carolina five, South-Carolina five, and Georgia three. Here it is evident the representation is too scanty. There is a certain corrective balance to be preserved, not only between different houses, but also between the members that compose the same house. This is often times of very great use. It tends to keep alive a spirit of more accurate discussion. But with such a paucity of members, this advantage can never be experienced. Besides what thirty thousand men would be willing to have one man represent them. It borders indeed upon injustice. Among thirty thousand people there must of necessity be a variety of classes, each having distinct and separate concerns, to which some respect would most certainly be due. Among such a number of men there will naturally be so many different ratios of interest to which their feelings are alive, and with which their happiness is intimately connected, that they should by all means be regarded. It would indeed be frivolous to attend to the most minute circumstantial divisions of interest; but in such a number as thirty thousands there must be divisions of a larger and more important nature, which are entitled to respect.[11]

3.6.12 But in the clause before-mentioned, there is a more material error; an error which essentially affects the rights of some states. It is the inequality of representation in the lower house. This particular has not yet been agitated.

In forming a confederation of independent republican states, it hath always been esteemed a fundamental law, that each state should have an equal representation. In forming the present confederation of the United States, this point was warmly urged by several learned gentlemen, and carried in Congress. Here is a change of which the citizens of the United States, who are less governed by principles of private interest, than those of true and impartial justice[,] should beware. The articles of the present confederation in this particular, are much more near akin to justice. They are not so highly coloured with lawful oppression. In the fifth article it is said, that, "in determining questions of the United-States in Congress assembled, each state shall have one vote." This is founded in reason, and its propriety is evinced by experience, from both of which it is very easy to prove, that representation among separate independent states should be equal. What is oftentimes observed upon this subject has very little meaning or force.

3.6.13 What, shall one state that is wealthier than another, that exceeds it in extent of territory, and has a far greater interest in national decisions, have no more weight in them? Shall (for instance) the state of Delaware or Rhode-Island have an equal voice with that of Virginia or Massachusetts? Here is an apparent, though a very superficial difficulty. The superior weight of large states does not, and ought not to consist in a greater number of representatives. There is an unavoidable influence arising from circumstances, which of itself forms the superiority. It is evident that a larger and richer state must of necessity have its influence over a smaller in a due proportion. But the establishing of a superiority by law in the inequality of representatives among the states, is a kind of a constitutional reduction to slavery. Its superior influence exists in nature, and therefore it is unnecessary, and indeed abusive to establish it by law. The representation of separate independent states is exactly similar to the votes of individuals. Rich citizens, who have large and valuable possessions are much more affected by public decisions than those of little or no fortune. Yet is a rich citizen entitled to a greater number of votes than one who is poor? No, because in the very nature of things he is known to influence many poor men. Influence will generally be in proportion to abilities and wealth. The same principle may be applied to states with equal propriety. The larger and wealthier have a necessary and unavoidable influence over the smaller and less wealthy. Examples to verify this assertion are numerous, and among the number there is one the more striking from its bearing so great a resemblance to the American states.

